

✓ 53494

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART INDUSTRY

FOUNDED 1865

VOLUME CXL

JANUARY 2, 1935, to JUNE 26, 1935

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

INDEX TO VOLUME CXL

JANUARY 2, 1935, to JUNE 26, 1935

(Nos. 3626-3651)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A Art
Arc Architecture
C Correspondence
Ct Cartoon
D Drama
Dt Driftway
E Editorial Article
EP Editorial Paragraph
M Music
MP Moving Pictures
P Poetry
S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages		Pages
1-28	January 2	373-400	April 3
29-56	January 9	401-428	April 10
57-84	January 16	429-464	April 17
85-112	January 23	465-492	April 24
113-140	January 30	493-520	May 1
141-168	February 6	521-556	May 8
169-204	February 13	557-584	May 15
205-232	February 20	585-612	May 22
233-260	February 27	613-640	May 29
261-288	March 6	641-668	June 5
289-316	March 13	669-696	June 12
317-344	March 20	697-724	June 19
345-372	March 27	725-752	June 26

A

A., N. R.
Department of labor, new mansion; C.	333
AAA. See Agriculture
Abbott, Edith
Unemployables, relief for, state or federal; S....41; see also EP.....	30
Abel, Lionel
Centaur, the; P.....	192
Abortion, legalization advocated in Sweden; EP.....	318
Abyssinia; Dt.....	304
Agreement with Egypt on Lake Tsana irrigation project; EP.....	670
See also Franco-Italian relations
Abyssinian-Italian dispute
Controversy with Italy settled; EP.....	142
Crisis worse; EP.....	429
Ethiopia; Dt.....	304
Gamble, Italian. Low; Ct.....	676
League of nations action offers hope; EP.....	642
Mussolini and the league; Low; Ct.....	324
Peace rumors; discontent in Italy; EP.....	725
Sword rattling by Italy; E.....	237
War being forced by Mussolini; EP.....	614
War impending; EP.....	585
Academic freedom
Krutch, J. W., views; S.....	449
Little yellow schoolhouse. H. Broun; S.....	308
Measure against pacifists and radicals in colleges; EP.....	671
Propaganda and the schools; E.....	293
See also Columbia university; Hicks, G.; Pittsburgh, university of Accent on youth. J. W. Krutch; D.....	83
Actors' equity association, insurgency in. H. Broun; S.....574; see also C.....	658
Adamic, Louis
Automobile industry; hill-billies come to Detroit; S....177; see also C.....	305
Coal industry, "bootleg"; S.....	46
Illinois coal mine strife; S.....	361
La Follette, Philip, talk with; S.....	242
Rubber workers; S.....	334
Wisconsin; La Follette progressives and the future; S.....	213
Adamic, Louis; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934.....	3
Addams, Jane, and peace. O. G. Villard; S.....	619
Adult education. See Education
Affiliated schools for workers, incorporated, case of. S. Grafton; S.....	476
Aged. See Old-age pensions
Agricultural adjustment administration. See Agriculture Agriculture
Agricultural adjustment administration:
And the textile crisis; E.....	496
Endangered by work-relief bill; EP.....	402
Bankhead bill for aiding share-croppers and tenant farmers; EP.....319; see also C.....	482

Purge at. R. G. S.; S.....	216
Crop restriction, United States, removal; EP.....	374
Dust storms, effect of. M. Bourke-White; S.....	597
Farmers, radicalism. J. Rorty; S.....	104
Production, and dietary scheme; EP.....	346
Share-croppers, new deal for. W. R. Amberson; S.....	185
Southern plantation system as exposed by conviction of W. H. Rodgers; EP.....143; see also E.....	174
Southern share-croppers's misery continues; EP.....	375
See also Arkansas; National farm holiday association
Alcoholic liquors
Mencken, H. L., reply to O. G. Villard; S.....	35
Statistics for H. L. Mencken. E. Tilton, and others; C.....	16
Villard views attacked by H. L. Mencken; C.....	72
Alexander, Norman
American newspaper guild; S.....75; see also C.....	183
Alice in wonderland; Dt.....	15
Alienation of affection, McNaboe bill barring actions passed; EP.....	431
Amalgamated association of iron, steel, and tin workers. See Steel and iron Amberson, William R.
New deal for share-croppers; S.....	185
American civil liberties union
Correspondence between J. W. Krutch and R. Baldwin on liberties, civic and economic, in Russia; C.....	103
Study in words; EP.....	207
American federation of labor
American newspaper guild and the federation. H. Broun; S.....484; 712
Labor movement wanted; E.....	589
See also Automobiles
American-Japanese relations. See Japanese-American relations
American legion, activity against radicals; EP.....	671
American liberty league; at investigation into sale of munitions of war; EP.....	1
American medical association, approves budgeting for medical care; opposes compulsory health insurance; EP.....	727
American Mercury, strike of office staff; EP.....559; strikers win victory before labor board, EP.....587; strike and maltreatment of pickets, C.....657; letter by L. E. Spivak and P. Palmer, also decision of labor board.....	741
American newspaper guild. See Newspapers
American writers' congress. See Authors
Andrews, General F. M., statement on seizure of British and French possessions by United States in case of war; EP.....	522
Statement repudiated by Roosevelt; EP.....	558
Angoff, Charles, joins editorial board of The Nation ; EP.....	375
Nazi Jew-baiting in America; S.....501, 531; correction.....	602
See also Goldman, E.
Anti-semitism. See Jews
Apra movement. See Peru
Arkansas
Sedition bill not passed by state senate; EP.....	375
Share-croppers, plight of. J. Herling; S.....419; see also EP.....	403
Terror in; E.....174; see also EP.....143; E.....	294
Armament limitation and disarmament
Anglo-French agreement on German rearmament; EP.....	170
British white paper retards agreement; EP.....	318
Washington naval treaty, abrogation by Japan; EP.....1; see also C.....	158
Armaments
Air defenses, European, and Hitler plans; Low; Ct.....	240
Appropriations, increased, for United States army; E.....265; S.....	733
Dance of death. O. G. Villard; S.....	351
German rearmament program, reaction to; EP.....	345
Hitler speech to Reichstag; E.....	645
Japan's war expenditures. Captain T. Yamaguchi; C, with editorial comment	17
Submarines, German announcement of building; EP.....	522

United States appropriations to be greatest in history, in peace time; E.....	88
See also Armament limitation and disarmament; Munitions of war
Army, United States
Chief of staff asks $400,000,000; EP.....205; S.....	733
Maneuvers; EP.....	494
Runs amuck. S. Grafton; S.....723; see also EP.....	205
See also Armaments
Art; for art's sake? E.....	6
Art, industrial. D. Haskell; A.....	554
Athletics, college. Left wing; S.....	538
Austria; repression, women and children; EP.....	31
Authors; Dt.....	249
American writers' congress; League of American writers formed. K. Burke; S.....	571
Ghostwriters; EP.....	207
Russian, conference; E.....	674
Automobiles
And housing. C. Willson; C.....	508
Automobile labor board report.....	280
Electric auto-lite company workers' union. A. Preis; C.....183; see also.....	77
General Motors strike, Toledo, Ohio. A. J. Muste; S.....	632
Hill-billies come to Detroit. L. Adamic; S.....177; see also C.....	305
Industry, boom in, main factor in business recovery; EP.....	261
Jobs, steadier.....	21
Labor board report.....	280
Labor conditions; E.....	208
Labor, elections; protest by American federation of labor; E.....237; see also.....	241
Labor ends settlement. C. Ogburn; S.....	161
Labor relations. L. Wolman; S.....	297
Strike at Toledo plant, General motors corporation; EP.....	557
Strike, general, possible in the spring. S. Romer; S.....	162
Toledo carries on.....77; see also C.....	183
Wages, workers'; EP.....	643
Awake and sing. J. W. Krutch; D.....	314

B

Babes in toyland. W. Troy; MP.....	27
Bacon, Peggy; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934.....	3
Baer, Max, defeat; EP.....	727
Bailey, J. O., and W. T. Couch
North Carolina textile workers' arrest; S.....483; see also C.....	482
Balch, Emily Greene
Seeks aid for award of Nobel prize to C. von Ossietzky; C.....	686
Baldwin, Roger
Correspondence with J. W. Krutch on civil and economic liberties in Russia; C.....	103
"Gag" bills, protest against; C.....	601
Ballets. See Dance, the
Bankers, and farm loans. M. E. Livesey; C.....	44
Relations to railroads exposed; EP.....	375
Bankhead bill. See Agriculture Banks
Bill in danger; E.....	729
Federal reserve banks, government ownership of stock; EP.....	614
Giannini fights Morgan on banking bill. S. G. Ward; S.....	737
Reform of federal reserve system, bill for; E.....	236
Bargaining, collective. See Labor unions
Barnes, Kathleen
Social insurance in Soviet union; S.....	302
Barter, cotton, proposal for agreement with Germany rejected; EP.....	205
Baseball; admittance to professional baseball of E. C. Pitts, ex-convict, debated; EP.....	699
Basketball, build-up of. Left wing; S.....	357
Beals, Carleton
Apra movement, Peru; C.....	158
Censorship in Cuba; C.....	601
Mexican "socialism"; S.....	414
On Cuban utilities. E. Gruening; C.....	277
Beard, Charles A.; muckrakes bankers in relation to railroads; EP.....	375
Becker, Carl
Constitution, in support of; S.....	13
Belgium, devaluation expected; EP.....	375
Berg, H. M.
Coughlin forum; C.....	332

Bergner, Elisabeth, in Escape me never. J. W. Krutch; D..... 167
 Biddle, Francis B.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934..... 3
 See also Labor—National labor relations board
 Bilbo, Senator. R. G. Swing; S..... 123
 Bingham, Alfred M.
 Revolt in the middle west; C..... 387
 Bins, Nick, kidnapper. H. Christian; S..... 252; see also EP..... 346; C..... 446
 Birth control, and obscenity. R. G. Swing; S..... 621
 Bishop misbehaves, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 314
 Black fury. W. Troy; MP..... 491
 Black pit. J. W. Krutch; D..... 399
 Black shirts. See Fascism
 Bland-Copeland bill. See Ships
 Blizzard of 1888; Dt..... 331
 Bolivia. See Chaco war
 Bonus. See Veterans
 Booker, Vernon, disciplined for lecture on Russia; EP..... 171
 Books, American; E..... 498
 Reading, as indicated by calls for library books; E..... 90
 See also Novels
 Bordertown. W. Troy; MP..... 168
 Boston store. See Strikes
 Bourke-White, Margaret Dust storms; S..... 597
 Bowman, John G., defends Hearst; EP..... 291
 Boxing, contempt brought by M. Baer; EP..... 727
 Bradley, Francine
 Roumain, J., aid for; C..... 542
 Brazilian-American tariff agreement; EP..... 169 Breach of promise to marry, McNaboe bill barring actions passed; EP..... 431
 Break of hearts. W. Troy; MP..... 640
 Broadcasting. See Radio
 Bromley, Dorothy Dunbar
 Newspapers and child labor; S..... 131
 Brookings institution, report on NRA; EP..... 494
 Brooks, Lawrence G.
 On H. L. Mencken's article on liquor; C..... 16
 Broun, Heywood
 Communism; leadership lacking; S..... 445
 "Confessions of an opium eater"; S..... 251
 Coughlin, Father, speech in Madison square garden; S..... 659
 Domestic labor; S..... 631
 Equity (actors' association), insurgency in; S..... 572
 Green, William; S..... 362
 "Hand and brain"; S..... 279
 Ladies' auxiliary of labor organization; S..... 744
 Little yellow schoolhouse, the; S..... 308
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1934..... 3
 Pulitzer prizes; S..... 603
 Return to columns of The Nation; EP..... 171
 Strikes, "neutral" governmental agencies; S..... 391
 Supreme court decision in NRA case and labor; S..... 687
 See also Newspapers—American newspaper guild
 Budget. See United States—Finances
 Building-service strike; Dt..... 276
 Burke, Kenneth
 American writers' congress; S..... 571
 Lady Macbeth of Mzensk; M..... 230
 Burlew, Ebert K.; power in Interior department. P. W. Ward; S..... 679 Business
 Boom, gambling on; E..... 525
 Competition, control, move for; EP..... 170
 See also Labor
 Business advisory and planning council. P. W. Ward; S..... 473
 Business depression
 Public works administration, and recovery; E..... 349
 Recovery, reports on, show automobile industry as main factor; EP..... 261
 World trade conditions worse; EP..... 523
 Butler, Nicholas Murray. See Columbia university
 "Buy at home" (Eskimo industries fair). Low; Ct..... 352

C

California
 Anti-Japanese propaganda. S. Grafton; S..... 735
 Comedy. O. G. Villard; S..... 563
 Dictatorship. N. Mini; S..... 224; see also..... 481
 Imperial valley explored by J. Rorty; EP..... 291; S..... 575
 Labor, and growers. N. Mini; S..... 220; see also C..... 481
 Military protection against labor troubles advocated; EP..... 290
 Radicals, conviction of "conspiracy"; EP..... 401
 "Red"-baiting in. T. Clement; S..... 306
 Unionism, united defense front. H. Solow; C..... 160
 See also Communism

Call-Bulletin, San Francisco. See Newspapers
 Calles, Plutarco Elias. See Mexico
 Canada, and British empire; EP..... 114
 Cardenas, President Lazaro. See Mexico
 Cardinal Richelieu. W. Troy; MP..... 556
 Carl Mackley houses. See Housing
 Carnegie steel company. See Steel and iron Carr, Charlotte; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934..... 3
 Carter, Jean
 Schools for workers; C..... 602
 Cartoons. See Low
 Casa Italiana, Columbia university. See Fascism
 Cedar Crest college. See Hallett, W. N.
 Ceiling zero. J. W. Krutch; D..... 490
 Censorship, moving pictures
 League of decency white list; E..... 34
 Censorship, radio
 Information sought. M. F. Kassner; C..... 160
 Censorship, theater
 League of decency's white list; E..... 34
 Too late to die, play, censored in Philadelphia; E..... 470
 Chaco war, armistice announced; EP..... 698
 Arms embargo against Bolivia lifted, that against Paraguay extended; EP..... 262
 Chahar. See Chinese-Japanese relations
 Chain-letter madness. J. du Von; S..... 682
 Chamberlin, William Henry
 On Ukrainian famine; C..... 629; see also..... 296
 Chaos, critique of. B. Stolberg; S..... 505; see also EP..... 495
 Chapayev. W. Troy; MP..... 139; 288
 Chiang Kai-shek. See China
 Chicago Tribune; D. Darrah, correspondent in Rome, expelled by government; EP..... 725
 Chicago, university of; called "center of radical teaching"; EP..... 466
 Schuman, F. L., war against, by Hearst; C..... 480
 Child labor
 Amendment, defeated in New York; EP..... 467
 Amendment, progress through legislatures; EP..... 235
 Newspapers and child labor. D. D. Bromley; S..... 131; EP..... 142
 Children, mental tests as social reflectors. E. B. Mann; S..... 738
 China
 Chiang Kai-shek, co-operation with Japan; E..... 173
 Loan, international, British proposal for; EP..... 289
 Red army activity; EP..... 431
 "Red" trek from Kiangsi to Szechuan; EP..... 86
 See also Chinese-Japanese relations
 Chinese eastern railway. See Japanese-Russian relations
 Chinese-Japanese relations
 Chahar, invasion by Japanese; EP..... 141
 Chiang Kai-shek, co-operation with Japan; E..... 173
 Japan demands control of all north China; E..... 700
 Manchuria, invasion by Japan; communist propaganda blamed by Saito; EP..... 206
 Militarism, ascendancy in Japan in relations with China; EP..... 670
 North China bows to Japan. C. Martin; S..... 217
 North China, situation in; truce; EP..... 727
 Christian, Hans
 Bins, Nick, kidnapper; S..... 252; see also EP..... 346; C..... 446
 Citizens' water company; action menaces Everson, Pennsylvania; EP..... 170 Civil liberties. See Liberties, civil Civil liberties union. See American civil liberties union
 Clement, Travers
 "Red"-baiting in California; S..... 306
 Cleveland, Ohio, "red" scare; EP..... 235
 Cleveland (Ohio) newspaper guild. See Newspapers
 Cleveland, A.
 Free press in Cleveland; C..... 74
 Clive of India. W. Troy; MP..... 139
 Coal industry, "bootleg." L. Adamic; S..... 46
 Coal miners, American
 Illinois war goes on. L. Adamic; S..... 361
 Peanut hill. L. J. Gordon; S..... 270
 Relief for. J. Myers; C..... 45
 Strike against Glen Alden company; EP..... 31
 Striker jailed for disobeying injunction; EP..... 347
 Twenty-nine men in contempt. G. M. Williams; S..... 443
 United mine workers support Guffey bill to "stabilize" industry; EP..... 346
 Wage truce; EP..... 402
 Codes. See National industrial recovery act
 Coleman, E.
 On Townsend old-age pension plan; C..... 17
 Collective bargaining. See Labor unions

Colleges

Athletics. Left wing; S..... 538
 Militarism, attitude of college newspapers; EP..... 587
 Pacifism in, Literary Digest poll; EP..... 142
 Peace movements in disfavor with faculties; EP..... 559
 Preferences of graduates; E..... 646
 See also Academic freedom
 Colm, Gerhard
 European finance in world crisis; S..... 39
 Colt patent firearms company, labor case; E..... 470
 Labor conditions beyond government control; E..... 524
 See also Munitions of war
 Columbia river dam. See Grand Coulee dam
 Columbia university
 Academic freedom; President Butler explains; E..... 617
 Dismisses medical students for pacifism; EP..... 699; EP..... 671
 See also Fascism
 Commerce, department of; dismissal of E. Y. Mitchell; EP..... 725
 Common Sense, S. Rodman, editor, on T. Dreiser and the Jews; C..... 572
 Communism
 California, criminal-syndicalism trials; EP..... 59
 International, weakened by Soviets' agreements with other countries; EP..... 516
 Hearst, W. R., hunt for "reds"; EP..... 30
 Leadership lacking. H. Broun; S..... 445
 "Red"-baiting in California. T. Clement; S..... 306
 Red scare. S. Grafton; S..... 476
 Companies. See Corporations
 Company police..... 280
 Company unions. See Labor unions
 Competition, business. See Business
 Comptroller general, growing power; EP..... 642
 Conant, James Bryant; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934..... 3
 Congress
 And the president; EP..... 57
 Discovers the class struggle. M. S. Stewart; S..... 247
 Message to (which the president might read to it); E..... 4
 Senate deadlock over administration measures; EP..... 317
 Conscription. See War
 Conservative party, possibility; EP..... 697
 Constitution, New York state. See New York State
 Convicts. See Baseball
 Cooper, Gary; withdraws from Hollywood hussars. C. McWilliams; C..... 743; see also..... 623
 Copeland (Tugwell) bill. See Food and drug bill Corporations; corporation versus corporation. F. Lundberg; S..... 478
 Salaries. O. G. Villard; S..... 499
 Costigan-Warner bill. See Lynchings
 Cotton
 Barter proposal, for agreement with Germany, rejected; EP..... 205
 Growers, plight of; E..... 525
 Stability of world production sought; EP..... 235
 Cotton-textiles industry
 Crisis, and Agricultural adjustment administration; E..... 496
 Labor; North Carolina workers' arrest. W. T. Couch and J. O. Bailey; S..... 483; see also C..... 482
 Strike, possibility; EP..... 402
 Strikes, ruling in Ninety-six cotton mill case; EP..... 465
 Couch, W. T., and J. O. Bailey
 North Carolina textile workers' arrest; S..... 483; see also C..... 482
 Coughlin, Father
 II. The phase of action. R. G. Swing; S..... 9
 Build-up with Senator Long. R. G. S.; S..... 325
 Forum. H. M. Berg; C..... 332
 League for social justice at Detroit meeting of National farm holiday association; EP..... 521
 Madison square garden speech. H. Broun; S..... 659; E..... 644
 Supports government ownership of stock of federal reserve banks; EP..... 614
 Country and city life; Dt..... 101
 Criminal syndicalism. See Communism
 Crise est finie, la. W. Troy; MP..... 372
 Critique of chaos. B. Stolberg; S..... 505; see also EP..... 495 Crop restriction. See Agriculture
 Cuba
 Censorship. C. Beals; C..... 601
 Chaos, as reported by Cuban commission of Foreign policy association; EP..... 143
 Fonseca case; EP..... 403
 Revolution, outbreak; EP..... 317
 Revolt, suppression; EP..... 345
 Terror. R. Grau San Martin; S..... 381

- Cuban-American relations; E..... 433
 Cuban utilities. E. Gruening; C..... 277
 Currency
 Belga devaluation expected; EP..... 375
 Franc, assault on, and politics; EP..... 642
 Franc, in political crisis; E..... 673
 German; inflation feared; EP..... 698
 Gold-clause case, supreme court decision awaited; EP..... 85
 Gold clause, supreme court and devaluation. H. Hazlitt; S..... 126
 Gold clause; supreme court ruling on gold clause in private and government obligations; EP..... 233; E..... 238
 Inflation by unbalanced budget; EP..... 57
 Inflation, Patman bill, passage of. R. G. S.; S..... 383
 Stabilization by international action; EP 86
 Stabilization, United States and international; E..... 617
 Sterling, decline in; EP..... 290
 Cutting, Senator Bronson
 Election to be challenged. R. G. S.; S... 127
 Death; EP..... 557
 Loss to Senate. O. G. Villard; S..... 591
 Cutrer, Jesse H.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934..... 3
 Czecho-Slovakia; election, behind the; E.... 645
 Nazi win seats in Parliament; EP..... 614
- D
- Dalton, Hugh
 Who will pay for the next war? S..... 154
 Dam, Columbia river. See Grand Coulee dam
 Damrosch, Walter; fiftieth anniversary as conductor; EP..... 431
 Dance, the; ballet, "problems" of; American ballet. K. Burke; S..... 343
 Dancers, some American. L. Kirstein; S..... 258; see also C..... 333
 Danube basin pact, proposed, to be discussed at Rome. M. W. Fodor; S..... 651
 Danzig, election; EP..... 430
 Darrah, David. See Chicago Tribune
 Daughters of the American revolution; investigate flags on public buildings; EP..... 347
 David Copperfield. W. Troy; MP..... 168
 Davidson, C.
 On review of Lost horizon; C..... 222; see also..... 137
 Deal, new. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
 Decker, Caroline
 California workers undefeated; C... 481; see also..... 224
 Delaware valley utilities company; action menaces Everson, Pennsylvania; EP... 170
 De luxe. J. W. Krutch; D..... 342
 Demagogues, leading, possibility of uniting; EP..... 403
 Democracy; vote, low-brow; E..... 266
 Democratic party; regularity in 1936. R. G. S.; S..... 127
 Denmark; socialist rule in; EP..... 467
 Department of commerce. See Commerce, department of Department of labor. See Labor, department of Department of superintendence, National education association, discussion of academic freedom; E..... 293
 Deportations. See Strachey, J.
 Depression. See Business depression
 Detroit; election of M. Sugar urged. N. J. Bicknell; C..... 182
 see also Automobiles
 Detzer, Dorothy; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934..... 3
 Deutsch, Bernard S.; refuses to attend Columbia commencement; EP..... 699
 Devil is a woman, the. W. Troy; MP..... 640
 Diets. See Agriculture
 Dill, Senator Clarence C.
 Grand Coulee, relations with; C... 446; see also..... 329
 Dionne quintuplets' birthday. L. B. Harts-horn; S..... 708
 Disarmament. See Armament limitation and disarmament
 Disney cartoons. W. Troy; MP..... 556
 Disputes, labor. See Strikes
 Distant shore, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 314
 Divine, Father. C. McKay; S..... 151
 Dobuans; Dt..... 182
 Domestic labor. See Labor
 Dominant sex, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 463
 Dominican-American relations; E..... 433
 Don Quixote. W. Troy; MP..... 27
 Drachler, Jacob
 Seeks radical verse; C..... 630
 Drama. See Theater, the; Krutch, J. W.; M., M.
 Drama league travel bureau scholarship. H. Pairtch; C..... 509
 Drifter, the; his spelling of Euripides. C. Niemeyer; C..... 73
 Drinking. See Alcoholic liquors
 Dreiser, Theodore, and anti-semitism. H. Hapgood; S.... 436; C.... 572; EP... 523
- Drug and food bill. See Food and drug bill
 Duel, Robert H.
 Schools, public; C..... 18
 Duncel bill. See Michigan
 Dust storms. M. Bourke-White; S..... 597 du Von, Jay
 Chain-letter madness; S..... 682
- E
- Earhart, Amelia, flight across Pacific ballyhoo for Hawaiian sugar planters; E... 118; see also S..... 121; correction..... 207
 Earl Carroll's sketch book. J. W. Krutch; D..... 724
 Eastern Europe. See Europe
 Economics; critique of chaos. B. Stolberg; S..... 505; see also EP..... 495
 Eden, Sir Anthony, in Moscow. Low; Ct... 472
 Visit to Warsaw; EP..... 401
 Education, adult. I. Freuder; C..... 389
 Election, presidential, of 1936, looking toward. R. G. Swing; S..... 568
 Electric auto-lite company; workers carry on 77; see also C..... 183
 Electricity, rates. See New York City; Public utilities
 Eliot, T. S., as critic. L. Kronenberger; S. 452
 England. See Great Britain
 English language; London Punch idea of American slang; E..... 562
 Epstein, Abraham
 Life insurance "twisting"; C..... 710; see also..... 592, 684, 710
 Equity (actors' association). See Actors' equity association
 Ericson, E. E.
 North Carolina textile workers' defense; C..... 482; see also..... 483
 Escape me never. J. W. Krutch; D..... 167
 Escape me never. W. Troy; MP..... 668
 Ethiopia. See Abyssinia; Abyssinian-Italian relations
- Europe
- British-Polish conversations at Warsaw; EP..... 401
 British-Russian conversations at Moscow; EP..... 401
 Eastern, steps toward peace; EP..... 262
 Eastern front, quiet on. Low; Ct..... 500
 Finance in the world crisis. G. Colm; S..... 39
 Rome agreement between France and Italy; E..... 62
 Stresa conference, good news from; E... 468
 Stresa conference on security; EP..... 429
 Stresa conference, situation after, EP... 494
 See also Danube basin; War
 European war; Versailles treaty, cause and effect. Low; Ct..... 408
 Evergreen. W. Troy; MP..... 112
 Everson, Pennsylvania; menaced by action of utility company; EP..... 170
- F
- Falstaff, Jake
 Serenade; P..... 486
 Family tradition; Dt..... 220
 Farm holiday association. See National farm holiday association Farm loans. See Loans, farm Farming. See Agriculture
 Fascism
 At Casa italiana, Columbia university; E... 117; C... 129; C... 130; EP... 234; E..... 377; C..... 388; C..... 686
 "Gag" bills, protest against. H. F. Ward, A. G. Hays and R. Baldwin; C..... 601
 Gag legislation in Michigan. A. B. Magil; S..... 598
 Hollywood. C. McWilliams; S..... 623; see also C..... 743
 Patriotism dons black shirt. R. G. Swing; S..... 409
 Pennsylvania. A. Schechter; S..... 713
 Federal emergency relief administration; lecturer, V. Booker, disciplined for talk on Russia; EP..... 171
 Federal reserve system. See Banks
 Ferrero, Guglielmo; not asked to lecture at Casa italiana; C..... 130
 Finance, public
 VIII. European finance in the world crisis. G. Colm; S..... 39
 IX. Who will pay for the next war? H. Dalton; S..... 154
 X. Tax program for the future. P. Studenski; S..... 274
 Taxation, concrete proposals for; E... 264
 Finances, United States. See United States
 Fineman, Irving
 For a child; P..... 705
 Fischer, Jack
 Saar election; S..... 96
 Fischer, Louis
 Behind the Kirov executions; S..... 529, 566
 "Famine" in Ukraine as seen by Hearst writer; S..... 296; see also C..... 629
- Franco-soviet alliance; S..... 704
 Letter in reply to W. H. Chamberlain; C..... 629
 Moscow is a dynamo; S..... 326
 Russia abolishes bread cards; S..... 11
 Soviet-American break; S..... 385
 Flags on public buildings, investigated by D. A. R.; EP..... 347
 Florida, flamboyant. O. G. Villard; S..... 295
 Flowers of the forest. J. W. Krutch; D.... 490
 Fly away home. M. M.; D..... 203
 Flynn, John T., plan for taking profit out of war; E..... 377
 Fodor, M. W.
 Rome conference on proposed Danubian pact; S..... 651
 Fogarty, J. F.
 North American company, defense; C..... 655; see also..... 440
 Fonseca, Manuel, saved from execution; EP 403
 Food and drug bill
 Copeland bill, new, introduced; EP..... 114
 Copeland bill passed by senate; EP..... 670
 Hearing, public. R. G. S.; S..... 301
 Ford, Leslie
 Earhart flight and sugar; S... 121; see also E..... 118, and correction..... 207
 Ford motor car company; wage increase and reactionary labor policy; EP..... 643
 Foreign policy association; Cuban commission report on conditions in Cuba; EP..... 143 Foreign trade. See Trade, foreign Fortune; article which won place on The Nation's honor roll to be credited to E. Hodgins. A. MacLeish; C..... 103
 Editorial staff; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934..... 3
 Franc. See Currency
 France
 Economic conditions worse; EP..... 1
 Finances and politics; EP..... 642
 Government, Laval forms cabinet; EP... 698
 Hitler and France, and the League of nations. Low; Ct..... 8
 Political crisis; E..... 673
 See also Franco-Italian relations; Franco-Russian relations
 Franco-Italian relations; agreement over Abyssinia; E..... 89
 Rome agreement; EP..... 62
 Franco-Russian relations; agreement, negotiations held up; EP..... 494
 Alliance. L. Fischer; S..... 704
 Treaty of mutual assistance; EP..... 559
 Freedom, menaced; EP..... 207
 Freedom, academic. See Academic freedom
 Freedom of the press
 Cleveland, Ohio, suppression of news of signing of guild contract. A. Cleveland; C..... 74
 Italy bars New York Times, and the Chicago correspondent; EP..... 725
 Long, Senator, passes advertising taxation bill in Louisiana; EP..... 373
 Freedom of speech
 League for industrial democracy finds difficulty in staging lectures; EP..... 291
 Nearing, S., on lecture tour experiences; C..... 159
 Threat against, widespread; EP..... 207
 Freuder, Irene
 Adult education; C..... 389
 Friends of German democracy, protest against misuse of name of C. Schurz. H. Hilbers and K. Kluge; C..... 360
- G
- "Gag" bills, protest against. H. F. Ward, A. G. Hays and R. Baldwin; C..... 601
 Gallup, New Mexico, kidnapping of R. Minor and D. Levinson; E... 561; C..... 600
 Riot. K. Gay; S..... 511
 Gannett newspapers, Maine, and new destroyers; EP..... 430
 Garrison, Lloyd K.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934..... 3
 Gatti-Casazza, Giulio, retirement; EP..... 495
 Gay, Katherine
 Gallup, New Mexico, riot; S..... 511
 General motors corporation. See Automobiles
 George V., king; "God save the king" played in Moscow; EP..... 403
 Jubilee; E..... 561
 German-Russian relations. O. G. Villard; S. 435
 Germans in America; Nazi activity. C. Angoff; S.... 501, 531; correction.... 602
 Germany
 Confusion in; E..... 5
 Finances; fear of inflation grows; EP... 698
 Göring, Hermann Wilhelm, guarding of; EP..... 171
 Hitler after the Saar. O. G. Villard; S. 175
 Hitler, after two years of; E..... 145
 Hitler and France, and the League of nations. Low; Ct..... 8
 Hitler and Moscow. O. G. Villard; S... 435
 Hitler speech on rearmament; E..... 645
 Hitler, underground movement against. J. M. Yard; C..... 18

- Hitlerites on Hitlerism. Compiled by J. Gunther 149
 Imperialism. Low; Ct. 620
 Jews. See Jews
 Rearmament; Europe's attitude; E. 376
 Rearmament decree liquidates Versailles; E. 348
 Rearmament program, Hitler's, reaction to; EP 345
 Reply to Anglo-French note on rearmament and collective security; EP 233
 See also Armaments; Currency
 Ghostwriters; EP 207
 Giannini, A. P., fights Morgan. S. G. Ward; S. 737
 Gilbert, Mort and E. A.
 Insurance is confiscation; C. 710
 Life insurance, honesty; S. 592; see also C. 684
 Glen Alden coal company. See Coal miners, American Gold. See Currency
 Gold mine strike. See Mines
 Goldman, Emma, and W. R. Hearst; use made by Hearst of part of article in American Mercury. Letter by E. Goldman, with comment by C. Angoff.... 541
 Gordon, Leland J.
 Peanut hill; S. 270
 Göring, Hermann Wilhelm; guarding of; EP 171
 Government works. See Unemployment relief Grafton, Samuel
 Army runs amuck; S. 733
 Red scare; S. 476
 Grand coulee dam. J. Rorty; S. 329; see also C. 446
 Granger, L. B.
 On B. Stolberg and black chauvinism; C. 628; see also 570
 Gras, André, and Harold Robins; get new trial after railroading to prison; funds needed. F. Morrow; C. 74
 "Grass roots" convention. See Republican party
 Grau San Martin, Ramon
 Cuban terror, the; S. 381
 Great Britain
 Lloyd George's new deal. H. J. Laski; S. 219
 MacDonald retirement; E. 701
 Politics; Hitler over England. H. J. Laski; S. 653
 Politics; Lloyd George's call for a new deal; EP 142
 Social security in. R. G. Swing; S. 179
 See also Currency
 Greece, revolt against establishment of military dictatorship; EP 289; EP 318
 Green, William H. Brown; S. 362
 Grilli, Marcel F.
 Resignation from Graduate club of Italian studies, Columbia university, reason for; C. 686; see also E. 377
 Salvemini and Casa italiana at Columbia university; C. 129; see also E. 117
 Group theater, the; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934..... 3
 Gruening, Ernest
 Cuban utilities; C. 277
 Gruening, Martha
 Lynching; S. 539
 Guffey bill. See Coal miners, American Gunther, John
 Hitlerites on Hitlerism; compilation from Nazi press 149
- H
- Haggin, B. H.
 Merger of Metropolitan opera association and Philharmonic-symphony orchestra, proposed; S. 100
 Haiti
 Dictatorship established; EP 374
 Roumain, J., jailed for work for Negro liberation. L. Hughes; C. 18; aid for Roumain. F. Bradley; C. 542
 Vincent, President, threatens dictatorship; EP 262
 Haitian-American relations; E. 433
 Hallett, Winslow L.; dismissal from Cedar Crest college; EP 671
 Hamlet, desire to act, and write about play; E. 729
 Quotation from; Dt. 72
 Hapgood, Hutchins
 Dreiser, T., and anti-semitism; S. 436; EP 523; C. 572; C. 711
 Hardy, Thomas, poem on, by E. A. Robinson. C. Weber; C. 508
 Harlem. See Negroes
 Harris, Charles, reprieve in murder of M. Henry; EP 283
 Harrison bill. See Veterans
 Hartshorn, Lee B.
 Quintuplets entertain; S. 708
 Haskell, Douglas
 Art, industrial; A. 554
 Hauptmann, Bruno Richard. See Lindbergh, C. A.
- Hawaiian islands
Atlantic Monthly article on relations with United States; EP 171
 Earhart flight and sugar. L. Ford; S. 121; see also E. 118, and correction 207
 Propaganda for; E. 146; see also EP 207
 Hays, Arthur Garfield
 "Gag" bill, protest against; C. 601
 Hazlitt, Henry
 Supreme court and the gold clause; S. 126
 Health insurance. See Medicine, socialization of Hearst, William Randolph
 And Emma Goldman; use made by Hearst of part of article in American Mercury. Letter by E. Goldman, with comment by C. Angoff..... 541
 Defended by J. G. Bowman; EP 291
 Denounced; EP 263
 Explains stand for "Americanism and genuine democracy"; EP 493
 Hunt for "reds"; EP 30
 War on F. L. Schuman; C. 480
 See also Russia
 Henry, "Milsie." See Harris, C.
 Henry street settlement needs books. B. Miller; C. 278
 Herling, John
 Arkansas share-croppers; S. 419; see also EP 403
 Herndon, Angelo
 On his own case; C. 541
 Supreme court declines to interfere; EP 613
 Herre, Albert W.
 Japanese mandates; C, with editorial comment, 158; see also EP 1
 Herrmann, Eva
 Huey; Ct. 92
 Hicks, Granville, dismissal by Rensselaer polytechnic institute; EP 670
 Alumni of institute uphold expulsion; EP 726
 Hilbers, Henry, and K. Kluge
 Schurz, C., misuse of name; C. 360
 Hill, Arthur D.
 Holmes, Justice, work of; C. 359
 Hillman, Sidney; work for labor. R. G. S.; S. 383
 Hirota, Premier. See Japan
 Hitler, Adolph. See Germany; Saar
 Hodgins, Eric. See Fortune
 Holding companies, abolition proposed; E. 350
 And investors. A. W. May; S. 440; see also C. 630; C. 655
 Hollywood, California. See Moving pictures
 Hollywood fascism. C. McWilliams; S. 623; letter by McWilliams 743
 Holmes, Justice Oliver Wendell, death. O. G. Villard; S. 323
 Letters sought. J. G. Palfrey; C. 602
 Work of. A. D. Hill; C. 359
 Honor roll, The Nation, for 1934..... 3
 Hoover, Herbert; message to Republican party; EP 374
 Hopkins, Harry L., dirge for. F. W. Ward; S. 594
 Hostetter, J. C.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934 3
 Houghton Mifflin company, literary fellowships offered 158
 House, prefabricated; Dt. 386
 Housework. See Labor
 Housing
 Automobiles and housing. C. Willson; C. 508
 Mackley houses, Philadelphia, opened; EP 58; see also C. 183
 Public works program, failure of; E. 350
 Hughes, Langston
 Roumain, Jacques jailing for work for Negro liberation in Haiti; C. 18
 See also Roumain, J.
 Hurdy-gurdys banished from New York; EP 403
 Hyde, Maxwell
 On proposed new party; C. 17
 Hyson, Herbert
 On O. G. Villard's article on executions in Russia; C. 102
- I
- Ickes, Secretary Harold LeClair
 Compromise in war with R. Moses; EP 317
 Defense of civil liberties; EP 493
 Enforcement of Section 7-a by government boycott 633
 Moses, R., opposition to; EP 58
 Storm over reprint of Nation article on Virgin islands of the United States; E. 143
 Surrender to bureaucracy. P. W. Ward; S. 679
 Troubles in office, and controversy with R. Moses. R. G. S.; S. 127
 Illinois "rioting," prosecutions for 163
 Treason charges dropped; EP 87
 See also Unemployment relief
 Illinois miners. See Coal miners, American Il Progresso. See Newspapers
 Imperial valley. See California
- Independent printing employers. See Printers
 India; report on. H. J. Laski; S. 14
 Indians, American, Oklahoma, bill for, tabled; EP 698
 Policy, new, fight on. R. G. S.; S. 479
 Industry and labor, articles on. See Labor and industry
 Inflation. See Currency
 Informer, the. W. Troy; MP 610
 Injunctions; Glen Alden coal company strikers jailed for disobeying injunction; EP 347
 See also Newspapers
 Insurance, life; honesty. M. and E. A. Gilbert; S. 592; C. 684; letter by Gilberts 710
 "Twisting" need for. A. Epstein; C. 710; see also 592; C. 684; C. 710 Insurance, health. See Medicine, socialization of Insurance, social Administration bill revised; EP 373
 British. R. G. Swing; S. 179
 In soviet Russia. K. Barnes; S. 302
 Lunden unemployment and social insurance bill reported favorably; EP 318
 Wagner-Lewis bill, amended; shortcomings; E. 433
 Insurance, unemployment. See Unemployment
 Intelligence tests. See Mental tests
 Interests, vested. O. G. Villard; S. 63
 International settlements. See Trade, foreign Iron. See Steel and iron
 Italian-Abyssinian relations. See Abyssinian-Italian dispute
 Italian house (Casa italiana). See Fascism
 Italy; bars New York Times, and Chicago correspondent; EP 726
 See also Abyssinian-Italian dispute; Franco-Italian relations
Item-Tribune, New Orleans. See Newspapers
 Interior, department of; Burlew, E. K., power in department. P. W. Ward; S. 679
 Ives law. See New York state
- J
- Jacob, Berthold, silencing. L. Lore; S. 439
 Japan
 Hirota speech on foreign relations; EP 114
 Mandate islands, fortification of. A. W. Herre; C, with editorial comment.... 1
 158; see also EP 467
 Militaristic-nationalist victory; EP 17
 War expenditures. Captain T. Yamaguchi; C, with editorial comment.... 17
 See also Armament limitation and disarmament; Chinese-Japanese relations; Japanese in the United States; Japanese-American relations; Japanese-Russian relations
 Japanese-American relations
 Dangers in arming against Japan; E. 292
 Maneuvers, American; EP 642
 Maneuvers, American, to be held off coast of Japan; EP 29
 Maneuvers, American, effect on Japan; EP 586
 Maneuvers, naval, United States, criticized by Japanese newspapers; EP 494
 War, drift toward. O. G. Villard; S. 407
 Japanese-Chinese relations. See Chinese-Japanese relations
 Japanese in the United States; "yellow peril" again. C. McWilliams; S. 735
 Japanese-Russian relations
 Chinese eastern railway, sale, proposed, to Manchoukuo; EP 318
 Chinese eastern railway sale removes friction; EP 345
 Jennings, Dean S. See Newspapers
 Jews
 Anti-semitism, German; revival. W. Zukerman; S. 356
 Anti-semitism on Swedish-American liner, Kungsholm. "Traveler"; C. 333; denied, C. 743
 Is Dreiser anti-semitic? H. Hapgood; S. 436; EP 523; C. 572; C. 711
 Nazi Jew-baiting in America. C. Angoff; S. 501, 531; correction 602
 Johnson, General Hugh S., articles, proposed, in Saturday Evening Post bring libel suit threat from D. Richberg; EP 31
 Controversy with Senator Long and Father Coughlin. R. G. S.; S. 325
 Johnson, Wayne, possible district attorney, New York; EP 614 Journalism. See Newspapers
 Journey by night. J. W. Krutch; D. 517
- K
- K., H.
 White-collar strike, Milwaukee; S. 49
 Kain, Theodore
 On cash value of life insurance policies; C. 684; see also 592, 710

- Kandell, Leonard S.
On anti-semitism, alleged, on steamship
Kungsholm; C....743; see also C.... 333
- Kapitzka, Peter, stays home; E..... 526
- Kassner, Minna F.
Radio censorship, survey; information sought; C 160
- Keating, Isabelle
Radio invades journalism; S..... 677
- Keller, Philip E.
Seeks biographical data on S. N. Patten; C 183
- Kidnapping. See Gallup, New Mexico
- Kind lady. J. W. Krutch; D..... 554
- Kirov, Serge. See Russia
- Kirstein, Lincoln
Some American dancers; S.....258;
see also C..... 333
- Klein, S.; labor trouble; EP..... 2
- Kluge, Karl, and H. Hilbers
Schurz, C., misuse of name; C..... 360
- Knapp, George L.
Tobacco greed; S..... 544
- Kronenberger, Louis
Eliot, T. S., as critic; S..... 452
- Krutch, Joseph Wood
Academic freedom, views on; S..... 449
Accent on youth; D..... 83
Awake and sing; D..... 314
Bishop misbehaves, the; D..... 314
Black pit; D 399
Ceiling zero; D..... 490
Correspondence with R. Baldwin on civil and economic liberties in Russia; C. 103
De luxe; D 342
Distant shore, the; D..... 314
Dominant sex, the; D..... 463
Drama, holiday suggestions; D..... 27
Earl Carroll's sketch book; D..... 724
Escape me never; D..... 167
Flowers of the forest; D..... 490
Journey by night; D..... 517
Kind lady; D..... 554
Noah; D 259
Novels; worth reading? S..... 188
Ode to liberty; D 55
Old maid, the; D..... 167
Old maid, the, as Pulitzer prize play;
D 610
Panic; D 369
Parade; D 666
Petrified forest, the; D..... 111
Petticoat fever; D 342
Prisoners of war; D..... 203
Rain from heaven; D..... 55
Romeo and Juliet; D..... 55
Sifton, P., views on Theater guild; C
.....305; see also 250
Simpleton of the unexpected isles, the;
D 286
Something gay; D 584
Thumbs up; D 82
Till the day I die; D..... 427
To see ourselves; D..... 584
Waiting for Letty; D..... 427
- Kungsholm, steamship. See Jews
- Kurke, Kenneth
Ballet, "problems" of; S..... 343
- Kykunkor. M. M.; D..... 55
- L
- Laas, William M.
On reviews of Lost horizon and Lightship; C.....222; see also 137
- Labor
Automobiles. See Automobiles
California, attitude toward growers. N.
Mini; S.....220; see also 481
California, in Imperial valley. J. Rorty;
S 575
Child. See Child labor
Codes and labor standards..... 309
Colt patent firearms company case; E.. 470
Disputes. See Strikes
Domestic. H. Broun; S..... 631
Forced, in Michigan?..... 633
"Hand and brain." H. Broun; S..... 279
Hillman, S., work of. R. G. S.; S..... 383
Law, national, proposed by Senator
Wagner; E 265
Liberals, labor and. H. Broun; S..... 508
"Made work," menace of. R. A. Lester;
S 390
Munitions of war, conditions in factories beyond government control; E..... 524
National labor relations board:
Jennings case; president rebukes
Chairman Biddle of Board; E..... 144
Modifications in law proposed by Senator Wagner; E 265
Report 280
Roosevelt letter to Chairman Biddle;
D. Richberg misinforms president.
R. G. S.;.....156; see also correction, 222, and E..... 144
Wagner bill, changes; EP..... 346
Wagner bill and the NRA; E..... 616
Wagner bill, supported and attacked;
E 322
- Perkins, Secretary, work of. P. W.
Ward; S 353
- Prevailing wage rate, in work-relief bill, chances for; EP 346
- Schools for. J. Carter; C..... 602
- Steel and iron; "mediation." R. M.
Stein; S 19
- Wages, depressed, in work relief, EP.. 261
- Welfare, Nation's index. 560; E.....590; 688
"White-collar" workers. H. Broun; S.. 279
See also Labor unions
- Labor and industry.....19, 46, 75, 104, 131,
161, 184, 223, 251, 279, 306, 334, 361,
390, 419, 483, 510, 543, 574, 603, 631,
659, 687, 712, 744.
- Labor board, national. See Labor
- Labor, department of, new mansion. N. R.
A.; C 333
- Labor unions
Bargaining, collective:
Control by business, move for; EP.. 170
In automobile industry. L. Wolman and W. M. Leiserson; S... 297 Coal miners. See Coal miners, American rubber companies' elections 50
Company unions:
New York telephone company organization and proposed wage cut; EP 431
Stratagem; E 432
Texas Company ordered to dissolve union 77
Conference of coal, automobile, glass, and aluminum workers called; EP 58
Electric auto-lite company's workers carry on, 77; see also C..... 183
Ladies' auxiliary. H. Broun; S..... 744
Movement needed; E 589
Nation, The, replies to New York Times comment on Index of labor welfare; E 590
Rubber industry. L. Adamic; S..... 334
Steel. See Steel and iron
- Ladies' auxiliary of labor organization. H.
Broun; S 744
- Lady Macbeth of Mzensk. K. Burke; M... 230
- La Follette, Philip Fox; on The Nation's
honor roll for 1934..... 3
Talk with. L. Adamic; S..... 242
- La Follette, Robert M.; on The Nation's
honor roll for 1934..... 3
- La Follettes. See Wisconsin
- LaGuardia, Mayor Fiorello H. See New York city
- Language, American; London Punch idea of American slang; E..... 562
- Laski, Harold J.
Hitler over England; S..... 653
India, report on; S..... 14
Lloyd George's new deal; S..... 219
- Latin America, United States relations with;
E 433
- Lawrence, Thomas E., death. O. G. Villard;
S 703
- League for industrial democracy; finds difficulty in staging lectures; EP..... 291
- League for social justice. See Coughlin, Father
- League of American writers. See Authors
- League of decency; crusade against nudism; E 62
See also Censorship, moving pictures;
Censorship, theater
- League of nations
Chaco war, firm stand on; EP..... 262
Convalescence. Low; Ct..... 148
Hitler and France, and the league. Low;
Ct 8
Mussolini and the league. Low; Ct.... 324
See also Abyssinian-Italian dispute
- League of women voters gets W. Wilson foundation award; EP..... 587
- Ledger, Newark. See Newspapers
- Left wing
Basketball; S 357
College athletics; S 538
Men who make America's gods; S, 245;
see also C 305
- Leiserson, W. M.
Labor relations in automobile industry; S 298
- Les misérables. W. Troy; MP..... 556
- Lester, G. W. See Louisiana
- Lester, Richard A.
"Made work"; S 390
Let 'em have it. W. Troy; MP..... 694
Lettuce—with American dressing. J. Rorty; S 575
Leviathan, steamship, farewell to; E..... 378
Laying up; EP 725
- Levinson, David
Gallup kidnapping; C..... 600
See also Gallup, New Mexico
- Libel; suit withdrawn by General MacArthur;
EP 2
- Liberal party, new. See Party, new
- Liberals and labor. H. Broun; S 510
- Liberties, civil, defended by Secretary Ickes;
EP 493
- Life insurance. See Insurance, life
- Lindbergh, Charles Augustus; Hauptmann,
B. R., conviction; EP 234
Hauptmann trial. M. Marshall; S 93
- Liliom. W. Troy; MP..... 371
- Lindsay, Judge Ben; elected judge in California. P. Musgrave; C 45
- Linton, M. A.
On life insurance; C, 685; see also.... 592
- Lippmann, Walter, on newspapermen's code, and wages; EP 115
- Liquors, alcoholic. See Alcoholic liquors
- Literary Digest; poll on pacifism in colleges;
EP 142
- Literary fellowships offered by Houghton Mifflin company 158
- Lives of a Bengal lancer. W. Troy; MP... 139
- Livesey, Mary E.
Farm loans; C 44
- Lloyd George, David. Low; Ct..... 212
See also Great Britain
- Lloyd, Henry Demarest; biographical material sought. C. L. Strobell; C 602
- Loans, farm; bankers' attitude toward. M. E.
Livesey; C 44
- London Times—and others. O. G. Villard; S 211
- Russian news; EP 59
- Long, Senator Huey
Bid for presidency; EP 86
Cartoon. E. Herrmann; Ct..... 92
III. Bid for national power. R. G.
Swing; S 98
Build-up with Father Coughlin. R. G.
S.; S 325
Filibuster against NRA; EP 726
Newspaper advertising taxation bill; EP 373
See also Louisiana
- Lore, Ludwig
Jacob, B., silencing; S 439
- Louisiana
Federal loans, and Senator Long; EP.. 493
Long, H., in his kingdom. R. G.
Swing; S 36
Long, dictatorship; defiance by G. W.
Lester; EP 2
See also Freedom of the press
- Low (cartoonist)
Air defenses, and Hitler's plans 240
"Buy at home" (Eskimo industries fair) 352
Eden, A., in Moscow..... 472
Europe; eastern front, quiet on 500
Hitler and France, and the League of nations 8
Imperialism, German 620
League of nations, convalescence 148
Lloyd George 212
Music, "Aryan" 176
Mussolini and the league..... 324
Mussolini, on way to Abyssinia..... 676
Peace pact missions..... 380
Roosevelt and big business 120
Roosevelt, "new deal" and money interests 648
Versailles treaty, cause and effect 408
War, spring dreams 528
- Lundberg, Ferdinand
Corporation versus corporation; S 478
- Lundeen bill. See Insurance, social; Social security; Unemployment
- Lynchings
Anti-lynching bill introduced into senate;
EP 113
Costigan-Warner bill, southern filibuster against; EP 494
Florida, Neal case; EP 113
How not to stop; Wagner-Costigan bill.
W. Seagle; S 626
Lawlessness, southern. M. Gruening; S 539
Shelbyville, Tennessee, law upheld; EP. 2
- M
- M., M.
Fly away home; D..... 203
Kykunkor; D 55
Recruits; D 342
- MacArthur, General Douglas; withdraws suit for libel; EP..... 2
See also Militarism
- MacDonald, J. Ramsay, retirement; E..... 701
- Mackley, Carl, houses. See Housing
- Macklin, Egbert Chalmers
On H. L. Mencken's article on liquor; C 16
- MacLeish, Archibald
Fortune and The Nation's honor roll; C. 103
Panic, play in verse, first section; S.... 281
Play, Panic. J. W. Krutch; D..... 369
- Magil, A. B.
Gag legislation in Michigan; S..... 598
- Mail contracts, report on, by Postmaster general Farley; EP..... 641
- Manchuria. See Chinese-Japanese relations
- Maneuvers, United States. See Japanese-American relations
- Mann, Edna Brand
Mental tests as social reflectors; S..... 738
- Mansbridge, F. R.
Quiller-Couch, Sir Arthur, not dead;
C.....482; see also..... 398
March of time, the. W. Troy; MP.... 232
- Marine, merchant. See Ships
- Marlingham, John M.
NRA, reorganization; C..... 417

- Marsh, Benjamin C.
Share-croppers and Bankhead bill; C
.....482; see also EP..... 319
- Marshall, Margaret
Hauptmann trial; S 93
- Martin, Charles
North China bows to Japan; S..... 217
- Masaryk, President, gets W. Wilson foundation medal; EP..... 587
- May, A. Wilfred
Holding companies and investors; S
.....440; see also C..... 655
- Replies to letter by W. S. Wassermann;
C 630
- McCall bill. See Nudism
- McCarl, John Raymond, bureaucrat. P. W.
Ward; S 679
- Growing power; EP..... 642
- McCauley, G. V.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934 3
- McIntosh, Leonard Walter. See Virgin islands of the United States
- McKay, Claude
Divine, Father; S 151
- Harlem runs wild; S..... 382
- McNaboe bill passed; EP..... 431
- McSwain bill. See War
- McWilliams, Carey
Anti-Japanese propaganda; S..... 735
- Hollywood fascism; S.....623; letter
by McWilliams 743
- Medicine, socialization of American medical association approves budgeting for medical care; opposes health insurance; EP..... 727
- Health insurance, supported by California medical association; E..... 405
- State insurance against sickness opposed by Medical society of the state of
New York; EP..... 615
- Medical society of the state of New York.
See Medicine, socialization of
- Mellon, Andrew W., dodging taxes with.
T. O. Shepard; S..... 564
- Mencken, H. L., reply to, on alcoholic liquors.
O. G. Villard; S.....35; see also C..... 72
- Some statistics on alcohol for. E. Tilton, and others; C..... 16
- Men of tomorrow. W. Troy; MP..... 520
- Mental tests as social reflectors. E. B.
Mann; S 738
- Merchant marine. See Ships
- Metropolitan opera association; Gatti-Casazza,
G., retirement; EP..... 495
- See also Music
- Mexico, Cardenas victory over Calles; EP..... 726
- "Socialism." C. Beals; S..... 414
- Michigan
Dunkel bill, aimed at radicalism, passed; EP..... 643
- Gag legislation, Dunkel bill. A. B.
Magil; S 598
- Labor, forced? 633
- Mickey mouse. W. Troy; MP..... 556
- Middle west. See West, middle
- Mighty Barnum, the. W. Troy; MP..... 112
- Militarism
Army, United States, runs amuck. S.
Grafton; S.....723; see also EP..... 205
- College newspapers' attitude; EP..... 587
- Further militarization, for American youth, advocated by General MacArthur; EP..... 290
- Milk trust, existence demonstrated; EP..... 206
- Millay, Edna St. Vincent; on The Nation's
honor roll for 1934 3
- Miller, Benjamin
Books wanted for Henry street settlement; C 278
- Milwaukee white-collar strike. See Strikes
- Miners, coal. See Coal miners, American
- Mines; Mother lode mines strike. M. Zenovich; S 660
- Mini, Norman
California dictatorship; S.....224; see also C 481
- Minnesota, stalemate in. E. Thane; S..... 442
- Minor, Robert
Gallup kidnapping; C..... 600
- See also Gallup, New Mexico
- Miserables, les. W. Troy; MP..... 556
- Mitchell, Colonel William A; advocates teaching of patriotism; EP..... 347
- Mitchell, Ewing Y., dismissal; EP..... 725
- Mohawk, steamship, sinking; EP..... 141
- Money. See Currency
- Mooney, Tom; habeas corpus writ issued by state supreme court; EP..... 726
- United States supreme court sends case back to California supreme court; EP..... 113
- Morgan, J. P., fought by Giannini. S. G.
Ward; S 737
- Morgan, J. P., and company. See Munitions of war
- Morrow, Felix
Robins-Gras case; C 74
- Moscow, subway, building and financing; EP..... 522
- See also Russia
- Moses, Robert; compromise in war with Secretary Ickes; EP..... 317
- Controversy with Secretary Ickes. R. G.
S.; S 127
- Opposed by Secretary Ickes; EP..... 58
- Mother lode mines. See Mines
- Motor cars. See Automobiles
- Moving pictures
Hollywood, fascism in. C. McWilliams;
S.....623; see also C..... 743
- Hollywood wages and working conditions;
EP 59
- See also Censorship, moving pictures;
Troy, W.
- Munitions of war
Investigation; American liberty league at; EP 1
- Investigation of contracts for warships;
EP 169
- Investigation to continue; EP..... 113
- Labor conditions in factories beyond government control; E..... 524
- Senate committee investigation of J. P.
Morgan and company and the Colt patent firearms manufacturing company. R. G. Swing; S..... 504
- Musgrave, Percival
Lindsay, Judge B., election in California;
C 45
- Music
"Aryan." Low; Ct..... 176
- Lady Macbeth of Mzensk, by Shostakovich. K. Burke; M..... 230
- Merger of Metropolitan opera association and Philharmonic-symphony orchestra, proposed; B. H. Haggin; S..... 100
- Mussolini, B., and the league. Low; Ct..... 324
- See also Italy
- Muste, A. J.
General Motors strike, Toledo; S..... 632
- Myers, James
Relief in coal fields; C..... 45
- N
- NRA. See National industrial recovery act
- Nation, The*
Angoff, C., joins editorial board; EP..... 375
- Brown, H., returns as contributor; EP..... 171
- Honor roll for 1934 3
- Article in Fortune which won place on roll to be credited to E.
Hodgins. A. MacLeish; C..... 103
- Issue of February 27 bought up in Racine for Hans Christian article; EP
.....346; see also 252
- Labor welfare, index of 560, 688
- Reply to New York Times comment
■ Index; E..... 590
- Nation fund, incorporated, takes over ownership; EP..... 521
- Perkins, L. S. W., subscriber at ninety-two renews subscription; C..... 509
- See, Alonzo B.; his opinion of The Nation; C.....448; see also C..... 602
- National biscuit company; strike against; EP
..... 319
- National congress for unemployment and social insurance. E. Seeley; S.....106; see also EP..... 58
- National farm holiday association, meeting only ■ moderate success; EP..... 521
- National industrial recovery act Administration after supreme court decision; EP..... 726
- Brookings institution criticism; EP..... 494
- Cake-eaters, haven for. P. W. Ward;
S 411
- Codes and labor standards 309
- Extension of NRA, terms for; E..... 320
- Extension; Wagner labor-disputes bill and the NRA; E..... 616
- Labor, Colt patent firearms company defiance of law; E..... 470
- Long, senator, filibuster; EP..... 726
- New, changes from old; EP..... 402
- Reorganization. J. M. Marlingham; C..... 417
- Schechter case decision. See National industrial recovery act—Supreme court decision
- Section 7-a, enforcement by government boycott 633
- Section 9-c; decision of United States supreme court in "hot" oil case; E..... 87
- Supreme court decision. O. G. Villard;
S 675
- Effect; E.....672; EP..... 726
- Nine against labor. H. Brown; S..... 687
- President and constitutional issue;
EP.....697; EP 699
- Roosevelt conference with press; EP
..... 669
- Tobacco code, provisions; EP..... 205
- Wagner labor-disputes bill and NRA; E
..... 616
- National labor relations board. See Labor
- National steel labor relations board. See
Steel and iron
- National student strike against war; EP..... 466
- National underwriter*, comment on article in
The Nation on life insurance. J. P.
Sullivan; C.....684; see also 592
- National urban league; L. B. Granger, secretary, on B. Stolberg and black chauvinism; C.....628; see also 570;
C 710
- Nationalism, American, growing; E..... 209
- Naval treaty. See Armament limitation and disarmament
- Navy, United States, maneuvers and effect on Japan; EP.....29, 494, 586, 642
- See also Armaments
- Nazis. See Czecho-Slovakia; Germany; Jews—Anti-semitism
- Neal, Claude. See Lynchings
- Nearing, Scott
Lecture tour experiences; C..... 159
- Negroes
Chauvinism. B. Stolberg; S.....570;
see also C..... 628
- Divine, Father, and his Harlem following. C. McKay; S..... 151
- Harlem riots. C. McKay; S..... 382
- Jurors, supreme court decision in Scottsboro case; EP 401
- Lynchings. See Lynchings
- Race prejudice. O. G. Villard; S..... 119
- Scottsboro case:
Norris, C., counsel changed; EP... 206
- Supreme court decision on Negroes for juries; EP 401
- Supreme court decision upholding exclusion from primary; E..... 497
- Neutrality. See War
- Neville, Helen
Body's freedom; P 164
- New deal. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration; United States
- New Mexico. See Gallup, New Mexico
- New Orleans Item-Tribune. See Newspapers
- New year, stocktaking; EP..... 29
- New York City
Battle for municipal electric plant; EP.. 671
- Electric rates, excessive; EP..... 643
- Electric rates, in New York City and state, to be reduced by companies; EP
..... 86
- Furloughs, payless. A. Reader; C..... 159
- Hurdy-gurdys banished; EP..... 403
- LaGuardia, Mayor, year of; E..... 61
- Racket, in New York City electric companies; E 321
- Unemployment relief. See Unemployment relief
- Utilities, public, endurance contest; EP..... 29
- New York City school for workers, case of.
S. Grafton; S..... 476
- New York state; constitution, lves law to compel support. C. Becker; S..... 13
- Legislation, progressive, collapse of; E..... 498
- Public utilities, plight of; E..... 5
- Reapportionment, defeat; EP 466
- New York telephone company; company union and proposed wage cut; EP.... 431
- New York Times
Barred from Italy; EP..... 725
- News and editorial columns; death of
A. S. Ochs; EP 430
- Reply by The Nation to comment on
The Nation Index of labor welfare;
E 590
- Russian news; EP..... 59
- Newark, New Jersey, Ledger. See Newspapers—American newspaper guild
- Newfoundland, work relief demonstration;
EP 587
- Newlon, Jesse H., on academic freedom; E..... 293
- Newman, Louis I.
On Dreiser and the Jews; C..... 572
- Newsboys, labor. D. D. Bromley; S..... 131
- Newspapers
American newspaper guild:
Affiliation with American federation of labor. H. Brown; S.....484; 712
- And the craft. H. Brown; S..... 184
- And manual laborers. H. Brown;
S 279
- Appeal by San Francisco Call-Bulletin
in case of Dean S. Jennings; cases of Il Progresso and New Orleans Item-Tribune; EP..... 30
- Appeal for aid against Newark
Ledger. H. Brown; S..... 309
- Brown, H., fights Berry injunction;
EP 319
- Cleveland convention; guild and American federation of labor. H.
Brown; S 712
- Cleveland guild; news of signing of contract suppressed by newspapers.
A. Cleveland; C..... 74
- Green, W., support of guild. H.
Brown; S 362
- Guided or gelded. H. Brown; S..... 543
- History, first year, and accomplishments. N. Alexander; S.....75; see also C 183
- Injunction granted to Newark
Ledger. H. Brown; S..... 336
- Jennings, Dean S., thanks The Nation for article on guild; C.....183;
see also 75 and E..... 144
- Newark Ledger strike. H. Brown; S
..... 420
- And child labor. D. D. Bromley; S..... 131
- Child labor, attitude toward; EP..... 142
- Editorials, power of; Gannett newspapers in Maine and new destroyers; EP 430
- "Industry." H. Brown; S..... 223

- London Times—and others. O. G. Villard; S. 211
 Newspaper industrial board, failure; EP 319
 Radio invades journalism. I. Keating; S. 677
 Writers on sports who make America's gods. Left Wing; S. 245; see also 305
 See also Freedom of the press
- Niemeyer, Carl
 On the Drifter and "Euripedes"; C. 73
 Nineteen thirty-five; stock-taking; EP. 29
 Ninety-six cotton mill. See Cotton-textiles industry
- Noah. J. W. Krutch; D. 259
 Nobel prize for peace, proposed for C. von Ossietzky; aid sought. E. G. Balch; C. 686
- Norris, Clarence. See Negroes—Scottsboro case
- Norris, George W., achievements; E. 32
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1934. 3
 North American company, defense. J. F. Fogarty; C. 655; see also. 440
 North Carolina; textile strike at Burlington; arrest of workers. W. T. Couch and J. O. Bailey; S. 483; see also C. 482
 Norway; socialist rule in; EP. 467
 Novels, field, proper; E. 702
 Worth reading? J. W. Krutch; S. 188
- Nudism; Legion of decency crusade against; E. 62
 McCall anti-nudism bill signed by Governor Lehman; EP. 615
 "Nudismo"; E. 210
- Nye, Gerald P.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934. 3
- O
- Ochs, Adolph S. O. G. Villard; S. 471
 Death; EP. 430
- O'Connell, Cardinal William Henry, reactionary; EP. 643
- Ode to liberty. J. W. Krutch; D. 55
- Ohio, unemployment relief, political corruption charge; EP. 346
- Ohrbach strike. 309
- Oil, supreme court decision in "hot" oil case; E. 87
- Oklahoma Indians, bill for, tabled; EP. 698
- Old age pensions for; E. 406
- Townsend plan. R. G. Swing; S. 268
- Townsend plan. M. B. Schnapper; S. 43
- Townsend plan, in support of. E. Coleman; C. 17
- Old maid, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 167
- Pulitzer prize play. J. W. Krutch; D. 610
- Older, Fremont; death; EP. 290
- Opera, Lady Macbeth of Mzensk, by Shostakovich. K. Burke; M. 230
- "Optimism, pollyanna." O. G. Villard; S. 147
- Ossietzky, Carl von; Nobel prize proposed; aid sought. E. G. Balch; C. 686
- P
- PWA. See Public works administration
- Pacifism
 Columbia university students dismissed; EP. 699
Literary Digest poll of colleges; EP. 142
 Movements in disfavor with college faculties; EP. 559
 National student strike against war; EP. 466
- Page, Kirby; attempt to stop address; EP. 207
- Paith, Helen
 Drama league travel bureau scholarships; C. 509
- Palfrey, John G.
 Seeks letters of Justice Holmes; C. 602
- Palmer, George Herbert; biographical material sought. F. L. Panchaud; C. 18
- Palmer, Paul, and L. E. Spivak
American Mercury strike; C. 741
- Panchaud, Frances Lee
 Seeks biographical material on G. H. Palmer; C. 18
- Panic, play in verse, by A. MacLeish. J. W. Krutch; D. 369
- First section. A. MacLeish; S. 281
- Parade. J. W. Krutch; D. 666
- Paraguay. See Chaco war
- Partridge, Hugh R.
 On The Nation and A. B. See; C. 602
- Party, new, liberal, establishment sought. E. Wilke; C. 509
- Menace. M. Hyde; C. 17
- Patman bill. See Veterans
- Patten, Simon Nelson; data sought. P. E. Keller; C. 183
- Peace pact mission. Low; Ct. 380
- Peanut hill. L. J. Gordon; S. 270
- Pearson, Governor. See Virgin islands of the United States
- Pecora, Ferdinand; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934. 3
- Peek, George N., office to cease; EP. 698
- On international settlement figures; EP. 558
- Pennsylvania, fascism. A. Schechter; S. 713
- Pensions, old-age. See Old-age pensions
- Pensions, railroad. See Railroads
- Perkins, Secretary Frances; work. P. W. Ward; S. 353
- Perkins, L. S. W.
 On The Nation; C. 509
- Permanent court of international justice; United States adherence; E. 115
- Peru; Apra movement. C. Beals; C. 158
- Petrified forest, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 111
- Petroleum. See Oil
- Petticoat fever. J. W. Krutch; D. 342
- Philadelphia, censorship of play, Too late to die; E. 470
- Philharmonic-symphony orchestra. See Music
- Philippine islands; constitution, proposed; EP. 206
- Sakdalista uprising; EP. 558
- Sakdalista uprising, behind the. S. Weinman; S. 625
- Picketing, strike; Dt. 359
- Pie, and spinach; Dt. 128
- Pilfel, H. F.
 Roosevelt and propaganda; C. 508; see also. 379
- Pilsudski, marshal, death; EP. 586
- Pinchot, Cornelia Bryce; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934. 3
- Pioneer Youth and summer jobs. A. Sailer; C. 602
- Pitts, Edwin C. (Alabama); admittance to professional baseball debated; EP. 699
- Pittsburgh, university of Academic freedom to be investigated by legislature; EP. 347
 To be investigated; EP. 291
- Planning, failure? E. 701
- Plays. See Theater, the; also Krutch, J. W.; M., M.
- Poems
 Body's freedom. H. Neville. 164
 Centaur, the. L. Abel. 192
 Descent from death. H. S. White. 192
 For a child. I. Fineman. 705
 Poem. L. Reis. 577
 Serenade. J. Falstaff; P. 486
 Whisperer, the. M. Van Doren. 624
- Poetry
 Poets and the wars. P. B. Rice; S. 189
 Radical verse sought. J. Drachler; C. 630
- Poland. Pilsudski's death, effect of; EP. 586
- Police, company. 280
- "Pollyanna optimism." O. G. Villard; S. 147
- Pope, Generoso, member of American newspaper publishers' association. 222; see also. 156
- Postal service. See Mail contracts
- Power and power industry. See Public utilities
- Preis, Art
 On automobile workers' union; C. 183; see also. 77
- Prentiss, Lee
 On Social repertory theater; C. 222
- Presidential election of 1936; looking toward. R. G. Swing; S. 568
- Press. See Freedom of the press; Newspapers
- Printers, strike won by Independent printing employees. 107
- Prisoners of war. J. W. Krutch; D. 203
- Progreso*, II. See Newspapers
- Propaganda and the president. O. G. Villard; S. 379; see also C. 508
- Propaganda and the schools; E. 293
- Psychology; mental tests as social reflectors. E. B. Mann; S. 738
- Public finance. See Finance, public
- Public schools. See Schools
- Public utilities
 Crisis in power industry. F. P. Walsh; S. 65
- Electricity, rates for, in New York City and state, to be reduced by companies; EP. 86
- Everson, Pennsylvania, menace by action of company; EP. 170
- New York state, plight of; E. 5
- Tennessee electric power company gets Edison electric institute medal; EP. 699
- See also New York City
- Public works administration, and recovery; E. 349
- Wood, R. E., made head of committee; EP. 234
- Pugilism. See Boxing
- Pulitzer prizes; E. 589
- "Class angle." H. Broun; S. 603
- Old maid, prize play. J. W. Krutch; D. 610
- Punch, London, idea of American slang; E. 562
- Purcell, E. A.
 Rent strike; S. 604
- Q
- Quiller-Couch, Sir Arthur; not dead. F. S. Mansbridge; C. 482; see also. 398
- Quintuplets, Dionne, birthday, L. B. Harts-horn; S. 708
- R
- R., C.
 On O. G. Villard's article on executions in Russia; C. 102
- Race prejudice. O. G. Villard; S. 119
- Racine, Wisconsin; Nick Bins, kidnapper. H. Christian; S. 252; see also EP. 346; C. 446
- Reactionism ascendant; EP. 523
- Radicals
 American legion activity for fascism; EP. 671
- California, conviction of "conspiracy"; EP. 401
- "Gag" bills, protest against. H. F. Ward, A. G. Hays and R. Baldwin; C. 601
- Michigan, Dunckel anti-radicalism bill passed; EP. 643
- Radio
 Broadcasting rules by Columbia system; EP. 615
- Censorship, information sought. M. F. Kassner; C. 160
- Invades journalism. I. Keating; S. 677
- Railroads
 Bankers' relations to roads exposed; EP. 375
- Pension plan, declared invalid by supreme court; EP. 557; E. 588; E. 672
- Rain from heaven. J. W. Krutch; D. 55
- Reader,
 On New York City payless furloughs; C. 159
- Reading. See Books
- Reciprocity. See Tariff, United States
- Recovery, business. See Business depression
- Recruits. M. M.; D. 342
- "Reds." See Cleveland, Ohio; Communists; Radicals
- Reis, Lincoln
 Poem; P. 577
- Relief, unemployment. See Unemployment relief
- Rensselaer polytechnic institute. See Hicks, G.
- Rent strike. E. A. Purcell; S. 604
- Republican party
 Called "progressive" by Chairman Fletcher; EP. 495
- Hoover message to; EP. 374
- Progressive republicans. O. G. Villard; S. 527
- Springfield, Illinois, "grass roots" convention; EP. 697
- Rice, Philip Blair
 Poets and the wars; S. 189
- Richberg, Donald R., and Colt patent firearms manufacturing company; E. 470
- Misinformation President Roosevelt. R. G. S.; 156; see also correction. 222
- See also Johnson, H. S.
- Rivington, Ann, and others
American Mercury strike and maltreatment of pickets; C. 657
- Roberta. W. Troy; MP. 371
- Robins, Harold, and André Gras; get new trial after railroad to prison; funds needed. F. Morrow; C. 74
- Robinson, Edwin Arlington, death; E. 434
- Poem on T. Hardy. C. Weber; C. 508
- Rodgers, Ward H.; conviction and sentence for "anarchy"; EP. 143; see also E. 174
- Rodman, Selden
 On Dreiser and the Jews; C. 572
- Rome agreement. See Europe
- Romeo and Juliet. J. W. Krutch; D. 55
- Romer, Samuel
 Automobile strike; S. 162
- Romer, Samuel, and M. Smith
 On Adamic's Detroit; S. 305; see also. 177
- Roosevelt, Franklin Delano Administration:
 Compromise, two years of. O. G. Villard; S. 267
- Hopkins, H. L., dirge for. P. W. Ward; S. 594
- Labor, break with. R. G. S.; S. 181
- Labor policy; E. 144
- Measures, senate deadlock over; EP. 317
- "New deal" and its critics. V. S. Yarros; C. 742
- "New deal" and money interests. Low; Ct. 649
- Opposition by progressives; EP. 261
- Opposition voiced at National congress for unemployment and social insurance; EP. 58
- Partisanship; E. 143
- President as administrator. O. G. Villard; S. 732
- And big business. Low; Ct. 120
- And social security; E. 116
- Broun meets the president. H. Broun; S. 251
- Congress and the president; EP. 57
- Congress, message to (which the president might read to it); E. 4
- Failure, worst. O. G. Villard; S. 647

- Labor. See Labor—National labor relations board Party regularity in 1936. R. G. S.; S. 127
 Presidential election of 1936, looking toward. R. G. Swing; S. 568
 Press conference; on supreme court decision and New deal; EP. 669
 Propaganda and the president. O. G. Villard; S. 379; see also C. 508
 Security, president's program for. M. S. Stewart; S. 67
 Ship subsidies, advocacy; E. 321
 Social program, future; EP. 699
 Supreme court decision, President and constitutional issue; EP. 697
 Surrendering president; E. 172
 Unemployment relief; president's intention to abolish; E. 60
 War; statement by General Andrews on seizure of British and French possessions by United States in case of war repudiated by president; E. 558
 Roper, Secretary Daniel Calhoun. P. W. Ward; S. 473
 Rorty, James
 Grand coulee dam; S. 329; see also C. 446
 Lettuce—with American dressing; S. 575
 Radicalism of farmers; S. 104
 Rorty, James, explores Imperial valley; EP. 291
 Rothschild, John
 Travel, articles on; S. 506, 599, 627, 683, 740
 Rottenberg, Abraham
 On Dreiser and the Jews; C. 572
 Roumain, Jacques; jailed for work for Negro liberation in Haiti. L. Hughes; C. 18
 Aid for. F. Bradley; C. 542
 Rourke, Constance; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934. 3
 Royle, Selena
 Equity, case for; C. 658; see also. 574
 Rubber; companies challenge collective bargaining principle. 50
 Industry, labor in. L. Adamic; S. 334
 Strike; EP. 430
 Rubber tires, strike, settlement; EP. 465
 Ruggles of Red Gap. W. Troy; MP. 341
 Russia
 Agreements with other countries weaken international communism; EP. 615
 Booker, V., disciplined for lecture; EP. 171
 Bread cards abolished. L. Fischer; S. 11
 Democracy, greater, move for; EP. 170
 Executions; letters on article (December) by O. G. Villard; C. 102
 "Famine" in Ukraine as seen by T. Walker, Hearst correspondent. L. Fischer; S. 296; see also C. 629
 Hearst attacks on; EP. 523
 Kirov executions, behind the. I. L. Fischer; S. 529, 566 Liberties, civil and economic; correspondence between J. W. Krutch and R. Baldwin; C. 103
 Literature; writers' conference; E. 674
 Moscow is a dynamo. L. Fischer; S. 326
 Murders again. O. G. Villard; S. 91
 News from, via New York Times and London Times; EP. 59
 Science in; Kapitza stays home; E. 526
 Smith, A., articles in Hearst papers; E. 730
 Soviet-American break. L. Fischer; S. 385
 "Starvation" not proceeding on Hearst schedule; EP. 263
 Stirling, Admiral, anti-soviet article on "menace"; EP. 699
 Russian-American relations, negotiations, breaking off; E. 173
 Russian-German relations. O. G. Villard; S. 435
 Russian-French relations. See Franco-Russian relations
 S., R. G.
 Agricultural adjustment administration, purge at; S. 216
 Automobile workers, the president and the American federation of labor; S. 241
 Cutting, Senator, election to be challenged; S. 127
 Food and drug bill; S. 301
 Hillman, S., work for labor; S. 383
 Ickes, Secretary, troubles in office and controversy with R. Moses; S. 127
 Indian policy, new, fight on; S. 479
 Long and Coughlin; S. 325
 Party regularity in 1936; S. 127
 Richberg misinforms President Roosevelt; S. 156; see also correction. 222
 Roosevelt breaks with labor; S. 181
 Virgin islands, justice in; S. 95
 See also Swing, R. G.
 SEC. See Securities exchange commission
 Saar basin, election. J. Fischer; S. 96
 Hitler and the Saar; E. 33
 Plebiscite, Nazi victory; EP. 85
 See also Germany
 Sacramento Bee, attitude on Sacramento criminal-syndicalism case; EP. 586
 Sailer, Agnes
 Pioneer Youth and summer jobs; C. 602
 Sakdalistas. See Philippine islands
 Salaries, corporation. O. G. Villard; S. 499
 Salt creek oil field case in interior department. P. W. Ward; S. 679
 Salvemini, Professor, and the Casa italiana at Columbia university; C. 129; see also E. 117
 See also Fascism
 San Francisco Call-Bulletin. See Newspapers
 Santo Domingo-United States, relations; E. 433
 Sarre basin. See Saar basin
 Saturday Evening Post. See Johnson, H. S.
 Scandinavia; socialist rule in; EP. 467
 Scarlet pimpernel, the. W. Troy; MP. 232
 Schechter, Amy
 Fascism in Pennsylvania; S. 713
 Schechter case. See National industrial recovery act—Supreme court decision Schnapper, M. B.
 Townsend old-age pension plan; S. 43
 Schneider, A.
 On O. G. Villard's article on executions in Russia; C. 102
 Schoenberg, Philip
 On Dreiser and the Jews; C. 572
 Schools for workers. J. Carter; C. 602
 Schools, public, change needed. R. H. Duel; C. 18
 Schuman, Frederick L.
 Hearst war on; C. 480
 Schurz, Carl, misuse of name. H. Hilbers and K. Kluge; C. 360
 Scoundrel, the. W. Troy; MP. 610
 Seagle, William
 Lynching, how not to stop; Wagner-Costigan bill; S. 626
 Sections 7-a and 9-c. See National industrial recovery act Securities exchange commission; soft pedal at. R. G. Swing; S. 706
 Security, Roosevelt program for. M. S. Stewart; S. 67
 Security, social. See Social insurance; Social security
 Sedition. See Arkansas; Treason
 See, Alonzo B.
 Nation, The; his opinion; C. 448; see also C. 602
 Seeley, Evelyn
 National congress for unemployment and social insurance; S. 106
 Seidman, Joel
 Wagner labor-disputes bill; S. 745
 Senate, See Congress
 Sequoia. W. Troy; MP. 288
 Serwer, Harry
 On Dreiser and the Jews; C. 573
 Settlements, international. See Trade, foreign Shaffer, Thomas C.
 Carl Mackley apartments; C. 183; see also EP. 58
 Shaine, M.
 On O. G. Villard's article on executions in Russia; C. 102
 Share-croppers. See Agriculture
 Shaw, George Bernard; play, The simpleton of the unexpected isles; review by J. W. Krutch; D. 286
 Shelbyville, Tennessee. See Lynchings
 Shepard, Thomas O.
 Dodging taxes with Mellon; S. 564
 Shipping
 Agreement reached at London; EP. 114
 Disasters; EP. 141
 Subsidies:
 Bland-Copeland bill for; EP. 558
 English, new. O. G. Villard; S. 239
 Open or concealed; EP. 725
 Plunder; E. 728
 Roosevelt advocacy; E. 321
 Shostakovich; opera, Lady Macbeth of Mzensk. K. Burke; M. 230
 Sifton, Paul
 On Theatre guild; C. 250; see also E. 145; C. 350
 Theater guild productions; C. 418; see also. 350
 Silver, price policy, American; price not boosted; EP. 521
 Producers get increase in bounty; EP. 466
 Simpleton of the unexpected isles, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 286
 Sinclair, Upton; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934. 3
 Retracts statement on Negro preachers and election in California; C. 73
 Sino-Japanese relations. See Chinese-Japanese relations
 Slang, American; London Punch's idea; E. 562
 Smells; D. 157
 Smith, Andrew. See Russia
 Smith, Matthew, and S. Romer
 On Adamic's Detroit; S. 305; see also. 177
 Social insurance. See Insurance, social
 Social repertory theater, the, formation. L. Prentis; C. 222
 Social security
 Bill referred to house ways and means committee; EP. 115
 Blow at, in supreme court decision against railroad retirement act; EP. 557
 Congress discovers the class struggle. M. S. Stewart; S. 247
 Lundeen bill, hearings on; EP. 206
 National congress for unemployment and social insurance. E. Seeley; S. 106
 Roosevelt administration's program; EP. 116
 See also Insurance, social
 Socialism, Scandinavian; EP. 467
 Socialist party, condition today. B. Stolberg; S. 649 Socialized medicine. See Medicine, socialization of Solow, Herbert
 California, united front in; C. 160
 Something gay. J. W. Krutch; D. 584
 South, the; Southern policy conference on nation's economic policy; replies to Secretary Wallace; E. 618
 See also Agriculture
 South Africa. See Union of South Africa
 Soviet Russia. See Russia
 Spain, terror in. E. Wilkinson; S. 272
 Speech, freedom of. See Freedom of speech
 Spinach, and pie; D. 128
 Spivak, John L.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934. 3
 Spivak, Lawrence E., and P. Palmer
 American Mercury strike; C. 741
 Sport, college. Left wing; S. 538
 Sports. See Newspapers
 Springfield, Illinois, "grass roots" convention. See Republican party Steamships, immense, doomed; E. 378
 Steel and iron
 Amalgamated association of iron, steel and tin workers, rank-and-file leaders ousted; EP. 235; see also. 241
 Carnegie steel company's union elections; EP. 58
 Labor; election orders by National steel labor relations board against United States Steel. 107
 "Mediation"; R. M. Stein; S. 19
 Pennsylvania, fascism in steel towns. A. Schechter; S. 713
 Weirton union organization case, decision in; E. 293
 Stein, Rose M.
 Steel "mediation"; S. 19
 Sterling. See Currency
 Stewart, Maxwell S.
 Congress and the class struggle; S. 247
 Roosevelt program for security; S. 67
 Stirling, Rear Admiral Yates, junior; anti-soviet article; EP. 699
 Stolberg, Benjamin
 Black chauvinism; S. 570; see also C. 628
 Critique of chaos; S. 505; see also EP. 495
 Socialist party today; S. 649
 Storms, dust. M. Bourke-White; S. 597
 Strachey, John, deportation, charges; E. 349
 Deportation proceedings, dropping of; EP. 402
 Stresa conference. See Europe
 Strikes, labor. E. A. Purcell; S. 604
 "Neutral" governmental agencies. H. Brown; S. 391
 Spring, possibility reduced; EP. 402
 Wagner labor-disputes bill. J. Seidman; S. 745
 Opposition of manufacturers; EP. 670
 White-collar, Boston store, Milwaukee; H. K.; S. 49
 See also Automobiles; Coal miners, American; Cotton-textiles industry; Klein, S.; mines; National biscuit company; Printers; Rubber
 Strobell, Caro Lloyd
 Seeks biographical material on H. D. Lloyd; C. 602
 Studenski, Paul
 Tax program for the future; S. 274
 Student strike against war; EP. 466
 Submarines. See Armaments
 Subsidies, shipping. See Ships
 Sufi Abdul Hamid, Harlem agitator. C. McKay; S. 382
 Sugar, and the Earhart flight. L. Ford; S. 121; see also E. 118, and correction. 207
 Sugar, Maurice; election urged. N. J. Bicknell; C. 182
 Sullivan, James P.
 On life insurance; C. 684; see also. 592
 Summer jobs, work of Pioneer Youth. A. Sailer; C. 602
 Supreme court, United States Decisions:
 Excluding Negroes from primary, upholds Democratic party; E. 497
 Gold clause. H. Hazlitt; S. 126; R. G. S.; S. 128; see also EP. 233; E. 238

- Gold-clause, awaited as test of constitution; EP 85
 "Hot" oil case; E 87
 Railroad pensions; E 588
 Railroad pensions and Schechter cases, effect; E 672
 Schechter case. See National industrial recovery act—Supreme court decision
 Scottsboro case; EP 401
 Sweden, abortion legalization advocated; EP 318
 Socialist rule in; EP 466
 Sweepstakes; Dt 416
 Swing, Raymond Gram
 Bilbo, Senator; S 123
 Birth control and obscenity; S 621
 Budget, unreal; S 64
 Coughlin, Father. II. Phase of action; S 9
 Fascism; patriotism dons black shirt; S 409
 Long, Huey, in his kingdom; S 36, 69
 Long, Huey, menace of; bid for national power; S 98
 Munitions investigation by senate committee; S 504
 Presidential election of 1936, looking toward; S 568
 Securities exchange commission, soft pedal at; S 706
 Social security in Great Britain; S 179
 Townsend plan; S 268
 See also S., R. G.
 Syndicalism, criminal. See Communism
- T
- Tamiris, critique of her dancing; C 333; see also 258
 Tariff, United States
 Belgian-American trade agreement; EP 289
 Brazil, agreement with; EP 169
 Reciprocity, one year of; E 731
 Reductions, refusal to extend; EP 466
 Taxation. See Finance, public
 Taylor, Harry
 On H. L. Mencken's article on liquor; C 16
 Teachers' oath to support constitution. See New York state Tenant farmers. See Agriculture
 Tennessee electric power company gets Edison electric institute medal; EP 699
 Tests, mental. See Mental tests
 Texas, and middle west, in December. O. G. Villard; S 7
 Texas company; ordered to dissolve company union 77; see also C 183
 Textile industry. See Cotton-textiles industry
 Thane, Eric
 Minnesota, stalemate in; S 442
 Theater, the Censorship. See Censorship, theater
 Drama league travel bureau scholarships. H. Pairtch; C 509
 Social repertory theater, the, formation. L. Prentis; C 222
 Theater guild and playwrights. P. Sifton; C 250; see also E 145; C 305
 Theater guild, suppression of plays; picketing against; E 145; see also C 250; C 418
 See also Krutch, J. W.; M., M.
 Theater guild. See Theater, the Theater union, insolvency threatened; EP 263
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1934 3
 Thumbs up. J. W. Krutch; D 83
 Tighe, Michael F., purge of steel-union leaders; EP 235; see also 241
 Till the day I die. J. W. Krutch; D 428
 Tilton, Elizabeth
 On H. L. Mencken's article on liquor; C 16
 Times, London. See London Times
 Times, New York. See New York Times
 Tires, automobile. See Rubber tires
 To see ourselves. J. W. Krutch; D 584
 Tobacco, greed. G. L. Knapp; S 544
 Tobacco code; EP 205
 Toledo, Ohio. See Automobiles
 Too late to die, play; censorship in Philadelphia; E 470
 Tours. See Travel
 Townsend plan. See Old-age pensions
 Trachtenberg, Joshua
 On Dreiser and the Jews; C 572; see also C 711
 Trade, foreign; office of G. N. Peek as adviser on foreign trade to cease; EP 698
 United States credit balance in 1934; EP 558
 Trade, world, depression worse; EP 523
 Tradition, family; Dt 220
 Transportation, building and financing, American and Russian methods; EP 522 Travel; articles on. J. Rothschild; S 506, 599, 627, 683, 740
 "Traveler,"
 Anti-Semitism on steamship Kungsholm; C 332; denied, C 743
- Treason; charge against Illinois defendants dropped; EP 87
 Trees, English and others; Dt 44
 Troy, William
 Babes in toyland; MP 27
 Black fury; MP 491
 Bordertown; MP 168
 Break of hearts; MP 640
 Cardinal Richelieu; MP 556
 Chapayev; MP 139, 288
 Clive of India; MP 139
 Crise est finie, la; MP 371
 David Copperfield; MP 168
 Devil is a woman, the; MP 640
 Disney cartoons; Mickey mouse; MP 556
 Don Quixote; MP 27
 Escape me never; MP 668
 Evergreen; MP 112
 Informer, the; MP 610
 Let 'em have it; MP 694
 Liliom; MP 371
 Lives of a Bengal lancer; MP 139
 March of time, the; MP 232
 Men of tomorrow; MP 518
 Mighty Barnum, the; MP 112
 Misérables, les; MP 556
 Roberta; MP 371
 Ruggles of Red Gap; MP 341
 Scarlet pimpernel, the; MP 232
 Scoundrel, the; MP 610
 Sequoia; MP 288
 Wedding night, the; MP 370
 Werewolf of London, the; MP 640
 Whole town's talking, the; MP 341
 Youth of Maxim; MP 518
 Tsana Lake, irrigation project, agreement between Abyssinia and Egypt; EP 670
 Tunis, John R.
 On article on sports writers; C 305; see also 245
- U
- U S S R. See Russia
 Unemployment
 Luncheon unemployment and social insurance bill reported favorably; EP 318
 "Made work," menace of. R. A. Lester; S 390
 National congress for unemployment and social insurance. E. Seelye; S 106
 Unemployment insurance, Lippmann, W., views; EP 115
 Unemployment relief
 Hunger, planned; E 405
 Illinois unemployed face starvation; EP 613
 New York City:
 Cut threatened; EP 522
 Inquiry shows inefficiency and red tape; EP 587
 Investigation; EP 559
 Investigation petering out; EP 522
 Newfoundland, demonstration; EP 587
 Ohio relief, political corruption charge; EP 346
 President's intention to abolish relief; E 60
 Projects, United States, difficulties in way; EP 57
 Unemployables, state or federal. E. Abbot; S 41; see also EP 30
 Wage scale, government, low; EP 613
 Wages and work relief; E 209
 Wages, depressed, in work relief; EP 261
 Works-relief appropriation, four billion; EP 585
 Work-relief bill, chances; EP 346
 Union of South Africa; government and natives; EP 614
 Union of Soviet socialist republics. See Russia Unions, company and others. See Labor unions
 United mine workers. See Coal miners, American United States
 Aged, provision for; E 406
 Democracy in flux; E 32
 Economic policy; Southern policy conference replies to Secretary Wallace; E 618
 Finances, budget, unbalanced, and inflation; EP 57
 Finances, budget, unreal. R. G. S.; S 64
 In 1935; stock-taking; EP 29
 Nationalism, growing; E 209
 New deal; need it be fascist? E 33
 Plutocracy, constitutional; effect of railroad pensions and Schechter cases; E 672
 Security, economic, Roosevelt program for. M. S. Stewart; S 67
 War scare in Europe, effect in Washington; EP 373
 See also Finances, public; Japanese-American relations; Latin America; Santo Domingo-United States relations
 United States steel corporation. See Steel and iron University in exile, gets W. Wilson foundation award; EP 587
- Urey, Harold C.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934 3
 Utilities, public. See Public utilities
- V
- Van Doren, Mark
 Whisperer, the; P 624
 Van Kleeck, Mary; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934 3
 Versailles treaty. See European war
 Verse. See Poetry
 Vested interests. O. G. Villard; S 63
 Veterans
 Bonus, Patman bill, passage of. R. G. S.; S 383
 Bonus, veto impending; EP 585
 Harrison and Patman measures for bonus payments; EP 495
 Patman bill, veto of; EP 641
 Villard, Oswald Garrison
 Issues and a woman:
 Jane Addams and her league; S 619
 Issues and men:
 Armaments, dance of death; S 351
 California, comedy; S 563
 Companies and salaries; S 499
 Cutting, Senator; S 591
 England's new ship subsidies; S 239
 Florida flamboyant; S 295
 Hitler after the Saar; S 175
 Hitler and Moscow; S 435
 Holmes, Justice Oliver Wendell, death; S 323
 Japanese-American relations; S 407
 Lawrence, T. E.; S 703
 London Times—and others; S 211
 Mencken, H. L., reply to, on alcoholic liquors; S 35
 Middle west and Texas in December; S 7
 Ochs, Adolph S.; S 471
 "Pollyanna optimism"; S 147
 Propaganda and the president; S 379; see also C 508
 Race prejudice; S 119
 Republicans, progressive; S 527
 Roosevelt as administrator; S 732
 Roosevelt, President, worst failure; S 647
 Rooseveltian compromise, two years of; S 267
 Russian murders again; S 91
 Supreme court decisions in NRA case; S 675
 Vested interests; S 63
 Liquor, views on, attacked by H. L. Mencken; C 72
 Russian executions; letters on December article; C 102
 Vincent, President Sténio. See Haiti
 Virgin islands of the United States
 Justice in; case of L. W. McIntosh; S 95
 Pearson, Governor, to be investigated by congress; EP 291
 Storm over Ickes reprint of Nation article; E 143
 Von, Jay du
 Chain-letter madness; S 682
 Vote, low-brow; E 266
- W
- Wages. See Automobiles; Labor; Unemployment relief
 Wagner, Senator Robert Ferdinand. See Labor; Strikes
 Wagner-Costigan bill. See Lynchings
 Wagner-Lewis social security bill; E 433
 Waiting for Lefty. J. W. Krutch; D 427
 Walgreen, Charles R., calls Chicago university "center of radical teaching"; EP 466
 Walker, Thomas. See Russia
 Wallace, Secretary Henry Agard, great hesitator. P. W. Ward; S 535
 Southern policy conference replies to his "America must choose"; E 618
 Walsh, Frank P.
 Power crisis, the; S 65
 War
 Conscription, fight against; McSwain bill amended; EP 429
 Europe face to face with German rearmament; E 376
 Inherent inhumanity; EP 643
 Munitions of. See Munitions of war
 Neutrality, American; E 404
 Next, who will pay for? H. Dalton; S 154
 Profits from, abolition proposed; E 377
 Scare, European, effect on Washington; EP 373
 Spring dreams. Low; Ct 528
 Statement by General Andrews on seizure of British and American possessions by United States in case of war repudiated by Roosevelt; EP 558; see also EP 522
 Wealth, conscription of; E 469
 See also Militarism; Pacifism
 Ward, Harry F.
 "Gag" bills, protest against; C 601

- Ward, Paul W.
Articles criticized. V. S. Yarros; C.... 742
Hopkins, H. L., dirge for; S..... 594
Ickes, Secretary, surrenders to bureaucracy; S..... 679
NRA—haven for cake-eaters; S..... 411
Perkins, Secretary; S..... 353
Roper, Daniel C.; S..... 473
Wallace, Secretary, the great hesitator; S..... 535
Ward, Sassoon G.
Giannini fights Morgan; S..... 737
Warships. See Munitions of war
Wassermann, William Stix
Holding-company abuses; C....630; see also S.....440; C..... 655
Wealth, conscription of, in war; E..... 469
Weber, Carl
Robinson, E. A., poem on T. Hardy; C 508
Wechsler, John; on The Nation's honor roll for 1934..... 3
Wedding night, the. W. Troy; MP..... 370
Wegman, Leonard S.
On B. Stolberg and black chauvinism; C.....628; see also..... 570
Weil, Leonard D.
On Dreiser and the Jews; C..... 572
Weinman, Samuel
Sakdalista uprising; S..... 625
Weirton steel company. See Steel and iron
Werewolf of London, the. W. Troy; MP.. 640
West, middle, and Texas, in December. O. G. Villard; S..... 7
West, middle; revolt in. A. M. Bingham; C..... 387
Wheat, restrictions on planting removed; EP 374
White, Hal Saunders
Descent from death; P..... 192
White-collar strike. See Strikes
"White collar" workers. H. Broun; S..... 279
Whitmore, Albert A.
On review of Shipmates; C.....222; see also..... 137
Whole town's talking, the. W. Troy; MP.. 341
Wilke, Ernest
With others, seeks to establish new party; C..... 509
Wilkinson, Ellen
Spain, terror in; S..... 272
Williams, Gertrude Marvin
Coal miners in contempt; S.....443; see also EP..... 431
Williams Record, inquiry into "Moscow connections"; EP..... 587
Willson, Corvin
Automobiles and housing; C..... 508
Wilson, Woodrow, foundation, awards; EP.. 587
Wirin, A. L.
Gallup kidnapping; C..... 600
Wisconsin; La Follette, P., talk with. L. Adamic; S..... 242
La Follette progressives and the future. L. Adamic; S..... 212
Wolman, Leo
Labor relations in automobile industry; S 297
Wolman elections, automobile workers; E.....237; see also..... 241
Wood, Frederick H.; appearance in NIRA case before supreme court; EP..... 699
Wood, Robert E., head of committee on spending of public-works fund; EP..... 234
Woodrow Wilson foundation, awards; EP... 587
Women's international league for peace and freedom gets W. Wilson foundation award; EP..... 587
Work. See Labor
Work relief. See Unemployment relief
Workers. See Labor
Works, public. See Unemployment relief
World court. See Permanent court of international justice Writers. See Authors
- Y
- Yale university; reduces workers' pay; EP.. 467
Yamaguchi, Captain T.
On Japan's war expenditures; C, with editorial comment..... 17
Yard, James M.
Germany, ray of light from; C..... 18
Yarros, Victor S.
New deal and its cities; C..... 742
Year, new, stock-taking; EP..... 29
Youth of Maxim. W. Troy; MP..... 518
- Z
- Zenovich, Milla
Mother lode mines strike; S..... 660
Zukerman, William
Anti-semitism, revival in Germany; S.. 356

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

- Abel, Lionel; R.....636, 749
Achorn, Erik
European civilization and politics since 1815; B..... 552
Acts of darkness. J. P. Bishop; AN..... 637
Adamic, Louis
Grandsons; B..... 364
Adamic, Louis; R..... 457
Adams, James Truslow
America's tragedy; B..... 80
Age of confidence, the. H. S. Canby; B.... 54
Agee, James
Permit me voyage; B..... 109
Agrarianism. T. J. Cauley; AN..... 665
Aldington, Richard
Women must work; AN..... 26
Aleck Maury, sportsman. C. Gordon; AN.. 55
Almanac for moderns, an. D. C. Peattie; B 546
America and Alfred Stieglitz. A collective portrait. Edited by W. Frank, L. Mumford, D. Norman, P. Rosenfeld, and H. Rugg; B..... 110
American diplomatic game, the. D. Pearson and C. Brown; B..... 194
America's tragedy. J. T. Adams; B..... 80
Amster, Leonard; R..... 81
Anderson, Edward
Hungry men; B..... 578
Angell, Norman
Peace and the plain man; B..... 515
Angoff, Charles; R.....550, 717
Another Caesar. A. Neumann. Translated by E. and C. Paul; B..... 133
Archetypal patterns in poetry. Psychological studies of imagination. M. Bodkin; AN..... 553
Art of the novel, the. H. James. Introduction by R. P. Blackmur; AN..... 82
Artemus, fare thee well. H. Carus; AN.... 313
Arthur, Chester A., biography. G. F. Howe; B..... 340
Auslander, Joseph
No traveller returns; AN..... 693
Autobiography of Montaigne, the. M. Lowenthal; B..... 310
Avalanche of April. K. Flaccus; B..... 23
Avdeyenko, A.
I love; B..... 718

B

- Background for Venus. J. Laver; AN..... 139
Bagnold, Enid
National velvet; B..... 663
Barnes, Harry Elmer; R.....108, 515
Barzun, Jacques; R..... 689
Basso, Hamilton
In their own image; AN..... 638
Bates, H. B.
Poacher, the; B..... 718
Bates, Ralph
Lean men; B..... 366
Battle for democracy, the. R. G. Tugwell; B 77
Bauer, Catherine
Modern housing; B..... 228
Beals, Carleton
Fire on the Andes; B.....52; letter by author..... 158
Beals, Carleton; R..... 196
Becker, Carl L.
Everyman his own historian; B..... 487
Bell, Clive
Enjoying pictures; B..... 25
Belloc, Hilaire
Cromwell; B..... 166
Shorter history of England, a; B..... 166
Benét, William Rose
Golden fleece, AN..... 665
Benson, E. F.
Queen Victoria; B..... 487
Bergson, Henri
Two sources of morality and religion, the. R. A. Audra and C. Brereton, translators. With the assistance of W. H. Carter; B..... 691
Berlioz, Hector, biography. T. Wotton; B.. 689
Bernheim, Alfred L.
Labor and the government; B..... 750
Better think twice about it and twelve other stories. L. Pirandello. Translated by A. and H. Mayne; B..... 134
Biddle, Francis; R..... 750
Billinger, Karl Fatherland; B..... 457
Binns, Archie
Lightship; B.....137; also C..... 222

- Bishop, John Peale
Acts of darkness; AN..... 637
Black consul, the. A. Vinogradov; B..... 312
Blackmur, R. P.; R.....136, 423
Blake, Forrester
Riding the mustang trail; B..... 425
Blessed is the man. L. Zara; B..... 718
Bliss, peacemaker. The life and letters of General Tasker Howard Bliss. F. Palmer; B..... 635
Blue eagle from egg to earth, the. H. S. Johnson; B..... 456
Bodkin, Maud
Archetypal patterns in poetry. Psychological studies of imagination; AN..... 553 Borchard, E. M.
Declaratory judgments; B..... 581
Bourke-White, Margaret; R..... 460
Boyd, James
Roll river; B..... 580
Boyd, Thomas
In time of peace; AN..... 609
Bradford, Gamaliel, letters of, 1918-1931. Edited by Van Wyck Brooks; B..... 24
Brenner, Anita; R.....133, 366
Breuer, Bessie
Memory of love; AN..... 138
Brewster, Dorothy; R.....365, 607
Brewster, Dorothy, and A. Burrell
Modern fiction; B..... 199
Brissenden, P. F.; R..... 751
British attack on unemployment, the. A. A. C. Hill, Jr., and I. Lubin; B..... 109
Broch, Herman
Unknown quantity, the. W. and E. Muir, translators; AN..... 722
Bromfield, Louis
Man who had everything, the; AN..... 724
Brooks, Robert C.
Deliver us from dictators! B..... 393
Brophy, John
World went mad, the; AN..... 399
Brown, Constantine, and D. Pearson
American diplomatic game, the; B..... 194
Bruun, Geoffrey; R..... 552
Buchan, John
People's king, the; B..... 607
Buck, Pearl S.
House divided, a; B..... 165
Burck, Jacob
Hunger and revolt; B..... 637
Burke, Kenneth
Permanence and change; B..... 453
Burke, Kenneth; R..... 200
Burrell, Angus, and D. Brewster
Modern fiction; B..... 199

C

- Caldwell, Erskine
Journeyman; B..... 192
Kneel to the rising sun; AN..... 720
Call it sleep. H. Roth; B..... 255
"Call me Ishmael." L. Collins; B..... 691
Cambridge, Elizabeth
Susan and Joanna; B..... 718
Canby, Henry Seidel
Age of confidence, the; B..... 54
Capitalism and its culture. J. Davis; AN.. 638
Carritt, E. F.
Morals and politics; B..... 580
Carroll, Gladys Hasty
Few foolish ones, a; AN..... 664
Carter, Isabel
Shipmates; B.....137; see also C..... 222
Carus, Helena
Artemus, fare thee well; AN..... 313
Cast down the laurel. A. Ginrich; B..... 366
Catherine: The portrait of an empress. G. Kaus. Translated by J. Head; B.... 689
Catlin, George E. G.; R..... 110
Catt, Carrie Chapman, and others
Why wars must cease; B..... 664
Cauley, Troy J.
Agrarianism; AN..... 665
Changing Asia. E. E. Kisch. English version by R. Reil; B..... 424
Chao Mei Pa
Yellow bell, the: Brief sketch of history of Chinese music; AN..... 55
Chart of plenty, the. A study of America's product capacity based on the findings of the National survey of potential product capacity. H. Loeb and associates; B..... 486
Chase, Mary Ellen
Mary Peters; B..... 137
Chase, Stuart; R..... 78
Chester A. Arthur. A quarter century of machine politics. G. F. Howe; B.... 340
Chorus for survival. H. Gregory; B..... 460
Chosen poems. H. Monroe; AN..... 694
Chronicles of Barabbas, 1884-1934. G. H. Doran; B..... 662
Claudius the god. R. Graves; B..... 424
Cobb, Humphrey
Paths of glory; B..... 716
Codman, Florence; R.....109, 228, 365, 716
Coffin, Robert P. Tristram
Strange holiness; AN..... 664

Coleridge on imagination. I. A. Richards; B.....	423
Collected poems. C. D. Lewis; B.....	311
Collins, Lloyd
"Call me Ishmael"; B.....	691
Commons, John R.
Myself; B.....	751
Conkling, Roscoe, biography. D. B. Chidsey; B.....	748
Connelly, Willard
Sir Richard Steele; AN.....	26
Conroy, Jack
World to win, a; B.....	607
Contemporary biography. M. Longakker; AN.....	693
Craig, A. R.
Jezebel's daughter; B.....	718
Creating the modern American novel. H. Hatcher; B.....	715
Cromwell. H. Belloc; R.....	166
Cuban crisis as reflected in the New York press, the, 1895-1898. J. E. Wisan; B.....	256
Cummings, E. E.
No thanks; B.....	749
Curry, W. B.
Education in a changing world; B.....	692
Curtain falls, the. J. V. Reed; B.....	422
Custer, General, life of. F. F. Vandewater; B.....	23
D
Dance of fire. L. Ridge; B.....	638
Davis, Jerome
Capitalism and its culture; AN.....	638
Day, Clarence
Scenes from the mesozoic; AN.....	694
Declaratory judgments. E. M. Borchard; B.....	581
Deliver us from dictators! R. C. Brooks; B.....	393
Democracy and military power. S. B. McKinley. Introduction by C. A. Beard; B.....	284
Deutsch, Babette; R.....	296
Dickens. A. Maurois; B.....	282
Dickens, Charles, two books on; B.....	282
Diffie, Bailey W.; R.....	256
Doctor's son, the. J. O'Hara; AN.....	368
Don Segunda Sombra: Shadows on the pampas. R. Güiraldes. Translated by H. de Onis; B.....	133
Doran, George H.
Chronicles of Barabbas, 1884-1934; B.....	662
Douglas, Paul H.; R.....	54
Douglas, Stephen A., biography. G. F. Milton; B.....	52
Drew, Elizabeth
Enjoyment of literature, the; B.....	634
Duhamel, Georges
Papa Pasquier; B.....	81
Duun, Olav
Odin grows up. A. G. Chater, translator; AN.....	368
Storm, the. A. G. Chater; AN.....	368
E
Early career of Alexander Pope, the. G. Sherburn; B.....	22
Early Victorian England (1830-1865). Edited by G. M. Young; B.....	515
Economic consequences of the new deal, the. B. Stolberg and W. J. Vinton; B.....	164
Economic handbook of the Pacific area. Edited by F. V. Field; AN.....	665
Education in a changing world. W. B. Curry; B.....	692
Elinor Wylie: The portrait of an unknown lady. N. Hoyt; B.....	488
Emeny, Brooks, and F. H. Simonds
Price of peace, the: The challenge of economic nationalism; B.....	515
Enjoying pictures. C. Bell; B.....	25
Enjoyment of literature, the. E. Drew; B.....	634
Estorick, Eric; R.....	54, 110
European civilization and politics since 1815. E. Achorn; B.....	552
Eve of conflict, the. Stephen A. Douglas and the needless war. G. F. Milton; B.....	52
Everyman his own historian. C. L. Becker; B.....	487
F Fallada, Hans
World outside, the; B.....	284
Farewell to revolution. E. D. Martin; B.....	393
Farrell, James T.
Judgment day; B.....	513
Fatherland. K. Billinger; B.....	457
Faulkner, William
Pylon; B.....	393
Fay, Sidney B.; R.....	53
February hill. V. Lincoln; B.....	137
Ferril, Thomas Hornsby
Westering; AN.....	584
Fessier, Michael
Fully dressed and in his right mind; AN.....	722
Few foolish ones, a. G. H. Carroll; AN.....	664
Field, Frederick V.; R.....	396
Field, Rachel
Time out of mind; B.....	514

Fire on the Andes. C. Beals; B...	52; letter by author	158
Fischer, Louis
Soviet journey; B...		460
Fischer, Louis; R...		718
Fisher, Vardis
We are betrayed; B...		136
Fitzgerald, F. Scott
Taps at reveille; B...		454
Flaccus, Kimball
Avalanche of April; B...		23
Fleming, Berry
Siesta; AN		517
Ford, Ford Madox
Ladies whose bright eyes; AN...		752
Provence. From minstrels to the machine; AN		553
Ford, James L. C.; R...		580
Forerunners of American fascism. R. G. Swing; B		546
Formation of capital, the. H. G. Moulton; B		577
Francis, Robert
Wolf at the door, the. R. F. Leslie, translator; B		715
Francis the first. F. Hackett; B...		422
Frazier, E. Franklin; R...		692
Freeman, Douglas Southall
R. E. Lee. Volumes III and IV; B...		254
Fully dressed and in his right mind. M. Fessler; AN		722
Fülöp-Miller, René
Leaders, dreamers and rebels; B...		489
G
Gentleman from New York, the: A life of Roscoe Conkling. D. B. Chidsey; B...		748
George V., king, two books on; B...		607
Gershoy, Leo; R...		229, 608
Ghost of Napoleon, the. L. Hart; B...		229
Gingrich, Arnold
Cast down the laurel; B...		366
Glory hunter, the. A life of General Custer. F. F. Van de Water; B...		23
Golden fleece. W. R. Benét; AN...		665
Gordon, Caroline
Aleck Maury, sportsman; AN...		55
Goslin, Ryllis Alexander and Omar Pancoast Goslin
Rich man, poor man; B...		663
Grandsons. L. Adamic; B...		364
Graves, Robert
Claudius the god; B...		424
Gray, James
Shoulder the sky; AN...		609
Greenhood, David
Poems, et cetera; B...	396; correction of price	640
Greenwich village. C. F. Ware; B...		635
Greenwood, Walter
Time is ripe, the; AN...		609
Gregory, Horace
Chorus for survival; B		460
Gregory, Horace; R...		202, 255, 396
Grudin, Louis
Tearless glass, a; B...		286
Gruening, Ernest; R...	52; letter by author	158
Guedalla, Philip
Hundred days, the; B...		229
Güiraldes, Ricardo
Don Segunda Sombra: Shadows on the pampas. H. de Onis, translator; B...		133
H
Hacienda. K. A. Porter; AN...		369
Hacker, Louis M.; R...		164
Hackett, Francis
Francis the first; B...		422
Hall, James Norman
Tale of a shipwreck, the; AN...		138
Hall, James Norman, and C. Nordhoff
Pitcairn's island; AN...		138
Halle, Louis J., Jr.; R...		692
Hamlet. Edited by J. B. Wilson; AN...	398; see also C...	482
Handout. George Michael; B...		606
Hansen, Alvin H., and others
Program for unemployment insurance and relief in the United States, a; B		54
Harding, T. Swann
Popular practice of fraud, the; B		394
Hart, Liddell
Ghost of Napoleon, the; B...		229
Haskell, Douglas; R		228
Hatcher, Harlan
Creating the modern American novel; B		715
He sent forth a raven. E. M. Roberts; B...		364
Heaven's my destination. T. Wilder; B...		135
Hector Berlioz. T. S. Wotton; B...		689
Heiden, Konrad
History of national socialism, a; B...		227
Heine, Heinrich, biography. A. Vallentin; B		202
Hibbard, Benjamin Horace; R...		255
Hill, A. A. C., junior, and I. Lubin
British attack on unemployment, the; B		109
Hilton, James
Lost horizon; B...	137; see also letters	222
Hindenburg and the saga of the German republic. E. Ludwig. Translated by E. and C. Paul; B		579

History of national socialism, a. K. Heiden; B.....	227
History of the Roumanians, a. R. W. Seton-Watson; AN.....	694
Hook, Sidney; R.....	195, 747
Horgan, Paul
No quarter given; B.....	366
House divided, a. P. S. Buck; B.....	165
Howe, George F.
Chester A. Arthur. A quarter century of machine politics; B.....	340
Hoyt, Nancy
Elinor Wylie: The portrait of an unknown lady; B.....	488
Hull, Helen
Morning shows the day; AN.....	83
Human exploitation. N. Thomas; B.....	22
Hundred days, the. P. Guedalla; B.....	229
Hunger and revolt. J. Burck; B.....	637
Hungry men, E. Anderson; B.....	578

I

I change worlds. The remaking of an American. A. L. Strong; B.....	513
I love. A. Aydeyenko; B.....	718
In their own image. H. Basso; AN.....	638
In time of peace. T. Boyd; AN.....	609
Introduction to sex education, an. W. V. Richmond; AN.....	55
Irwin, Margaret
Proud servant, the; AN.....	257

J

James, Henry
Art of the novel, the. Introduction by R. P. Blackmur; AN.....	82
Jeans, James, Sir
Through space and time; B.....	79
Jerome, Harry
Mechanization in industry; AN.....	694
Jezebel's daughter. A. R. Craig; B.....	718
Johnson, General Hugh S.
Blue eagle from egg to earth, the; B.....	456
Johnson, James Weldon
Negro Americans, what now? B.....	692
Journeymen. E. Caldwell; B.....	192
Judgment day. J. T. Farrell; B.....	513

K

Kaus, Gina
Catherine: The portrait of an empress. J. Head, translator; B.....	689
Keesing, Felix M.
Modern Samoa, its government and changing life; B.....	690
Kelley, Joseph P.; R.....	394
Kendrick, Benjamin B.; R.....	80
Kenton, Edna; R.....	689
Kingsmill, Hugh
Sentimental journey, the: A life of Charles Dickens; B.....	282
Kirstein, Lincoln
Low ceiling; AN.....	752
Kisch, Egon Erwin
Changing Asia. English version by R. Reil; B.....	424
Kneel to the rising sun. E. Caldwell; AN.....	720
Knittel, John
Via mala; AN.....	138
Kromer, Tom
Waiting for nothing; B.....	365
Krutch, Joseph Wood
Was Europe a success? B.....	108
Krutch, Joseph Wood; R.....	22, 310, 369, 422, 453, 546, 634, 715

L

Labor and the government. A. L. Bernheim; B.....	750
Labor's fight for power. G. E. Sokolsky; R.....	165
Ladies whose bright eyes. F. M. Ford; AN.....	752
La Follette, Suzanne; R.....	637
Lambert, Constant
Music ho! A study of music in decline; B.....	200
Land of promise. L. Lania; AN.....	368
Landtakers. B. Penton; AN.....	722
Lania, Leo
Land of promise; AN.....	368
Laski, Harold J.
State in theory and practice, the; B.....	338
Laver, James
Background for Venus; AN.....	139
Leaders, dreamers and rebels. R. Fülöp-Miller; B.....	489
Lean men. R. Bates; B.....	366
Lee, Robert E., biography. D. S. Freeman. Volumes III and IV; B.....	254
Letters of Gamaliel Bradford, the, 1918 to 1931. Edited by Van Wyck Brooks; B.....	24
Letters of Laurence Sterne. Edited by L. P. Curtis; AN.....	582
Lewis, C. Day
Collected poems; B.....	311
Light from Arcturus. M. Walker; AN.....	367
Lightship. A. Binns; B.....137; see also C.....	223

- Lincoln, Victoria
February hill; B..... 137
- Linklater, Eric
Ripeness is all; B..... 718
- Literature and dialectical materialism. J.
Strachey; B..... 51
- Little era in old Russia. I. Skariatina;
AN..... 313
- Livingston, Arthur; R..... 134, 199
- Lloyd George, David
War memoirs. Volume IV., 1917; B.. 53
- Loeb, Harold, and associates
Chart of plenty, the. A study of America's product capacity based on the findings of the National survey of potential product capacity; B..... 486
- Longaker, Mark
Contemporary biography; AN..... 693
- Lore, Ludwig; R..... 79, 227, 579
- Lost horizon. J. Hilton; B..... 137; see also letters..... 222
- Low ceiling. L. Kirstein; AN..... 752
- Lowenstein, Prince Hubertus
Tragedy of a nation, the. 1918-1934; B 79
- Lowenthal, Marvin
Autobiography of Montaigne, the; B.... 310
- Lubin, Isador, and A. A. C. Hill, junior
British attack on unemployment, the; B 109
- Ludwig, Emil
Hindenburg and the saga of the German republic; B..... 579
- Luhan, Mabel Dodge
Winter in Taos; AN..... 516
- M
- MacLeish, Archibald
Panic..... 369
- Madách, Imre
Tragedy of man, the. C. Meltzer and P. Vajda, translators; B..... 690
- Malraux, André
Royal way, the; B..... 254
- Man who had everything, the. L. Bromfield; AN..... 724
- Mann, Thomas
Young Joseph; B..... 606
- Martin, Everett Dean
Farewell to revolution; B..... 393
- Mary Peters. M. E. Chase; B..... 137
- Masterman, Sylvia
Origins of international rivalry in Samoa, the, 1845-1884; B..... 690
- Matthews, J. B., and R. E. Shallcross
Partners in plunder; B..... 394
- Matveev, Michel
Weep not for the dead; AN..... 582
- Maurois, André
Dickens; B..... 282
- McCarthy, Mary; R..... 137 (see also letters..... 222), 283, 312, 366, 424, 718
- McCleary, Dorothy
Not for heaven; B..... 578
- McKinley, Silas Bent
Democracy and military powers. Introduction by C. A. Beard; B..... 284
- Mead, George H.
Mind, self and society; B..... 195
- Mead, Margaret
Sex and temperament in three primitive societies; B..... 634
- Mead, Margaret; R..... 690
- Mechanization in industry. H. Jerome; AN 694
- Memory of love. B. Breuer; AN..... 138
- Mencken, H. L.; R..... 622
- Merriam, Charles E.
Political power; B..... 110
- Michael, George
Handout; B..... 606
- Michaud, Régis
Modern thought and literature in France; AN..... 83
- Millis, Walter
Road to war. America: 1914-1917; B.. 550
- Milton, George Fort
Eve of conflict, the. Stephen A. Douglas and the needless war; B..... 52
- Milton, George Fort; R..... 254
- Mind and society, the. V. Pareto. Edited by A. Livingston, translated by Livingston and Bongiorno; B..... 757
- Mind, self and society. G. H. Mead; B..... 195
- Modern fiction. D. Brewster and A. Burrell; B..... 199
- Modern housing. C. Bauer; B..... 228
- Modern Samoa, its government and changing life. F. M. Keesing; B..... 690
- Modern things. Edited by P. Tyler; AN.... 82
- Modern thought and literature in France. R. Michaud; AN..... 83
- Monroe, Harriet
Chosen poems; AN..... 694
- Montaigne, autobiography. M. Lowenthal; B..... 310
- Moore, Marianna
Selected poems. With introduction by T. S. Eliot; B..... 458
- Morals and politics. E. F. Carritt; B..... 580
- Morning shows the day. H. Hull; AN.... 83
- Morse, Robert; R..... 25
- Moulton, Harold G.
Formation of capital, the; B..... 577
- Murray, Merrill G., and others
Program for unemployment insurance and relief in the United States, a; B..... 54
- Music ho! A study of music in decline. C. Lambert; B..... 200
- Must we fight in Asia? N. Pfeffer; B..... 462
- Muzzey, David Saville; R..... 52
- Myself. J. R. Commons; B..... 751
- N
- Napoleon, two books on; B..... 229
- Napoleon's letters to Marie Louise. With a commentary by C. de la Roncière; B. 608
- Narrow land, the. E. Reynard; AN..... 609
- Nathan, Robert
Road of ages; B..... 228
- National velvet. E. Bagnold; B..... 663
- Nature of capitalist crisis, the. J. Strachey; B..... 310
- Neagoe, Peter
Winning a wife; B..... 636
- Neff, Emery; R..... 515
- Negro Americans, what now? J. W. Johnson; B..... 692
- Neumann, Alfred
Another Caesar. E. and C. Paul, translators; B..... 133
- Neville, Helen; R..... 488, 690, 720
- New Temple Shakespeare, the. Edited by M. R. Ridley; AN..... 582
- Newborg, Katherine
Out of that dream; B..... 717
- Newhouse, Edward
You can't sleep here; AN..... 82
- Niebuhr, Reinhold; R..... 338, 393, 580
- No quarter given. P. Horgan; B..... 366
- No thanks. E. E. Cummings; R..... 749
- No traveller returns. J. Auslander; AN.... 693
- Noble, G. Bernard
Policies and opinions at Paris, 1919; B. 515
- Nomad, Max; R..... 489
- Nordhoff, Charles, and J. N. Hall
Pitcairn's island; AN..... 138
- Not for heaven. D. McCleary; B..... 578
- "Nothing like leather." V. S. Pritchett; AN 752
- O
- Odin grows up. O. Duun. Translated by A. G. Chater; AN..... 368
- Of time and the river. T. Wolfe; B..... 365
- O'Hara, John
Doctor's son, the; AN..... 368
- Olson, Elder
Thing of sorrow; B..... 54
- Origins of international rivalry in Samoa, the, 1845-1884. S. Masterman; B.... 690
- Out of that dream. K. Newborg; B..... 717
- P
- Palmer, Frederick
Bliss, peacemaker. The life and letters of General Tasker Howard Bliss; B.. 635
- Panic. A. MacLeish..... 369
- Papa Pasquier. G. Duhamel; B..... 81
- Pareto, Vilfredo
Mind and society, the. Edited by A. Livingston, translated by Livingston and Bongiorno; B..... 747
- Parkes, H. B.; R..... 166, 487, 607
- Parshley, H. M.; R..... 338
- Partners in plunder. J. B. Matthews and R. E. Shallcross; B..... 394
- Paths of glory. H. Cobb; B..... 716
- Peace and the plain man. N. Angell; B.... 515
- Pearson, Drew, and C. Brown
American diplomatic game, the; B..... 194
- Peattie, Donald Culross
Almanac for moderns, an; B..... 546
- Pfeffer, Nathaniel
Must we fight in Asia; B..... 462
- Penton, Brian
Landtakers; AN..... 722
- People's king, the. J. Buchan; B..... 607
- Permanence and change. K. Burke; B.... 453
- Permit me voyage. J. Agee; B..... 109
- Personal history. V. Sheehan; B..... 282
- Pirandello, Luigi
Better think twice about it and twelve other stories. A. and H. Mayne, translators; B..... 134
- Pitcairn's island. C. Nordhoff and J. N. Hall; AN..... 138
- Poacher, the. H. E. Bates; B..... 718
- Poems, et cetera. D. Greenwood; B.... 396; correction of price..... 640
- Poet in exile. A. Vallentin; B..... 202
- Policies and opinions at Paris, 1919. G. B. Noble; B..... 515
- Political power. C. E. Merriam; B..... 110
- Pope, Alexander, early career of. G. Sherburn; B..... 22
- Popular practice of fraud, the. T. S. Harding; B..... 394
- Porter, Katherine Anne
Hacienda; AN..... 369
- Price of peace, the: The challenge of economic nationalism. F. H. Simonds and B. Emeny; B..... 515
- Pritchett, V. S.
"Nothing like leather"; AN..... 752
- Problems of the new Cuba. Report of the commission on Cuban affairs; B..... 196
- Problems of the Pacific, 1933. Proceedings of the fifth conference of the Institute of Pacific relations, Banff, 1933; B..... 24
- Program for unemployment insurance and relief in the United States, a. A. H. Hansen, M. G. Murray, R. A. Stevenson, and B. M. Stewart; B..... 54
- Proud servant, the. M. Irwin; AN..... 257
- Provence. From minstrels to the machine. F. M. Ford; AN..... 553
- Pylon. W. Faulkner; B..... 393
- Q
- Queen Victoria. E. F. Benson; B..... 487
- R
- R. E. Lee. D. S. Freeman. Volumes III and IV; B..... 254
- Rats, lice and history. H. Zinsser; B..... 338
- Reed, Joseph Verner
Curtain falls, the; B..... 422
- Reign of George V., the. D. C. Somervell; B..... 607
- Reis, Lincoln; R..... 691
- Reshaping agriculture. O. W. Willcox. Foreword by A. Johnson; B..... 255
- Reynard, Elizabeth
Narrow land, the; AN..... 609
- Rice, Philip Blair; R..... 397, 458, 662
- Rich man, poor man. R. A. Goslin and O. P. Goslin; B..... 663
- Richards, I. A.
Coleridge on imagination; B..... 423
- Richmond, Winifred V.
Introduction to sex education, an; AN.. 55
- Ridge, Lola
Dance of fire; B..... 662
- Riding the mustang trail. F. Blake; B.... 425
- Ripeness is all. E. Linklater; B..... 718
- Rivera, José Eustasio
Vortex, the. Translated by E. K. James; B..... 749
- Road of ages. R. Nathan; B..... 228
- Road to war. America: 1914-1917. W. Millis; B..... 550
- Roberts, Elizabeth Madox
He sent forth a raven; B..... 364
- Roll river. J. Boyd; R..... 580
- Roth, Henry
Call it sleep; B..... 255
- Rourke, Constance; R..... 458
- Royal way, the. A. Malraux; B..... 254
- S
- Samoa, two books on; B..... 690
- Scenes from the mesozoic. C. Day; AN.... 694
- Schwimmer, Rosika; R..... 664
- Seagle, William; R..... 284, 581
- Selected poems of Marianna Moore. With introduction by T. S. Eliot; B..... 458
- Sentimental journey, the: A life of Charles Dickens. H. Kingsmill; B..... 282
- Seton-Watson, R. W.
History of the Roumanians, a; AN... 694
- Sex and temperament in three primitive societies. M. Mead; B..... 634
- Shakespeare, William
Hamlet. Edited by J. D. Wilson; AN..... 398; see also C..... 482
- Shakespeare, the new Temple. Edited by M. R. Ridley; AN..... 582
- Shallcross, R. E., and J. B. Matthews
Partners in plunder; B..... 394
- Shapley, Harlow; R..... 79
- Sharman, Lyon
Sun Yat-sen, his life and its meaning. A critical biography; B..... 396
- Sheehan, Vincent
Personal history; B..... 282
- Sherburn, George
Early career of Alexander Pope, the; B..... 22
- Shipmates. I. Carter; B..... 137; see also C..... 222
- Shorter history of England, A. H. Belloc; B 166
- Shoulder the sky. J. Gray; AN..... 609
- Siesta. B. Fleming; AN..... 517
- Silver collar boy. C. Wright; AN..... 554
- Simkhovitch, Mary Kingsbury; R..... 635
- Simonds, Frank H.; R..... 194
- Simonds, Frank H., and B. Emeny
Price of peace, the: The challenge of economic nationalism; B..... 515
- Sir Richard Steele. W. Connelly; AN..... 26
- Skariatina, Irina
Little era in old Russia; AN..... 313
- Slesinger, Tess
Time: The present; B..... 716
- Smedley, Agnes; R..... 24

- Sokolsky, George E.
Labor's fight for power; B 165
- Somervell, D. C.
Reign of George V., the; B 607
- Soviet journey. L. Fischer; B 460
- Spender, Stephen
Vienna; B 311
- State in theory and practice, the. H. J. Laski; B 338
- Steele, Sir Richard, biography. W. Connely; AN 26
- Steinbeck, John
Tortilla flat; B 720
- Sterne, Laurence, letters of. Edited by L. P. Curtis; AN 582
- Stevenson, Russell A., and others
Program for unemployment insurance and relief in the United States, a; B 54
- Stewart, Bryce M., and others
Program for unemployment insurance and relief in the United States, a; B 54
- Stewart, Maxwell S.; R...22, 424, 462, 577, 663
- Stieglitz, Alfred. America and Alfred Stieglitz. A collective portrait. Edited by W. Frank, L. Mumford, D. Norman, P. Rosenfeld, and H. Rugg; B 110
- Stillman, Clara Gruening; R...134, 422, 513, 634
- Stolberg, Benjamin; R 456
- Stolberg, Benjamin, and W. J. Vinton
Economic consequences of the new deal, the; B 164
- Stong, Philip
Week end; AN 257
- Storm, the. O. Duun. Translated by A. G. Chater; AN 368
- Strachey, John
Literature and dialectical materialism; B 51
- Nature of capitalist crisis, the; B 310
- Strange holiness. R. P. T. Coffin; AN 664
- Strong, Anna Louise
I change worlds. The remaking of an American; B 513
- Sun Yat-sen, his life and its meaning. A critical biography. L. Sharman; B... 396
- Susan and Joanna. E. Cambridge; B 718
- Swing, Raymond Gram
Forerunners of American fascism; B... 546
- Swing, Raymond Gram; R 109, 606
- T
- Tale of a shipwreck, the. J. N. Hall; AN... 138
- Talk United States! R. Whitcomb; B 549
- Tapley, Roberts; R 691
- Taps at reveille. F. S. Fitzgerald; B 454
- Tate, Allen; R 339
- Tearless glass, a. L. Grudin; B 286
- Thing of sorrow. E. Olson; B 54
- Thomas, Norman
Human exploitation; B 22
- Thomas, Norman; R 310, 546
- Through space and time. Sir J. Jeans; B... 79
- Time is ripe, the. W. Greenwood; AN... 609
- Time out of mind. R. Field; B 514
- Time: The present. T. Slesinger; B 716
- Tortilla flat. J. Steinbeck; B 720
- Tragedy of a nation, the. 1918-1934. Prince H. Lowenstein; B 79
- Tragedy of man, the. I. Madách. Translated by C. Meltzer and P. Vajda; B 690
- Transients, the. M. Van Doren; B 134
- Trilling, Lionel; R 24
- Troy, William; R...51, 192, 254, 282, 311, 393, 454, 513, 606, 715
- Tugwell, Rexford Guy
Battle for democracy, the; B 78
- Turner, Frederick Jackson
United States, 1830-1850, the; B 458
- Two sources of morality and religion, the. H. Bergson. Translated by R. A. Audra and C. Brereton. With the assistance of W. H. Carter; B 691
- U
- United States, 1830-1850, the. F. J. Turner; B 458
- Unknown quantity, the. H. Broch. Translated by W. and E. Muir; AN 722
- V
- Vallentin, Antonina
Poet in exile; B 202
- Van de Water, Frederic F.
Glory hunter, the. A life of General Custer; B 23
- Van Doren, Carl; R 364
- Van Doren, Dorothy; R 284
- Van Doren, Mark
Transients, the; B 134
- Winter diary and other poems, a; B 339
- Van Doren, Mark; R 133, 165, 364, 514, 578, 717
- Via mala. J. Knittel; AN 138
- Victoria, Queen, biography. E. F. Benson; B... 487
- Vidocq: The personal memoirs of the first great detective. Edited and translated by E. G. Rich; AN 664
- Vienna. S. Spender; B 311
- Villard, Oswald Garrison; R...23, 340, 635, 748
- Vinogradov, Anatolii
Black consul, the; B 312
- Vinton, Warren Jay, and B. Stolberg
Economic consequences of the new deal, the; B 164
- Vivas, Eliseo; R 487
- Vortex, the. J. E. Rivera. Translated by E. K. James; B 749
- W
- Wade, Mason; R 663
- Waiting for nothing. T. Kromer; B 365
- Walker, Mildred
Light from Arcturus; AN 367
- Walton, Eda Lou; R 23, 54, 136, 425, 460
- War memoirs of David Lloyd George. Volume IV. 1917; B 53
- Ward, Lester, diary. Edited by B. J. Stern; AN 516
- Ware, Caroline F.
Greenwich village; B 635
- Was Europe a success? J. W. Krutch; B... 108
- We are betrayed. V. Fisher; B 136
- Week end. P. Stong; AN 257
- Weep not for the dead. M. Matveev; AN... 582
- Westerling. T. H. Ferril; AN 584
- Wheels and butterflies. W. B. Yeats; B... 397
- Whitcomb, Robert
Talk United States! B 549
- Why wars must cease. C. C. Catt and others; B 664
- Wilder, Thornton
Heaven's my destination; B 135
- Willcox, O. W.
Reshaping agriculture. Foreword by A. Johnson; B 255
- Wilson, John Dover, editor
Hamlet; AN 398
- Winkler, Jean; R 749
- Winning a wife. P. Neagoe; B 636
- Winter diary and other poems, a. M. Van Doren; B 339
- Winter in Taos. M. D. Luban; AN 516
- Wisn, Joseph E.
Cuban crisis as reflected in the New York press, the, 1895-1898; B 256
- Wolf at the door, the. R. Francis. Translated by F. Delisle; B 715
- Wolfe, Thomas
Of time and the river; B 365
- Women must work. R. Aldington; AN 26
- World outside, the. H. Fallada; B 284
- World to win, a. J. Conroy; B 607
- World went mad, the. J. Brophy; AN... 399
- Wotton, Tom S.
Hector Berlioz; B 689
- Wright, Constance
Silver collar boy; AN 554
- Wubnig, Arthur; R 165, 486
- Wylie, Elinor, biography. N. Hoyt; B 488
- Y
- Yeats, William Butler
Wheels and butterflies; B 397
- Yellow bell, the: Brief sketch of the history of Chinese music. Chao Mei Pa; AN... 55
- You can't sleep here. E. Newhouse; AN... 82
- Young Joseph. T. Mann; B 606
- Young Ward's diary. Edited by B. J. Stern; AN 516
- Z
- Zara, Louis
Blessed is the man; B 718
- Zinsser, Hans
Rats, lice and history; B 338

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	1
THE NATION'S HONOR ROLL FOR 1934	3
EDITORIALS:
A Message to Congress	4
Confusion in Germany	5
Lo, the Poor Utilities!	5
For Art's Sake	6
ISSUES AND MEN. MIDDLE WEST AND TEXAS IN DECEMBER. By Oswald Garrison Villard
CARTOON: HANDSOME ADOLF'S ROMANCE. By LOW	■
FATHER COUGHLIN. II. THE PHASE OF ACTION. By Raymond Gram Swing	9
RUSSIA ABOLISHES BREAD CARDS. By Louis Fischer	11
IN SUPPORT OF THE CONSTITUTION. By Carl Becker	13
THE INDIA REPORT. By Harold J. Laski	14
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	15
CORRESPONDENCE	16
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	18
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
The Steel Barons "Mediate." By Rose M. Stein	19
Steadier Jobs in Automobiles	21
BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS:
Mr. Pope. By Joseph Wood Krutch	22
A Handbook of Injustice. By Maxwell S. Stewart	22
The Pursuit of Glory. By Oswald Garrison Villard	23
A College Poet. By Eda Lou Walton	23
Gamaliel Bradford. By Lionel Trilling	24
"Peace and Order" in China. By Agnes Smedley	24
Looking at Pictures. By Robert Morse	25
Shorter Notices	26
Drama: Holiday Suggestions. By Joseph Wood Krutch	26
Films: Chaliapin's Don Quixote. By William Troy	27

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

LIBERTY IS A BIG WORD. Add American and you have a façade so imposing and opaque that one automobile magnate and three munitions manufacturers can hide behind it with scarcely a motive showing. The American Liberty League, "a non-partisan group," was founded last August to preserve constitutional rights, among others "the right to work, earn, save, and acquire property." At the December 20 performance of the munitions hearings—that hit of the Washington season in which the insurgent impresario from North Dakota is presenting the Three du Ponts in a little skit under Senate auspices—the cradle of the American Liberty League was revealed for the first time as being somewhere in Delaware. "You haven't much to do," wrote John J. Raskob last March to R. R. M. Carpenter, retired vice-president of E. I. du Pont de Nemours and Company, "and I know of no one that could better take the lead in trying to induce the du Pont and General Motors groups . . . to definitely organize to protect society from the suffering which it is bound to endure if we allow communistic elements to lead the people to believe that all business men are crooks and that no one should be allowed to get rich." The organization, he continued, should encourage people to work and to get rich; and he concluded by saying, "Pierre, as a citizen, has set us a fine example. . . ." Pierre as a Citizen was followed by a sketch of Pierre and His Brothers as Munitions Makers, in which Senator Nye produced this letter from Major Casey of the du Pont Company to its Paris agent:

You must realize that our price schedule on rifle-powder sales to the United States government is 71 cents a pound. . . . The prices you have quoted figure, in the instance of sales to England, a gross selling price . . . of 54½ cents and in the instance of Belgium, of a price of 57.6 cents. . . . Since our sales to the United States total approximately 700,000 pounds of rifle powder annually, we cannot take the chance of this reduced figure being divulged.

At the same hearing it was disclosed that the du Pont Company made a net profit of $228,731,000 from 1915 to 1918 and paid salaries and bonuses of $225,015,000. Pierre, as Mr. Raskob said, has set us a fine example.

JAPAN'S ACTION in abrogating the Washington naval treaty marks the end of the first serious attempt at the international restriction of armaments. It is important to recall that the pact was concluded in conjunction with the Nine-Power Treaty, and that together the two agreements represented an effort to stabilize the status quo in the Pacific. Like all political documents, these pacts were the outcome of a compromise. The United States, which was at the time engaged in a huge naval building program, agreed to grant Japan a 5-3 ratio and to refrain from building fortifications in the Pacific, while Japan, in exchange, accepted in principle the territorial integrity of China and the Open Door policy. This agreement was broken, not by Japan's recent repudiation of the 5-3 ratio, but by its invasion of Manchuria in 1931. The subsequent fortification of its Pacific mandates in violation of the agreement with the League further destroyed the basis of the 1922 compromise. That the arrangement as a whole has proved a failure is evident. It has not restrained Japan from pursuing its imperialist course in Asia, nor has it prevented a race in naval armaments. The cause of the failure, however, would appear to lie in peculiar qualities of Japanese psychology and in the turbulent domestic situation in that country rather than in any inherent flaw in international agreements.

DESPITE PREMIER FLANDIN'S widely heralded recovery measures, it is evident that economic conditions in France are rapidly drifting from bad to worse. The recent closing of the Citroën automobile factory, one of the largest in Europe, because of acute financial difficulties is but a symptom of general economic deterioration. In the first week of December registered unemployment reached a record high of 385,000, and this figure is said to represent less than one-quarter of the actual number of jobless. Industrial production is falling, and bankruptcies are the highest of any period in the depression. Wholesale prices have declined 12 per cent in the past year without, however, bringing any appreciable reduction in France's abnormally high cost of living. In agriculture the situation remains grave, though the Flandin government has introduced measures somewhat akin to the Roosevelt AAA program in an effort to prevent further overproduction of wheat and grapes. Only one industry appears to be flourishing and that—the arms trade—must, according to Premier Flandin, be accelerated at all costs. Despite the furor for government economy, the Chamber of Deputies recently approved a supplementary appropriation of 800,000,000 francs for defense, the bulk of which is to go directly to the munition firms.

ANOTHER THREE DOZEN or so bills have just been passed by the Louisiana "legislature," with Senator Long cracking the whip. Through a state budget commission, which he will of course control, the Senator now has complete power over the 15,000 school teachers in the state. Moreover, Long, in accordance with his plan to turn Louisiana into a single province governed by him, has abolished, through his Senate Finance Committee, local self-government in East Baton Rouge and has announced his intention in the near future of proceeding in like manner with the city of Baton Rouge. He also forced through both houses a bill, which the lawmakers had formerly rejected, removing from office the mayor and two commissioners of Alexandria, a city of 23,000 persons (who had, to be sure, duly elected their city officials), and levied a general and sweeping manufacturers' tax on every commodity except ice, bread, and milk. The third special session of the Louisiana Legislature thereupon adjourned sine die without having gone contrary to the wishes of Senator Long one single time. In the general chorus of meek acquiescence to the whims of King Huey there was one lone dissenting voice. A hero named G. W. Lester—may his fame be writ in enduring bronze!—rose and denounced his fellow-legislators as "putty-faced stooges" for accepting the Long program without a protest. When you count in the two journalism students at Louisiana State University, and Biff Jones, coach of the university football team, that makes at least four men in the state who are not afraid of the Louisiana Hitler.

FOR ABOUT TWELVE HOURS on December 19 there was civil war in Shelbyville, Tennessee, when a mob attempted to take a Negro prisoner, accused of the rape of a fourteen-year-old white girl, from the courthouse and was repulsed by the National Guard. Three of the mob were killed and a number seriously injured in the fracas; and when the militia had temporarily retreated after conveying the Negro to Nashville, the attacking party formed again and burned the courthouse to the ground. Out of this desperate and bloody story stand the important facts that the law was upheld, and that the Governor, Hill McAlister, when advised that violence was imminent and a lynching would be attempted, was courageous enough to order out the troops to protect the prisoner and the court. There are instances recorded of lynching mobs which were repulsed by a determined sheriff with a pistol; that the Shelbyville rioters could be conquered only by tear gas and machine-gun bullets is perhaps to be accounted for by the increasingly bitter economic competition between Southern whites and Negroes for the few jobs that exist. Race prejudice has been heightened by unemployment and starvation, as it undoubtedly was in the recent torture and lynching of Claude Neal in Florida. All possible credit is due to Governor McAlister for preventing a repetition of that nightmare; but both the Marianna and the Shelbyville episodes should result in enormous pressure on Congress for the enactment early in the coming session of a federal anti-lynching law.

WHEN GENERAL DOUGLAS MACARTHUR brought suit for libel against the Washington Times Company, as publishers of the Washington Herald, and against Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen, co-conductors of the Washington Merry-Go-Round, a column in that newspaper (and some 250 others), the case was front-page news all around the country. The sum involved was an impressive one for even a Chief of Staff to demand—$1,750,000. The alleged libel lay in several statements by the columnists intimating that the General had pulled political wires to insure his reappointment and had otherwise conducted himself in ways unbecoming a high-ranking army officer. The suit was news for other reasons. In "City Editor," Stanley Walker of the New York Herald Tribune pointed to its importance as a test to determine the freedom of newspapers to comment on public officials. It was even rumored that men high in the ranks of the government were strongly, though not openly, backing the prosecution. Now the General has withdrawn his suit. The Editor and Publisher duly noted the fact and quoted a statement from Messrs. Pearson and Allen in which they said: "No money was paid by us to General MacArthur. . . . No apologies or retractions were given or asked for. Our position in the case is the same as it was when the General first filed suit, namely, that we stood ready to prove the truth of all that we had published." They also pointed out that "the abandonment of the suit emphasizes more clearly than ever the wide latitude which, under a free press, must be allowed for criticism of public officials." But in spite of this quite obvious moral, the General's retirement was not mentioned in the New York Times and was given little more than an inch in the Herald Tribune.

S. KLEIN, owner of the famous dress cafeteria on Union Square, New York, is having labor trouble. Specifically he is charged by the regional labor board with discharging sixty-four employees in November for union activity. The case was referred to Washington because the regional board has been unable to make a settlement, and Mr. Klein went personally to Washington to appear before the National Labor Relations Board. According to testimony before the regional board, Mr. Klein went to great lengths to keep "my kids," as he calls his employees, from self-organization: he intimidated employees who cast a friendly eye at the union and established an espionage system. The store has been picketed by the dismissed employees since the trouble began; their ranks have been kept more than full by the labor sympathizers to whom Union Square is unofficial headquarters; and a crisis occurred on December 18 when pickets and police met in a good old-fashioned Union Square "clash," in which fourteen pickets were arrested. Next to his low prices Mr. Klein is most noted for his elaborate precautions for preventing his customers from stealing clothes. His feeling toward labor unions and customers who steal seems to be the same. It might be stated simply as "God help those who help themselves."

The Nation's Honor Roll for 1934

FOR the seventh time The Nation offers a list of Americans who have distinguished themselves in various fields during the past year. Some of these persons have accomplished important and enduring work; others have merely shown personal courage and commendable adherence to high principles in particular situations. All of them are worthy of the appreciation of their fellow-citizens.

LLOYD K. GARRISON, for his excellent work as head of the National Labor Relations Board. Under his chairmanship the board faced squarely the basic issue of union recognition and defined it in a series of unequivocal decisions (most of them unhappily not yet enforced).

FRANCIS BIDDLE, who showed himself to be a worthy successor to Lloyd Garrison as chairman of the National Labor Relations Board when he and his colleagues decided the Jennings case on its merits and refused to back down before the concerted attack of the entire American press.

The EDITORIAL STAFF of Fortune, for their articles on the munitions industry, which stimulated the important Senatorial investigation of the subject.

DOROTHY DETZER, executive secretary of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, for persuading, almost single-handed, the progressive Senate leaders to demand an inquiry into the arms trade, and for her many realistic activities in the interest of peace.

GERALD P. NYE, Senator from North Dakota, for his courage in demanding and his skill in conducting the investigation of the munitions industry.

MARY VAN KLEECK, for her brilliant analysis of the causes of social insecurity before the National Conference of Social Work, and for initiating one of the first practical attempts to remove this insecurity through social planning.

FERDINAND PECORA, for his skill in marshaling and presenting before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency evidence proving the illegal and socially destructive operations of our financial high-binders.

CHARLOTTE CARR, Secretary of Labor and Industry of the State of Pennsylvania, and CORNELIA BRYCE PINCHOT, for unflagging support of labor's fight for the benefits and rights promised by the New Deal.

UPTON SINCLAIR, who not only enlivened an otherwise dull election by his spectacular campaign for the governorship of California, but in so doing revealed the unscrupulous nature of the economic group at present controlling that state's destinies.

ROBERT M. AND PHILIP LA FOLLETTE, for their persistence and skill in establishing the new Progressive Party in Wisconsin and carrying it to victory a few months after its organization.

GEORGE W. NORRIS, Senator from Nebraska, for winning the people of his state to support an extraordinary experiment, the abolition of their bi-cameral legislature and the substitution of a single house of not more than twenty-five members.

HEYWOOD BROWN, whose role as president and chief defender of a trade union for newspaper reporters is probably the most ingratiating and important of his long career.

JAMES BRYANT CONANT, president of Harvard University, for his forthright letter refusing the scholarship offered to Harvard by Ernst Hanfstaengl, Hitler's right-hand man.

JOHN L. SPIVAK, for doing, in the New Masses, a lively and convincing job of muckraking, in nine articles revealing the extent and character of anti-Semitic Nazi propaganda in the United States.

JESSE H. CUTLER, student of Louisiana State University, who resigned his editorship of the campus newspaper, and, with DAVID R. MCGUIRE, was distinguished by being dismissed from the university for daring to criticize Louisiana's little autocrat, Huey Long.

JOHN WECHSLER, editor of the Columbia Spectator, for his able and courageous journalistic attack on all forms of reaction at the university.

CONSTANCE ROURKE, author of "Davy Crockett," who continues to apply great imaginative gifts and her talent for creative research to the important but little-heralded task of incorporating American backgrounds into American consciousness.

LOUIS ADAMIC, for "The Native's Return," which happily combines the best features of literature and propaganda.

EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY, for "Wine from These Grapes," in which is demonstrated her capacity to sustain and develop her lyric inspiration.

PEGGY BACON, for "Off with Their Heads!" a volume of caricatures each accompanied by a brief word picture as witty and incisive as the drawings themselves.

THE GROUP THEATER, for its consistent and successful effort to take seriously all the arts of the theater, and, specifically, for its current production, "Gold Eagle Guy."

THE THEATER UNION, for steady progress in creating a "revolutionary theater" in which artistic integrity is not disregarded, and, specifically, for its production of "Steve-dore" and "Sailors of Cattaro."

HAROLD C. UREY, of Columbia University, for the discovery of "heavy water"—an achievement which not only is of great interest to pure scientists but seems to open up a new field of investigation likely to produce important practical results in medicine.

G. V. McCAULEY and J. C. HOSTETTER of the Corning Glass Works, whose skill and patience were largely responsible for the successful casting of a 200-inch mirror—the most difficult single feat in the construction of a new telescope which will put into the hands of astronomers an instrument far superior in penetrating power to any now in existence.

A Message to Congress

(Which the President Might Read to It)

TO THE CONGRESS: I come before you at the opening of the Seventy-fourth Congress deeply imbued with the profound responsibility placed upon me and the majority party by the result of the last election. It went far beyond any personal or party tribute; it was a vote of confidence, I believe, less in men than in the measures the Administration has advocated for the purpose of restoring prosperity and of giving relief to the millions of our fellow-citizens and their families who are still without the means of support by their own labor. I should be less than human, however, if I were not moved to the depths of my being by my share in this unprecedented popular approval of what we have tried to do and have done. For my own part, may I take this opportunity to say most solemnly that I accept it as a mandate to proceed with our double task, first, of assuring a return to normal conditions, and, second, of modernizing our political and economic life, with complete social justice as our beacon-light?

That the problems before us are so vital and far-reaching as inevitably to make this session of Congress one of historic importance must be clear to you as to me. Some of the questions to be settled will profoundly affect the national development for years to come. They cannot be answered in a short time, nor should they be decided with undue haste. The decreased minority in Congress makes it incumbent upon the majority to proceed with circumspection and care. Primarily, the Congress must decide the fundamental issue of the relations of labor and industry. This brings up at once the question of the permanence of any or some of the features of the National Industrial Recovery Act, which, as you are aware, expires by your limitation on June 16 next. To me, labor's retention of the right to collective bargaining and the duty of capital to deal with representatives of labor's own choosing remain the fundamental points in the reorganization of our economic life. I believe that labor should have equal weight with capital, and I am determined to bring to book those corporations which, after having solemnly signed their names to the codes for their businesses, are refusing to honor their signatures by obeying the law, and are seeking to defy the government itself. There is no more important duty before the Executive than to make it clear to the entire country that the government of the United States cannot be defied successfully by any individual, any corporation, or any group. The issue of how far government supervision over industry shall go is squarely before you. I believe that it must be sufficient to guarantee justice for labor, and the blocking of any further drift toward an economic oligarchy or toward monopoly.

The next most important field for your consideration is that of social security. In my message to you of June 8 I notified you of my plan to ask for unemployment insurance and old-age pensions. Specific bills covering these subjects accompany this message. I lay them before you as a basis for your consideration. The beginning of complete social security for the American citizen must no longer be postponed. It is for you to decide finally the details of unemployment insurance—how much industry shall be taxed for its support, who shall administer it. It is also imperative that you go a step farther and draft adequate legislation for insurance for the sick and the aged. In my message of June 8 I asked for authority for the modernization of existing homes and the building of new homes. The measures voted by your honorable body have made possible great advances. As I am not satisfied with our progress in this field, I hereby promise you that every effort will be made to double the speed of construction with the definite goal of a decent home for every American and the elimination of all slums. A British Minister has lately declared that there will not be a slum left in England after five years. Shall we lag behind Great Britain in achieving this great end? Again, it would in my judgment be a profound error to fail to embody in our permanent legislation minimum wages, shorter working hours, elimination of the sweatshop and, above all, of child labor. It is my earnest hope that the several states will ratify without delay the child-labor amendment to the Constitution and thereby bring us up to an equality in this matter with other countries. American childhood must be kept out of mine, factory, and field; it must not be exploited for private gain.

There is still another and a specific issue of profound import to which I invite your attention. The passage of the Costigan-Wagner anti-lynching bill is an immediate duty. It cannot have escaped your attention that our national honor has been foully besmirched by the recent lynching of Claude Neal, a Negro, near Greenwood, Florida. This prisoner was in the law's hands; his guilt was certain and confessed. The mob which took him from the jail advertised its purpose and accomplished it with a sadistic fury, an obscene barbarity, which make the printing of all the details an impossibility. Shocking as was the murder of the prisoner's victim, the fiendish conduct of the mob makes it impossible for Americans to point the finger of scorn at lawlessness anywhere in the world. It stains our flag, as it tarnishes our honor. I cannot guarantee that the Costigan-Wagner bill will stamp out mob murder, but I do know that it will give to the United States government some of the powers it needs to check this evil, which in its importance overshadows the government's war against gangsters, bootleggers, and the other organized elements among our criminals. The killing of four citizens at Shelbyville, Tennessee, last month by troops, in order to prevent the lynching of an American citizen accused of crime, is still further proof of the menace of this lawlessness to our national life.

Our goal is plain. It is the creation of a more ideal economic order. There shall be in the United States special privilege for none, economic equality for all, with the motive of private profit subordinated to the general welfare. That the road lies open, the field ready for cultivation, is obvious. The spirit of the Tennessee Valley Authority, which I have promised shall rise in every state, is the best pledge of that.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

Confusion in Germany

SINCE early December it has been apparent that the heavy industries and the Reichswehr are preparing for a new advance against the National Socialist regime. General von Fritsch, chief of the Reichswehr, presented a memorandum to the Chancellor which has been compared to Papen's speech of June 19. The Reichswehr insists that the semi-military party organizations, the SA and the SS, be still further shorn of power and importance. In line with these protests, there are rumors of Blomberg's impending retirement and the appointment of Göring as Minister of Defense in his place. Göring is looked upon as the man to clean up the SA; and because of his close connections with the Junkers and the big industrialists he can be relied on to do the bidding of those elements. But Göring's appointment to this highly important post would aggravate factional strife among the National Socialist Party heads to a degree which might lead to another June 30.

The Reichswehr knows the importance of going along with Hitler and Göring, the two men who created the political basis for German rearmament. But its leaders hold that the integrity of the troops must suffer if the new recruits continue as heretofore to be forced into the Nazi fold. It is generally admitted that there are many former Social Democrats and Communists among the men now being recruited from the SA and the Steel Helmets into the Reichswehr, men who have demonstrated that they cannot be won for the Nazi cause. The Reichswehr is also decidedly opposed to National Socialist political instruction in the army, under the direction of Minister of Propaganda Goebbels.

More important still as a symptom of the shift in National Socialist policy is the pensioning off of Gottfried Feder, author of the original National Socialist program. In "My Battle" Hitler attributes to Feder "everything I have learned of the necessity of a national revolution." Immediately after the Führer's appointment to the Chancellorship, Feder was made undersecretary in the Ministry of Economics, where he soon came into conflict with his chief, Dr. Karl Schmitt. He was removed from the ministry and given the much less important post of Commissar for Suburban Land Settlement. For his insistence on the enforcement of the National Socialist program he was again removed from office and appointed to the professorship from which he was pensioned a few weeks ago.

Feder's retirement is important because he and Agricultural Minister Darré were the last prominent representatives of the Nazi doctrine of "blood and soil." Germany's peasantry had looked to the National Socialist regime to solve its immediate problems at the expense of the Junkers, whose tremendous holdings were to be used to provide land for the sons of the poor farmers. How completely the Nazi regime has failed to satisfy the farming population was made clear recently by the "coordinated" Frankfurter Zeitung, which reported that the farmers in several districts were refusing to pay their taxes and to meet their debts, and were in open rebellion against National Socialist winter relief, concealing their crop surplus to prevent confiscation.

Much as they may differ among themselves in their personal, political, and economic points of view, Feder, Darré, Goebbels, and the leader of the Labor Front, Dr. Ley, are united in their opposition to the "System Schacht." The president of the Reichsbank is fighting on two fronts—against the export industries, which blame his inflexible financial policies for Germany's failure to recover its lost export trade, and against the "socialist" wing of the Hitler party, which insists on higher wages to offset rising prices.

Adolf Hitler has stood by Schacht through the vicissitudes of the last year—even to the extent of sacrificing the friendship of the two greatest industrialists of Germany, Thyssen and Krupp. He has bestowed tremendous power upon this man, whose record for reliability and efficiency is doubtful to say the least. Yet it is not impossible that the world will learn one of these days that Germany's economic dictator has gone the way of Feder and so many others before him, scapegoats for Hitler's failure to meet the exigencies of an increasingly difficult situation.

Hitler's Germany is facing difficult days. A begging campaign that brought cabinet ministers to the streets with collection boxes has failed to alleviate the sufferings of the middle and lower classes. But so far the Third Reich stands firm. Despite confusion in the government and conflicts of interest among capitalist groups, against the industrial and peasant masses they stand together. Opposition to the National Socialist regime is only in the first stages of organization. Nevertheless, inner disintegration continues, and the opposition of the masses grows in strength. The millennium which Hitler predicted for his regime will end before many years have passed, and people will realize that it only seemed like a thousand years.

Lo, the Poor Utilities!

IF the New York public utilities are faced by the most severe crisis in their history, they have only their own stupidity to thank. Accustomed for years to assess charges without any genuine regard for costs, they sought callously to transfer the city's 3 per cent tax for unemployment relief to the consumer by a 7 to 8 per cent increase in rates. In this they were blocked by the Public Service Commission on the ground that the prevailing rates were already excessive. Doubtless the utilities were prepared for at least a delay, but what they apparently had not counted on was the city's reaction to their effort to attach a surcharge of 4.4 to 6.9 per cent on the existing rates for current purchased by the municipality. It must have been a shock to them when Commissioner Davidson rejected their bids with a pointed reminder that existing charges were already from 37 to 68 per cent above the rates for comparable service elsewhere in the country, and still more disturbing when Mayor LaGuardia departed for Washington and returned within twenty-four hours with a definite promise that the PWA would advance sufficient funds for the construction of a municipal power plant to supply city and federal needs. It is even hinted that the new plant might offer current to the public at rates substantially lower than those now charged.

And as if these troubles were not enough, the state legislative committee investigating utilities chose this moment to open hearings in New York. Evidence was presented showing that various companies had watered their assets to justify existing rates, and that the industry had maintained close connection with both the Republican and the Democratic organization. Most interesting, however, was the proposal to establish municipal plants in certain cities as a yardstick by which fair rates might be determined. Considerable success was reported where this scheme had been tried. In Cleveland, for example, the private company, after years of fighting, had won the right to charge ten cents a kilowatt hour, but when obliged to compete with current from the municipal plant at 3 cents a kilowatt hour, it hastily reduced its rates to 5 cents. Threatened with widespread adoption of "yardstick" plants, several of the upstate companies have already indicated a willingness to make moderate reductions.

The extent to which the utilities are really frightened by the recent turn of events is illustrated by the almost hysterical letter which Thomas N. McCarter, president of the Edison Electric Institute, recently addressed to President Roosevelt. Mr. McCarter spoke touchingly of the "multitude of investors who see their life savings in jeopardy." He sought to defend the prevailing rates on the ground that they have been scientifically determined and that their burden, after all, is slight in comparison with the amount which persons normally spend for food, clothing, and other necessities. Even the cost of operating our national, state, and local governments, he continued, is reflected by the burden of taxation on the individual is "nearly ten times the amount of the electrical item in the budget." Having thus drawn up a clean bill of health for the much-abused utilities, he besought the President to cooperate with them by requesting prompt action by the Supreme Court in testing the legality of TVA legislation. In reply to Mr. McCarter's plea, Frank R. McNinch, chairman of the Federal Power Commission, pointed out that while it is true that the average electric bill in this country is less than $3 a month, the Canadian consumer pays only $2.24 and obtains twice as much electricity. He also reminded Mr. McCarter that more than half of the Canadian power is generated in publicly owned plants.

In an attempt to defend the position of the utilities, Frank W. Smith, president of the New York Edison Company, in a speech which was reprinted as a half-page advertisement in all the leading New York newspapers, made a desperate plea against the threatened "experiment in municipal socialism" and laid the blame for his company's high rates on excessive taxation. He asserted that the operating taxes of the companies which he represented were almost nine times as high as in 1914 and 78 per cent higher than in 1928. He did not deny, however, Commissioner Davidson's charge that in spite of taxation five of the principal electric companies in the Consolidated Gas System have paid a quarter of a billion dollars in dividends to the parent company during the past five years. Thus while the utilities are on the defensive they have never been since the development of their vast interlocking empire, it is evident that they are still wholly unrepentant. Although the Public Service Commission has ordered a reduction of rates in New York City on several occasions within the past eighteen months, the companies have resorted to every conceivable device to prevent the new schedules from coming into effect. Nothing short of a competing municipal plant is likely to bring them to terms. Recognizing this, Mayor LaGuardia should allow nothing to deflect him from his purpose. Even though the resultant daily saving is, as Mr. McCarter asserts, "less than the cost of a package of cigarettes," it is right that the consumer should have it rather than the group of racketeers who now dominate the industry.

For Art's Sake?

"ART for art's sake" is no one's slogan today, but the phrase is not permitted to die. As an accusation, at least, you may still hear it hurled in arguments more remarkable for heat than for light, and like many another unfortunate catchword it survives to confuse discussions which might otherwise get farther than they commonly do. Perhaps it once served the purpose of startling an audience, but it has long outlived any usefulness it may have had, and we propose here to bury it, without, we confess, too confident a hope that the funeral will be generally recognized or that the corpse will be allowed to rest in peace.

Obviously the phrase in itself is the purest nonsense. The most solitary poet who ever soliloquized a poem which he never intended to write or utter was at least talking to himself and not to Poetry or the Art of Versification. He was creating art for the sake of a man if not for the sake of mankind, and art cannot exist for art's sake unless paintings can contemplate themselves or novels read their own pages. There is, to be sure, a point at issue, but never was an issue worse defined than when the debate is allowed to rage over art for art's sake versus art for humanity's sake. The real question is not whether literature and music and the rest exist for man or themselves; it is simply what kind of service they can or should perform, and that question is one which can at least be debated in intelligible terms.

It is also, to be sure, the only one that any sensible person ever wanted to debate, no matter how badly he may have formulated his position, and fortunately it can be stated in very simple terms if only the disputants can be persuaded to use them. If art is merely a means toward ends commonly pursued by other means also, if it serves man in the same way that education and preaching and oratory are supposed to serve him, then it may properly be judged in accordance with its effectiveness in promoting those ends. But if, on the contrary, it serves him in some way of its own, if it employs certain faculties and supplies certain delights otherwise unemployed and otherwise unknown, then it must be judged by its effectiveness in doing just that, and anyone who opposes it for political reasons is as absurd as he would be if he regarded fresh air, good food, and the pleasures of exercise as necessarily corrupt because they have been most accessible to members of a hated class.

We have, be it understood, no intention of debating the question here. We leave to other disputants the mysteries of the aesthetic experience and the attempt to decide—granting that it exists at all—how much and in which way it differs from experiences of a different kind. But we insist that the question is the only one worth debating, and that to attempt to choose between art for propaganda and art for art's sake is to create a dilemma which is completely unreal. The question is not whether art should exist for humanity, but what it is that art can do for that humanity to which it so obviously belongs.

Issues and Men

Middle West and Texas in December

DARK, somber skies; in Illinois's Egypt the added disheartening pall of soft-coal smoke; during two weeks no sign of the sun. Flurries of snow and freezing temperature add to the discomfort. Not many rays of encouragement but some, and everywhere amazing courage and confidence. People sound resigned, accustomed to bad times; complaints are few and far between. Indeed, they are certain to tell you that things are not as bad in their town as they hear conditions are elsewhere—local pride to the front again. Even those who are deeply stirred intellectually and emotionally by the plight of the country and its struggle for safety and prosperity stress little the actual suffering around them. There are many of these, and they are looking forward to great changes; they ask you eagerly: "How soon will Mr. Roosevelt make it clear that he is going to the left?" Yet it would be idle to say either that a revolt is at hand or that a revolutionary mood is abroad in the land. The people I met were eager for change, but patient (I got into no working-class groups). No one has yet stirred their hearts to mutiny and rage.

But there is much thoughtful dissatisfaction. The colleges and universities report increased enrolments. Everywhere college teachers declare that their students are showing an unprecedented interest in public affairs; students have in some degree begun to feel that they must know more about what is going on and what it signifies for them and their future. In every college community I found groups who put into moving words the gratitude they feel for The Nation's long fight for liberalism and progress, for its point of view, its program, the hope that it brings to them every week. I enjoyed the privilege of being the first speaker at three new forums; from what I hear they are springing up everywhere. There is a great urge to discuss, and hear discussed, the issues of the hour. In one western Pennsylvania mining town, conservative by all its traditions, 125 men of the leading Protestant church decided last fall that they were going to have a forum in order to know more about what was happening in the United States. They underwrote the expenses and invited liberals and progressives to speak, men whom a few years ago they would probably have shunned. On a cold, raw, blustery Sunday afternoon that church was packed with persons come to hear the story of the munitions makers.

Not always, of course, is there such tolerance or eagerness to hear the unfamiliar side. Thus the Y. M. C. A. in the home of Abraham Lincoln felt that the contributing editor of The Nation was still "too dangerous" to be heard before its forum! The dissentients got together, brought the aforesaid editor to Springfield, and informed him with unholy joy that in his place the conservative forum had accepted—Max Eastman, friend of Communists and devoted defender of Trotsky. They reported that later in self-defense the Y. M. C. A. group declared it had thought Max was Joseph B. Eastman, Federal Coordinator of Railroads! Such are some of our lay guides to heaven. But the church itself I found stirring everywhere. Many churches are open to liberal thought where campuses are still closed. They reflect vigorously the newer attitude of revolt against war and all its attributes.

Wherever I asked about conditions in any locality, the encouraging reply was that things were distinctly better than a year ago, and the farther I got into the Southwest the more emphatic was the report that there had been a great gain in the last twelve months. This was particularly true in cities like Decatur, Illinois, with a farming hinterland, for the farmers are admittedly much better off because of the high prices of wheat, corn, and soy beans. When I asked, however, if there were still many unemployed, the answer was invariably: "Yes, about as many as last year; our factories are not doing any better." In other words, the increased retail sales were due to the farmers' purchases. The heavy industries are, as the figures clearly show, not gaining; Pittsburgh, by the way, rejoices in the cleanest air it has enjoyed in the memory of men, the price of this being countless smokeless chimneys. As for the unemployed load, the communities visited seemed to be shouldering that now as a matter of course. In St. Louis, however, there is much restlessness among the destitute, somewhat stirred up by Communists. But when bona fide unemployed came to the City Hall to protest recently, they had the usual experience of being denied their constitutional rights to approach their rulers in free assembly with free speech, were roughly treated by the police, and then given absolutely outrageous sentences.

In Texas the scene was vastly brighter—the sun brilliant, the weather beyond improvement. It reflected the cheerful mood of the people. If one sees vacant stores and empty houses, the general air is none the less one of cheer. Even the cotton exporters, whose businesses have been shot to pieces by the policies of the Department of Agriculture, growled much less than one would have expected, and the farmers overwhelmingly sustained in their balloting the Bankhead Cotton Act and approved its extension for another year. Houston reported imports and exports for 1933 larger than ever before, and the figures for this year are surpassing those of 1933. As in every large harbor that I have visited in the past year, there were steamers loading scrap iron for Japan—the wonder is that there is any left in the United States. The one bad note related to the really Forgotten Man in America—the Negro. His plight on the farms and ranches is described as overwhelmingly bad, bearable only because he has so long been accustomed to next to nothing. That there is practical economic slavery no one denies. But Dallas, Houston, and Galveston are cheerful and confident. The newspapers report increased advertising; the hotels were crowded; business is nearly as usual, always excepting heavy industry.

Dwight Garrison Villard

A Cartoon by LOW

MADAMOISELLE:

"COURTING, EH? WELL YOU'LL HAVE TO ASK MY PEOPLE."

HANDSOME ADOLF'S ROMANCE.

Father Coughlin

II. The Phase of Action

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

FATHER COUGHLIN, in launching the National League for Social Justice, carefully avoided saying anything about a new political party. Before details of the scheme were made public he spoke simply of setting up a national lobby, which he hoped would have five million members. The scheme itself proved to be far more ambitious. It is to be organized first by local units, then by Congressional districts, which will send delegates to state conventions, which in turn will send delegates to a national convention, "where the principles and policies of the organization will be further determined." A lobby that holds state and national conventions is of course not a lobby, but a potential political party. A few weeks before it was launched, when its form and principles must have been well defined in Father Coughlin's mind, he spoke at a political banquet in Detroit. The political campaign was at its zenith. He had been expected to support the Democrats as New Dealers, at least by implication. He astonished his audience by predicting that in twelve years both the Democratic and the Republican Party would have disappeared. In their stead, he went on, would be born a conservative and a liberal party. He prophesied the achievement of certain reforms in the twelve years, some of which not surprisingly were to be found later among the sixteen planks of his platform.

That Father Coughlin should not be explicit about his intentions is in keeping with his mentality. He is not the explicit kind of person. The reporters in Detroit, for whom his Sunday discourses are a recurring chore, complain that while he sounds convincing over the air he does not often use the factual material which makes it possible to write a readable story. He will start many a quotable affirmation, and then add a few words which make one wonder what it is all about. It is important to appreciate this characteristic, for it reveals the man and the nature of his potential action. A significant instance is to be found in one of his sixteen planks. It is the tenth, on collective bargaining. "I believe," says Father Coughlin, "not only in the right of the laboring man to organize in unions, but also in the duty of the government to facilitate and protect these organizations against the vested interests of wealth and of intellect." This is clear down to the last two words. But what are the "vested interests of intellect" against which the government must protect labor unions? Is it only a phrase thrown in for rhetorical effect, on the assumption that radio listeners have a prejudice against intellectuals? Or does an intent lurk behind the words? In an interview in the Detroit Times on October 10, when this phrase already must have been formulated, he stated: "Make the Department of Labor a real power! Let it take over the functions of collective bargaining—the functions which the A. F. of L. is now trying to fulfil. Let it supplant the A. F. of L. entirely. Why should the workers pay dues to a labor organization to protect a right which is guaranteed by law? The service of the federation should be a government service paid for by taxation." The "vested interests of intellect," then, are apparently the labor union heads, and the plank on collective bargaining takes on an entirely different meaning. Germany and Italy, on the one hand, and Russia, on the other, have government-organized unions. Which is Father Coughlin thinking of? The question is easily answered: he is a foe of communism. "Strikes and lockouts are absolutely unnecessary," he declared in a recent discourse. He wants a fascist solution of the labor problem.

But Father Coughlin does not often explain himself in parallel statements. As a rule he sticks to rhetoric and remains incomprehensible. Thus he denounces un-Christian American capitalism because it runs its production exclusively for profit. At the same time he denounces communism, whose production is for use. Christian capitalism, he goes on to say, is "production for use at a profit." Now what the essential difference is between production for profit and production for use at a profit Father Coughlin, so far as I know, has never clearly set forth. Maybe, as in the question of collective bargaining, he has concrete ideas and really means government-controlled production with the retention of the profit system, another fascist conception. I admit I am only guessing. But a platform which omits any reference to free speech and even democracy entitles one to this kind of guess.

After reading and hearing many of his speeches I am struck by their technical similarity to those of Hitler. These, too, are vague and emotional. Carefully analyzed they do not read as radical as they sound. Like Hitler's, the priest's speeches tap the underlying prejudices of listeners. Hitler for years played chiefly on the resentment against the Versailles treaty and against social conditions. Coughlin plays on the widespread animosity toward the bankers and the yearning for social justice. A minimum of explicitness and a maximum of feeling seem to make the best formula for founders of new movements. Whether Father Coughlin knows this, and is deliberately vague, only he can say. And he alone can unfold the secret of his ambitions, and what he foresees as his role in the next years. He is in close contact with the Committee for the Nation. The Detroit News of November 21 reported that five groups—the Committee of the Nation, the National Grange, the American Farm Federation, the National Farm Union, and the Sound Money League—had come to an agreement with Father Coughlin. This he denies. He says he still is a New Dealer, but he has cooled off a good deal about President Roosevelt and makes disparaging remarks about him in private. Publicly he asserts that if Roosevelt fails he will be followed by a dictator. If he thinks of himself as this dictator he does not announce it, and naturally would not. Nor does he say it would content him to be the power behind the throne. But more nearly than any demagogue in America he has the formula for a fascist party, a semi-radical program which is "safe" on the labor question, which guarantees the profit system, and which appeals simultaneously to agriculture, the middle class, and the big employer. Already he is first in the field with this kind of party, and he must know that no other fascist movement can grow in this country without him.

Let us consider for a moment what kind of man he is. He is likable. Once a caller reaches him—and he can make himself as inaccessible as a bank president—he finds him quite the human being. He is quick, intelligent, friendly, unpretentious in his dealings, leaps up and paces the floor, talks in a flood of language. He smokes cigarettes endlessly, he dots his conversation with manly-sounding “damns” and “hells.” Furthermore, he is sincere, if sincerity means that the aim of his enterprise is not to line his own pockets. But ambition preys on his soul. Writing a foreword to a recent book on his work he unwittingly revealed how near the surface of consciousness his lust for power lies:

Do you know how I would live if I renounced religion and was illogical enough to disbelieve in a life beyond—in the real life? Why, if I threw away and denounced my faith, I would surround myself with the most adroit high-jackers, learn every trick of the highest banking and stock manipulations, avail myself of the laws under which to hide my own crimes, create a smoke screen to throw into the eyes of men, and—believe me—I would become the world's champion crook. If I didn't believe in religion and in a happy beyond I would get everything for myself that I could lay hands on in the world.

Fortunately, most people do not need either religious faith or a belief in eternity to keep them from becoming world-champion crooks.

In type he is an actor, with an advanced sense of stage management. He plays several roles. He may talk to his visitor as the Builder of the Church, as the Martyr Who Is Being Misunderstood, as the New Dealer, as the Social Philosopher. Few visitors get to know the real Father Coughlin, perhaps because there is no real Father Coughlin. The reality may be just this succession of parts. If his visitor is to be impressed, he is received in the top tower room at the Shrine of the Little Flower, and the conversation gets under way. A secretary will open the door: “The Governor of Pennsylvania is on the telephone.” The Father begins speaking at the telephone. “How do you do, Governor. . . . Oh, no, Governor, I don't think I would use the troops in the mining crisis. . . . I am sure there is some better way of handling the situation. . . . Yes, I will think it over and let you know.” Then conversation proceeds with the visitor. Again the secretary appears at the door: “Professor Raymond Moley wants to speak to you by long distance.” Father Coughlin waves his hand impatiently. “Tell Professor Moley I am busy and will call him later.”

This was one visitor's actual experience. I cannot say that Governor Pinchot and Professor Moley did not call up on that occasion. But the visitor thought Father Coughlin was trying to impress him. Skepticism is expressed in Detroit, too, about the famous “bomb” found in Father Coughlin's home during his affray with the Detroit Free Press. It consisted of a large cardboard box of powder with a long fuse, and was found, unlighted, in the basement of the priest's home. Nobody suggests that Father Coughlin placed it there himself, and then conveniently found it. But nobody believes that the Detroit Free Press and the bankers of Detroit, whom Father Coughlin was fighting at the time, placed it there. The upshot of the discovery was that the priest had some passing glory from being in personal peril for fighting the financial powers of Detroit. The police never discovered who planted the “bomb” and quietly dropped the investigation.

The Detroit Free Press brought out the fact that Father Coughlin, while denouncing Wall Street, was using the services of a Wall Street broker to handle some of his funds. The Free Press called it speculation. Father Coughlin replied he was investing, as he had a right to do, and the money anyway was not his, it belonged to his radio league. Then when the government published the list of all holders of silver, the largest in Michigan proved to be the young woman who was secretary of Father Coughlin's organization. She had 500,000 ounces, at the very time when Father Coughlin was crying over the radio: “The restoration of silver to its proper value is of Christian concern. I send to you a call for the mobilization of all Christianity against the god of gold.” The priest, in other words, was trying to boost the price of silver from which his own undertaking was going to profit. This probably comes near the border line where ecclesiastical censure might be forthcoming. But when the truth transpired, it did not flurry the priest. He denied that he would personally benefit from the silver speculation; he said that he had always advocated the purchase of American commodities and allied himself with the President in anticipating an increase in the price of silver. But I have the impression that it is foolish to accuse Father Coughlin of profiting from these deals personally, or indeed of profiting financially from his radio activities. He was accused of having underpaid his income tax. A government investigation was made, and $8 which he had paid was refunded to him; he was actually below the lowest income-tax bracket. I see no reason to doubt it. Father Coughlin is a good actor and he is colossally ambitious, but avarice is not his weakness. He lives unpretentiously. He has simple tastes. And if he now can occupy a handsome tower with a staff of over a hundred clerical helpers, travel freely, and when in Washington live in a suite in the Mayflower, that is hardly a great pecuniary gain. The man is much more comprehensible if he is believed to be not cheaply and irreverently dishonest in money matters. He is at least worth taking seriously.

Knowing that Father Coughlin, during the automobile strike last spring, had spoken sympathetically of company unions and had criticized the A. F. of L., one might also assume that large if secret contributions come to him from the grateful automobile manufacturers of the Detroit district. But this does not appear to be true. The Fisher brothers are Catholics, and their mother belongs to the Royal Oak parish, so they are supposed to have contributed generously to build the church. But I was assured in Detroit that the automobile manufacturers are much too “dumb” in such matters to appreciate that Father Coughlin is a comfortable man to have about in a city which is 52 per cent Catholic. Quite childishly they loath him for his attack on the bankers, and like most people think he is as radical as he sounds, and fear him.

Nobody outside the organization gets to read his letters. He says he has 2,000,000 names on file, and someone to whom he showed his filing-room asked to see the list from his home county in a nearby state. Father Coughlin at once complied. He pulled out a great handful of cards, several inches thick. The visitor went over them; the names were of persons he knew, and they pretty well covered the county. Father

Coughlin recognizes that his letters are his stock in trade. "I believe I possess in them the greatest human document in our times," he says; "I am not boasting when I say that I know the pulse of the people. I am not exaggerating when I tell you of their demand for social justice which is sweeping like a tidal wave over this country."

If Father Coughlin has hopes of leading a radical-fascist party, the attitude toward him of the Catholic church becomes of signal importance. He says that he maintains offices in Rome, Geneva, New York, and Michigan. The Rome office might be the liaison between his League for Social Justice and the Vatican. Evidence on this would be hard to find. So far Father Coughlin, even though preaching good Catholic liberalism based four-square on the encyclicals of Leo XIII and Pius XI, has had a mixed reception from his coreligionists in America. Three times Cardinal O'Connell has criticized him, and after the organization of the new league he denied the right of Father Coughlin to speak for the Catholic church in America. In New York many Catholics are intent on keeping him out of the city, since his speech in the Hippodrome which drew 8,000 into the hall and a mob of 30,000 outside it. Al Smith in the New Outlook called him a "crackpot," and he came back with the charge that Smith had tried to borrow money from Morgan. No doubt many Catholics feel the cause of the church would not be served by a new party under the guidance of the forty-three-year-old priest. The feud with Cardinal O'Connell may bring the issue to a head. Father Coughlin was not cowed by the red hat in Boston. He slashed back viciously, charging the conservative Cardinal himself with failure to preach the doctrines of the church. He openly paraded the protection he had in this attack from his Detroit Bishop, Michael Gallagher. Gallagher, now a white-haired veteran, has always been a bit of a radical himself. He was an ardent Irish patriot, was bitterly anti-British during the war, and made a stir by letting De Valera hold one of his big meetings in Detroit at a time when hostility to Britain counted as almost un-American. The Vatican, one can imagine, is piqued and interested, and greatly puzzled too. The church looks far back in history and can look far ahead into the future. Does it speculate on what will happen if Roosevelt fails? Does it foresee dictatorship in America, and recall the spirit of the Ku Klux Klan and appraise the latent intolerance of the American mob? It may argue that there is something to be said for a priest who would save Catholicism from persecution in a fascist era. But if the new league is a flop, if the radio priest is not a flaming comet in the heavens but just another meteor, the church would suffer. And the success of the league is no foregone conclusion. It is one thing for a man to appeal to a national audience as a disembodied voice, almost sacredly disinterested by virtue of his being a priest, and another for him to get into the welter of vulgar political action. The league may be Father Coughlin's great mistake. History may record that like Napoleon, to quote Artemus Ward, he tried to do too much and did it. At any rate, the church is in business for the time being. On the Sunday when the league was announced Bishop Gallagher appeared for the first time at the microphone with his protegee and "introduced" him. Father Coughlin needed no introduction to his own radio audience. Bishop Gallagher was the newcomer. He had been brought in to give importance to the occasion. Official sponsorship could not have been more deliberate.

[Part I of Mr. Swing's discussion of Father Coughlin appeared in last week's issue. Next week will appear his first article on Huey Long.]

Russia Abolishes Bread Cards

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, December 1

THE food-rationing system is abolished as from January 1, 1935. This action has considerable significance. The Bolsheviks would not have taken it if they had thought that a war was imminent, for there would be no sense in eliminating bread cards only to reintroduce them in three or six months. No doubt the menace of a foreign attack, which the Soviets have exaggerated these many years, remains, yet the elimination of the rationing system in the cities will enrich and mollify the villages and thus further reduce the likelihood of invasion. For war against the Soviet Union would be in part a gamble on peasant disaffection; the world outside has always underestimated the internal strength of the red regime. The suppression of the bread cards will make the countryside more prosperous and hence more loyal. At one and the same time, therefore, the action reflects a lessened fear of war and likewise lessens the chances of war. The government should accordingly be in a position to transfer some of the energy and materials now employed in military-defense activities to the gratification of popular consumption requirements and thereby still further improve the mood and condition of the civilian population.

The cashiering of the bread cards means not only that there is now enough bread in the country to satisfy the demand, but that there is every likelihood of normal agricultural production and normal retail distribution in the future. The destructive phase of agrarian collectivization is at an end, and the socialist village can now feed the socialist city. Bread cards were introduced in 1928 because the capitalistic peasantry could not and would not grow enough food. Since then Soviet agriculture has passed through purgatory and hell. The costs and the sacrifices have been great, but the net result is a politically more reliable and an economically more productive collectivized village. Before collectivization the Soviet system was Janus-faced: one face looked up the red road toward socialism; the other wore the well-known features of the Russian mujik. Before collectivization the Soviet system stood on one leg, the socialist city. Today, by a painful and tortuous process, the regime has acquired a more homogeneous character and a firmer footing. Bolshevism now has one face and two legs.

At present three-quarters of all peasant households and 90 per cent of all land in the U. S. S. R. are collectivized. Imagine that collectivization had never taken place. The city would nevertheless have proceeded with its industrialization and expansion. The city has given the kolhozi 281,000 tractors, 33,000 combines, 34,000 motor trucks, and more than two million seeders, threshing machines, and harvesting machines. Suppose this equipment were now the private possession of private farmers. Those farmers would be a powerful capitalistic force. By mechanizing private agriculture the industrialized city would have been intrenching in power its own enemy. The thing is inconceivable, and it is one of the reasons why collectivization had to come with industrialization. For if the Bolsheviks had mechanized the village and then tried to collectivize it, the difficulties and expense would have been even greater than they were.

Today, having paid the heavy toll, Soviet socialized agriculture is on the up grade. It is not much of an achievement that Russia has enough bread. But when one recalls that as late as 1932, partly through crop failure but mostly through peasant sabotage, there was a definite food deficit, when one remembers that millions more now consume in the cities while millions less produce in the villages, when one considers that collectivization was accompanied by a tremendous diminution in the number of horses and other working animals, when one thinks of all the chaos brought about by the reorganization of life, work, and thought processes incident to collectivization, then Soviet agriculture's rapid turning of the corner is not a small triumph.

Bread will now be sold in an augmented number of state and cooperative stores at one fixed price and in unlimited quantities. As a matter of fact, the rationing system had broken down before it was relinquished. According to the Pravda, a quantity of bread equal to 44 per cent of the bread distributed on cards is now being sold in commercial stores, where the size of purchases is not limited. This commercial bread is of far better quality, and people prefer it despite its higher price. Moreover, the ugly red tape, the innumerable questionnaires which every citizen had to fill in before receiving a card, the stealing and other abuses, the speculation by workers who got double and therefore excess rations—all these were demoralizing and irritating and so costly that the government will save huge sums by releasing bread from the restrictions. Nevertheless, prices will be raised. The new price, beginning January 1, 1935, will be a mean between the low artificial ration-card price and the high commercial price, but all persons gainfully employed will be granted wage increases equal to the rise in the price of the bread they now consume. The worker will reap some small advantage because he will buy less bread. There will be no inflation because the wage-rise money will come back to the exchequer in the form of bread-price increases. The chief difference will be that with higher price levels the government will pay the peasants more for their grain. Growers of tobacco, cotton, flax, and other industrial crops will likewise receive higher compensation. Otherwise there would have been a rush to grow cereals.

The announcement of the abandonment of the card system states that the rationing of some other products will also be discontinued and that the prices of manufactured commodities are to be brought down. The peasant with his larger income will consequently be able to buy more factory goods. The city employee with his unchanged income will benefit too, but relatively less than the kolhoz member. Just as the elimination of bread cards reflects the greater supply of bread, so the reduction of goods prices reflects the availability of more manufactured articles. Here, therefore, in concrete, undeniable form, is proof of the agricultural and industrial progress of the Soviet Union. Persons living in or visiting this country can see with their own eyes the daily increase in the kinds and the volume of city goods sold in stores, as well as the daily rise in living standards. Hitherto the impartial observer could pass on this information and ask to be believed. Now these official measures offer incontrovertible proof. I do not mean to suggest, however, that supplies are now adequate. They are only bigger.

The ration system was inaugurated in 1928 not so much because the city was underfed as because the peasant came into town and bought up the city's bread. If there were much danger of a return to this condition, the system would have been retained. I think the lifting of restrictions on bread sales will actually reduce the amount of bread sold in urban centers, for under the card distribution much bread was bought only to be exchanged for other products. My maid, for instance, regularly pays with bread for the milk she buys from the peasant women who bring it into Moscow. She is not alone in this practice. But of late the women refuse to take bread. They have enough of it themselves. And the exchange value of bread has fallen.

The repeal of the ration system for bread and some other foods points the way to a new system of Soviet distribution. The moment there was enough bread in the country and enough goods to pay for the bread, restrictions were cast off and a uniform price was established. Ultimately, the same course will be followed with every other article of consumption. At present one can buy meat at one price in a cooperative store on cards, at another and higher price in a closed factory cooperative, and at a third and still higher price in a commercial store. Those who have access to the closed cooperative are privileged. The moment there is enough meat to go around, one price will be fixed, limitations will be abolished, and the closed cooperatives will become unnecessary. All prices of all commodities in commercial stores and markets have been falling sharply—obviously a result of bigger supplies.

The Soviet ruble is not tied to gold, although, technically, part of the currency has a gold coverage. The value of the ruble is determined by the volume of goods in the country. In 1931, when there was scarcely anything to buy here, the ruble was practically worthless. And it was constantly depreciating. Now it is valuable and appreciating. For the first time, as far as I can recall, the existence of inflation is now officially recognized: the decree abolishing rationing speaks of the "Soviet ruble which is growing stronger." In the eyes of the government it was never officially weak. Actually it was very weak. The Soviet Union is on the road to a stable currency based on a sufficient supply of food and manufactured goods.

There will remain, after January 1, 1935, many closed cooperatives where the lucky can buy at reduced prices. The government proposes gradually to wipe out these stores for the privileged. Everything will be sold in open commercial stores at one price. Inequality, which the Bolsheviks encourage, will then express itself in the inequality of wages based on varying training and talents but not in inequality of opportunity arising out of varying social or official position, as at present.

In Support of the Constitution

By CARL BECKER

Ithaca, New York, December 15

IN compliance with the Ives law, an official of Cornell University recently requested me to sign the following statement: "I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution of the United States of America and the Constitution of the State of New York, and that I will faithfully discharge, according to the best of my ability, the duties of the position to which I am now assigned."

After reading this statement carefully, I signed it, willingly and without resentment. I always wish to conform to the laws, and in this instance there was no difficulty in doing so, since this law, so far as I could see, neither deprived me of any rights that I formerly had nor imposed upon me any duties not already imposed. There was even a certain advantage in having the statement presented for my signature: it made me think about the obligation of citizens to support the Constitution and the laws. I asked this question: Are citizens not obliged to support the Constitution and the laws unless they take an oath to do so? Applying a well-known rule for interpreting legal documents, one might infer that formerly no citizens of New York, except public officials taking such an oath, were so obliged, and that now no citizens except public officials and teachers are so obliged. That was a new and intriguing idea. I had taken it for granted that all citizens are obligated to support the laws; and with the best will in the world I still fail to see what meaning any law can have if it has not the one meaning without which it would not be a law—namely, that all citizens are obligated to conform to its provisions. What, then, does the Ives law mean? So far as I can see, nothing except this: that teachers in New York State are obliged to acknowledge in writing that they are obligated by the obligations imposed upon them by the duties they have assumed, and by the obligations imposed upon all citizens by the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the State of New York.

Having reached this conclusion, I asked another question: Does the New York Legislature think that a subordinate authority can make an obligation imposed by a superior authority any more obligatory than it already is? The Constitution of the United States, so I have at least been told, is the supreme law of the land. The Constitution of the State of New York is, within limits defined by the Constitution of the United States, the supreme law of New York State. The New York Legislature is a subordinate authority, its jurisdiction being defined by provisions in both constitutions. It has no authority to modify either constitution, nor can it create any rights or duties not explicitly or implicitly authorized by one or the other of the two constitutions. I can make nothing of the Ives law as a legal document except that it is a redundancy, unless it be also an impertinence: by enacting it, the New York Legislature presumes to reimpose obligations already imposed by the supreme law of the land.

All this laborious thinking led me to ask a third question: Have I up to now "supported" the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the State of New York, and have I faithfully "discharged" the duties of "the position to which I am assigned"? Taking the first point first (in literary discourse it is well to be systematic), I feel sure that I have always supported the Constitution of the United States, and that I have supported the Constitution of the State of New York during the seventeen years that I have resided in that State. I intend to go on supporting both constitutions, and as a down payment on that promised intention I hereby declare that the Ives law, in my opinion, was unnecessary and unwise: unnecessary, because it imposes on teachers no obligations that did not already exist, except the formal one of signing the statement quoted above; unwise, because the obligation to sign the statement will irritate many teachers all of the time, without making any of them at any time support the constitution more loyally, or discharge their duties more faithfully, than they did before.

In making this explicit statement about the Ives law, I am clearly "discharging" the duties "of the position to which I am now assigned," and I am "supporting" both the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the State of New York. To take the second point first (in literary discourse one should aim at variety), both constitutions rest upon the principle that laws should be enacted by representatives freely chosen by the citizens, and that it is not only the right but the duty of citizens to express, either orally or in print, their approval or disapproval of the conduct of their representatives, and of the laws enacted by them. Both constitutions, unless I am mistaken, contain provisions which guarantee citizens against any infringement, by statute or otherwise, of that right. Happily (returning now to the first point), the "duties of the position to which I am now assigned" do not, so far as I can learn, conflict in any way with my obligation to support the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the State of New York. I am a teacher of history. The duty of a teacher of history, as I understand it, is to learn, and encourage his pupils to learn, what has actually happened in some period of human history, and to discuss with the utmost freedom before his pupils any opinion, judgment, or theory that may be formed about the cause or the effect or the importance of what has happened. The Ives law is something that has happened, and so far as that law is concerned I can "discharge the duties of the position to which I am assigned" only by declaring that it would have been better, in my opinion, if the Governor and Assembly of New York had prevented it from happening. I have now discharged that duty in writing, and I intend, whenever occasion seems fitting, to discharge it orally.

In closing I wish it clearly understood that this expression of an adverse opinion on the Ives law does not exhaust my capacity to support the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the State of New York. I reserve the right, for the future, to support these admirable high authorities by freely expressing my opinion about any social or political question that may arise. If at any time it should seem to me highly desirable to amend or to abolish the Constitution of the United States or the Constitution of New York State, I shall, availing myself of the principle that "all just governments rest upon the consent of the governed," support both constitutions, and at the same time "faithfully discharge the duties of the position to which I am now assigned," by saying so. At present I am not in favor of abolishing either constitution, nor have I any amendments to propose to either. In times past there have been people who believed that men could be made wise and good by proper laws and constitutions. I have never been convinced of this, but I am open to conviction. When anyone devises a constitution that will make legislators wise enough to know that people cannot be made loyal to the constitution, or faithful in the discharge of their duties, by passing laws requiring them to be so, I will support that constitution as faithfully and loyally as I am now supporting the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the State of New York.

The India Report

By HAROLD J. LASKI

London, December 1

AFTER one hundred and fifty meetings the Joint Parliamentary Committee, known as the Linlithgow committee, has produced its report. Four Conservatives definitely dissent from it; and the four Labor members, headed by Major Attlee, deputy leader of the Opposition, have drafted an alternative report. Since the majority report is signed by the Secretary of State for India, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and by Sir Austen Chamberlain, as well as by the Liberal members of the committee, it is pretty certain to go through Parliament successfully. Any serious hopes Mr. Churchill and the diehards may have had of defeating the government on the Indian issue are already dead. Outside Lord Salisbury, Mr. Churchill will not be able to count on the support of any important leader in the Conservative Party.

The reason is quite simple. The scheme laid down by the report does not confer executive self-government on India in any shape or form. It leaves essential control in all matters of central government still in London, and even in the provincial sphere it leaves an overriding emergency authority in the hands of the Governor, which means, in the last resort, in London also. That is not all. Every legislature, central and provincial, is to have two chambers, and they are so weighted that the whole emphasis is on the side of property in all of them. Election is to be indirect, and is to be based upon a franchise limited to 14 per cent of the population. No provision is made for the automatic revision of the constitution, except in some non-essential details, whether by Delhi or Westminster; and the army remains under British control without time limit. The princes become a deciding factor in the federal assembly, and they are a body of rulers, with perhaps four exceptions, whose habits would not stand examination by any tribunal of self-respecting persons. Provision is also made against the passage of any "penal" or "discriminatory" legislation which might affect British interests in India. And the whole structure is pivoted upon an Indian Central Bank, the control of which is to be completely outside the political realm.

Everyone, of course, knows that the Indian problem is immensely complex in character, and that there is no justification for attacking it in terms of a simple formula. But I do not think it can be honestly said that these proposals will go any serious distance toward solving it. They are inadequate for a number of reasons. (1) They will not satisfy the legitimate and inescapable demand of all politically-minded Indians for an ample measure of self-government. (2) They are based upon an institutional foundation so conceived as to split up Indians into large fragments of interest, each of which has every possible ground given to it for remaining separate from the community as a whole. (3) Indian economic development is to proceed, not along the lines Indians desire (they may not always be wise lines), but along the lines which leave British economic interests in India fully safeguarded. (4) No provision is made, as was made even in the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme of 1919, for periodic revision of the new system; Indians who desire it will have to fight the battle of the last seven years all over again if they want any drastic change. (5) The absence of any adequate arrangements for the Indianization of the army means that the ultimate control is in British hands for an indefinite period. (6) The financial proposals mean that no legislation will be possible of which the Viceroy (still obviously to be a British peer) does not approve; and this means that the keys of Indian finance will continue to rest in London. (7) The whole structure is devised in such a way as to weight the influence of property at every point. The prospect, therefore, of securing under the scheme any effective attention to the problem of poverty in India is practically nil; the very classes which need the protection of the franchise most are excluded from it. (8) The association of the princes with the new system is built upon such a basis that these dubious autocrats will have behind their authority the protective support of the British troops in India; and the eighty million subjects over whom they rule will not only have no direct voice in the federal legislature but also no more means than now of making heard their protests against the grave misgovernment of which they are the victims.

Indian acceptance of the scheme is probable; there is no method of government which some Indian politicians cannot be found willing to work for. Mohammedans generally will welcome it because it gives them a privileged position. The landowners will largely support it because it makes the law and order that will be enforced their law and order. Many Indian capitalists will support it because for a long time to come it safeguards them against the growth of trade unionism and labor legislation in India. The princes will predominantly support it because they receive from it a new lease of life. Many intellectuals, especially the intellectuals with British titles, will support it because they are the people most likely to receive the important posts under the new regime. Finally, I think, "respectable" public opinion in England will support it for two reasons: first, because it amply safeguards British economic interests in India; and, second, because if it were defeated, the National Government would have to go to the country, with consequences that no "respectable" public opinion is prepared to contemplate.

The report, therefore, seems to me a supreme example of the technique of economic imperialism in action. Something had to be done, after the events of the post-war years in India, to meet the growing demand for self-government. The report therefore offers (a) a considerable enlargement of provincial powers, and (b) a small measure of self-government at the center. But these are conceded upon the saving conditions that over all powers conceded there is an effective British veto; that essential financial control remains British and not Indian; that the army remains essentially a British preserve; that the Indian masses are given no direct relation to the government; that the Conservative influence of the princes is brought in to safeguard a British control with which their influence is skilfully articulated; that if India should later want a revision of the present scheme, she would have to depend once more on persuading a British Parliament that she is "fit" for a further instalment of responsibility. Nothing here, so far as the framework of government is concerned, will make India responsible for her own destinies in the lifetime of any Englishman who has an interest in our connection with India. We retain India as a commercial and financial investment for a period to which no time limit is set.

Nothing in these proposals deals with what is the central problem of India—the intolerable poverty of the masses. To realize what that is one has only to read the pages of the Whisley report on the industrial side. A male worker in the Assam tea gardens earns his keep and from fifteen shillings to one pound per month; a male worker in the cotton mills earns from three pounds twelve shillings to four pounds for the same period; the daily average wage of mine workers in the Jharia coalfield is one shilling and threepence down to eightpence per day. Female labor, of course, earns less still; and the conditions of child labor are literally appalling. Of Indian agriculture and its conditions I will content myself with quoting the opinion of Sir John Megaw, the Director of Public Health in India, made to the Royal Asiatic Society in May, 1934.

Sixty per cent of the village population are poorly or badly nourished. . . . The country is in a state of emergency which is rapidly passing to one of crisis. . . . The outlook for the future is gloomy to a degree, not only for the masses of the people, who must face the intensified struggle for bare subsistence, but also for the upper classes, whose incomes depend on the production of surplus crops and other commodities. If the entire produce of the soil is needed to provide for the urgent needs of the cultivators, nothing will be left for the payment of rent or revenue . . . the whole social structure of India must inevitably be rudely shaken, if not wholly destroyed.

There is nothing in this report which touches on these conditions. Within the class relations that are implied in its institutional pattern there is no reason to expect an improvement in them. The Atlee report recognizes that poverty is the central issue, but granted its recognition of this, it differs in detail rather than in principle from the majority report. There is a tendency in India to look to the Labor Party in England for a further advance. I do not know what it will say. It is clear that if the report goes into operation, the tendency of a party intensely preoccupied with its own problems will be to evade reopening the Indian issue until the new regime has worked for some time. If the report does fail, the sincerity of the Labor Party as a socialist party will be tested by nothing so much as its willingness fundamentally to revise the whole basis upon which it has been built. For, as things stand, the Indian masses are handed over bound and gagged to the forces of capitalism, British and Indian.

I think, therefore, that the Indian outlook is gloomy indeed. These proposals will not satisfy the demands of articulate and self-conscious political India; and they will do nothing at all to meet the problems of Indian poverty. In so far as they extend Indian control, they extend it to the property-owning class; and even in the degree that they extend it, they retain British hands on the real levers of power. The National Government will beat its diehard critics in the House of Commons, but it will beat them emphatically because it has surrendered to them on all the essentials of their case. The stage is still set for that conflict between British authority and Indian aspirations which the report was supposed to assuage. What it really demonstrates in a decisive way is that capitalist imperialism neither can nor will solve the problems of a subject people.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has long been a close and loyal friend of Alice in Wonderland, and anything new or surprising about her arouses his interest. Thus he was pleased to be presented with "Logical Nonsense," the complete works of Lewis Carroll (though not, in case any fervent mathematician should want them, the complete works of Charles Lutwidge Dodgson), in which he lost himself at once, not only in the mazes of "Alice" and the Looking Glass, but in the delights of the Christ Church belfry which looked like a meatsafe (derivation: belfry—from French bel, "beautiful, meet," and from German frei, "free, unfettered, safe") and the incomparable syllogisms in "Symbolic Logic": for example, "Some pillows are soft; no pokers are soft; some pokers are not pillows"; and "All wasps are unfriendly; no puppies are unfriendly; puppies are not wasps."

* * * * *

MORE serious, although of considerably less importance, is a small treatise called "Creators of Wonderland," by a young French lady named Mespoulet. Mlle Mespoulet demonstrates with earnest erudition that the famous drawings of Alice, and the White Rabbit, and the pool of tears, and the Frog Footman did not spring full-panoplied from the brow of Master Tenniel, but—to be crude about it—were copied with disconcerting exactitude from the widely known lithographs of the French artist, J. J. Grandeville. Grandeville had his rabbit, his Frog Footman, his Humpty-dumpties, his live flowers, even his Mock Turtle—in which last Tenniel made a number of handsome improvements—and if the Reverend Mr. Dodgson and his artist did not know it, they should have, for the London Punch, with Tenniel on its staff, was modeled after the Paris Charivari, which was dominated and illuminated some twenty years before by Grandeville.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

ville. Moreover, Grandeville's "Metamorphoses du Jour" and his "La Vie Privée et Publique des Animaux," in which he depicted every animal and insect under the sun in every possible human and inhuman posture—including most of the later Alice in Wonderland postures—were extremely well known in England as well as on the Continent. In short, what we have been accustomed to bless Tenniel for seems to derive largely from a better artist and a greater man, and whether Tenniel should or should not have admitted as much is a knotty problem with which, when not engaged in weightier matters, lovers of Alice might concern themselves.

.

FOR the truth is that the Drifter, duly impressed by Mlle Mespoulet's discovery, nevertheless turned back to the conversation between Alice and the caterpillar with complete absorption. And he will say further that if Mlle Mespoulet's book were written in a less stuffy style than it is, and if Grandeville were a greater artist even than the records show him to be, and if it were discovered that far from inventing "Alice" himself, the Reverend Mr. Dodgson really copied it out of one of the tales composed by Francis Bacon when he had finished with Shakespeare—in the face of all these contingencies the Drifter would still be absorbed in "Alice" every time he opened its familiar pages. There is a unity, a uniqueness, a completeness about it—of which Tenniel's illustrations form a very important part—which no addition to the knowledge of its genesis, however well-intentioned, can break in upon. Undoubtedly Mlle Mespoulet was aware of this, and her book is a pleasant antiquarian excursion into French art in the first half of the nineteenth century. But it has almost nothing to do with Alice. That young lady will serenely continue her walks in and out of the looking glass, and as usual she will be followed by a large and admiring multitude.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Some Statistics for Mr. Mencken

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I am sure that The Nation, having given the repealists such publicity, will allow the opposition a little space in which to reply to Mr. Mencken's article. Mr. Mencken asserts that under repeal the demand for liquor has "settled down" to something "very moderate."

If by the above statement Mr. Mencken means that liquor consumption under repeal is "very moderate," the question at once arises, Why have arrests for drunkenness and automobile accidents attributed to liquor shown such horrifying increases? For example, according to figures of Prohibition Facts Service, arrests for drunkenness increased in the three months following repeal, in New York, 55 per cent; in Los Angeles, 95 per cent; in Denver, over 50 per cent. As for liquor and motor traffic, in Detroit automobile accidents attributed to drink show an increase of 164 per cent (release of June 26), while in Chicago injuries and deaths involving drunken drivers show a 300 per cent increase (first half of 1934 compared with first half 1933. See Union Signal, August 4).

The time has come to face facts. The arguments used to relegalize liquor are now being used to legalize lotteries, gambling, and red-light districts. They are the same arguments that were used to bring about the Unwholesome America that followed the Civil War—lotteries, drink, betting on horse and other races, gambling, red-light districts. Slowly, as the nation got rested after the Civil War, it cleaned house, went for a Wholesome America: twenty states and territories adopted constitutional amendments against lotteries, five against race-track gambling, Louisiana against all gambling (lottery there abolished in 1890). Concurrent with the anti-lottery movement, 117 tracks where there was betting on races were closed in the thirty-eight years before 1927 (in thirty-one States). I have no history of the closing of the red-light districts, but we all know how they slowly disappeared in the Character Come-back that finally followed the Character Collapse of the post-Civil War period.

Now in the exhaustion period following the World War, the wet mentality arises, leads the way, and the rest follows; and back we go fifty years at least. But it won't last. Why? Because the newcomers who are taking possession of our government, the so-called foreign-language groups, will now see their homes despoiled; the small tradesmen will see their profits taken by the saloon, the races, lotteries perhaps, and red-light districts. Out of suffering the masses will separate into two political camps, those who see politics as loot and drink, and those who see it as a means of building up a decent world for their children. I say this advisedly, for I know personally leaders of the foreign groups in my own state. They are just as much for Wholesome America as I am.

Out of the city sidewalks will come Savonarolas who know that a government cannot be merely a Santa Claus but must found itself on character and hard work rather than on drink and get-something-for-nothing. Now mark well! The writer is a liberal, eager to see a more abundant life for all. But no government scheme can work, be it modified capitalism, socialism, or what not, unless it has behind it citizens of sterling character, strong for self-discipline, thrift, and self-sacrifice, and clear-headed enough to know that you can and must both educate and legislate morality into mankind.

We are not wise in falling for arguments that bluff about the present post-war character collapse. Rather face it and hold fast the memory of Wholesome America till we bring it back. This should be the special task of women's clubs and parent-teacher associations.

Cambridge, Mass., December 16 ELIZABETH TILTON

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I was really quite surprised to read a featured article in The Nation on the prohibition question which took into account not at all the one statistical barometer now available, namely, the reports from men in charge of State highway departments. Anyone who reads the daily papers has had a chance to see several of these. They indicate in the last year an alarming increase of accidents to automobilists and pedestrians alike, in some cases 50 per cent, as a result of alcohol. Should anyone want to refresh his mind on these facts, he will find them well marshaled in an article in the Christian Century of about a month ago written by John Haynes Holmes.

Your own article by Mr. Menchen [sic] is so far from convincing that it might almost be placed alongside the wish philosophy from which Mr. Menchen in past years has done so much to liberate his generation.

EGBERT CHALMER MACKLIN,
Pastor, Victoria Congregational Church
Jamaica, N. Y., December 10

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I was disappointed in Mr. Mencken's A Year of Legal Liquor. He writes like a man sitting in an easy chair far from realities. It is true that the orgy of drunkenness forecast by some dry fanatics has not materialized. It is a fact, however, that in almost every respect the prophecies of the advocates of repeal have proved inaccurate. Bootlegging still flourishes, crime has not abated a whit, drunkenness has notably increased, and despite all solemn promises, the saloon in effect is with us again. To be complacent, as Mr. Mencken is, under these circumstances, exhibits a detachment of mind which must be very convenient to a man who is on record as expecting so much from the repeal of prohibition.

LAWRENCE G. BROOKS, Special Justice,
First District Court of Eastern Middlesex
Malden, Mass., December 11

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

This fellow Mencken makes me tired. Some months ago there was a picture of him in the Saturday Review of Literature that hit him off just right. He was shown standing with a friend gazing with rapt awe at the picture of a brewery! If there ever was a half-intoxicated individual in the world, inebriated with the spirit of his own verbosity, it is Mencken.

Take that article of his, One Year of Legal Liquor, which you foolishly printed: the first paragraph could have been written only by someone absolutely blind to the facts of the case. Take the record of all the great cities—from Portland, Oregon, and Los Angeles to Boston and Hartford—and you find that the increase in drinking is tremendous. Take the little village in which I live—and thousands like it; and the increase of drunkenness is appalling.

Last summer I traveled 8,000 miles across the country and back and saw dozens and dozens of towns and cities, and my own observation confirms the facts as given. Surely The Nation, at any rate, ought to be on the side of sobriety, for God knows we need sober reasoning in these days that are upon us.

Pittsfield, N. H., December 8 HARRY TAYLOR, Minister, First Congregational Church

Japanese War Expenditures

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

An editorial in The Nation for December 5 says that the Japanese Diet approved "a record appropriation for the army and navy of over a billion yen, or 46 per cent of the annual budget." This common misstatement comes from the peculiarly complicated nature of our budgetary system, difficult for laymen to understand.

The Japanese budget is divided into General Account and Special Account, not a few appropriations appearing under both. Therefore, to figure out the percentage of military appropriations, we must first add up the appropriations in both the General and Special accounts, and then subtract from the total the items which overlap each other in the two accounts. The 1934-35 budget consists of a General Account of 2,143,000,000 yen and a Special Account of 6,883,000,000 yen, or a total of 9,026,000,000 yen. Deduct from this amount overlapping items totaling 2,368,000,000 yen, and the net estimated expenditure is 6,658,000,000 yen, of which the army's share is 449,000,000, or 6.74 per cent, and the navy's share 487,000,000 yen, or 7.31 per cent. The combined percentage of the army and the navy is 14.05, which shows a considerable reduction as compared with 17.32 for 1933-34.

In 1933-34 America's military and naval appropriations amounted to 17.51 per cent, England's 15.62, France's 23.36, and Italy's 20.88.

Washington, December 11 CAPTAIN T. YAMAGUCHI,
Japanese Naval Attache

[While it is true that the budgets of various countries are never exactly comparable, there would appear to be no basis for Captain Yamaguchi's claim that the Special Account should be taken into consideration in determining the proportion of Japan's budget which is devoted to war preparation. The Special Account compares roughly with the emergency and recovery expenditures of the United States and contains nothing, except possibly the sinking fund, which would be included in the regular budget of any country. We find, for example, the following to be among the larger of the thirty-four items listed under the Special Account: Government Railways, Rice Control, Post Office Life Insurance, Receipts on Public Loans, Iron Works, and the Governments of Chosen and Taiwan. In fact, the only items in the Special Account which appear to belong in the regular budget are of a military nature, including appropriations for an army arsenal, a naval arsenal, a naval fuel office, and a naval powder mill.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Not Crackpot but a Menace

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The heading placed by The Nation over my letter in the issue of December 19, in which I indicated how the proposed new party would be made up of elements already showing fascist tendencies, is ambiguous, and does not reflect what I wrote. The heading could mean that I consider the idea of such a party "crackpot." I certainly do not. I consider it a menace of the most serious kind, as my letter indicated.

I said that the new party would be "recruited from liberal or left-wing elements of both the Democratic and the Republican Party, from right-wing Socialists, from Technocrats, Sinclairites, Utopians, Social Creditites, Farmer Laborites, supplemented by a general assortment of adherents to a variety of crackpot and social theories." I do not agree with the Democratic or the Republican Party, but in justice to my intelligence you should not suggest that I believe them "crackpot."

Such a heading lays The Nation open to the—I hope—unjust suspicion that it is so favorable to the proposed party that it seeks to ridicule any disparaging of such an enterprise.

New York, December 20

MAXWELL HYDE

Three Pishes for the Drifter and Hurrah for Dr. Townsend!

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In The Nation for November 14 the Drifter wrote an article about the Townsend Old-age Pension Plan, and I wish to say that whoever the Drifter may be he should be sure he knows what he is talking about before he has his articles published in a magazine that the gullible public are paying their good money to read.

In this article it is asserted that under the Townsend Plan any woman or man over sixty accepting the pension of $200 a month must renounce any private income he or she might have. This statement is untrue. The people back of this Townsend Plan have explained over and over through the newspapers, by articles in magazines, and over the radio that it is not the intention of the Townsend Plan to take away any of the accumulated wealth or possessions of anyone, especially of those who agree to come under the provisions of the Townsend Plan. And I say "pish" to the Drifter for making a statement apparently intended to mislead the public.

The Drifter also says he could not spend as much as $200 a month. Couldn't he buy diamond necklaces for his dog, as some of the millionaires have done, while people less fortunate have not had the money to buy shoes for their children? Perhaps, though, the Drifter would call shoes and food for the laboring people "gewgaws."

"Pish" again to the Drifter for his reference to Chaucer, Milton, Jane Austen, and the rest. In their day people were old at sixty years. In our day "life begins at sixty."

Haugan, Mont., December 13

E. COLEMAN

Our Public Schools

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I read the article by John K. Norton on Educational Finance in The Nation of December 5 and am in complete sympathy with the views expressed therein; yet there is a further question to be raised about the returns that are realized for the tax dollars spent on the present school system. I am a product of the public-school system, have taught in the high school, and have sent four children through the public schools. I am not unappreciative of what the public schools have done for America and of the devoted work of many of our teachers, but it seems to me that the time has come for a very marked change from the old system and an adaptation of it to the needs of modern life. The educators themselves are groping for a new and better plan of popular education, but I wish some standard periodical like The Nation would lead in a study of this vital problem. To a large extent our present school system develops a parasitic psychology. If children were taught to share in the work of the world and to render public service, this would be changed.

I agree that the nation ought to maintain the schools, but it is also entitled to a different product from what it is getting.

Kellogg, Minn., December 6

ROBERT H. DUEL

A Ray of Light from Germany

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

May I through your correspondence columns call attention to the underground movement in Germany? These illegal activities are more difficult and dangerous than they were in czarist Russia or are in fascist Italy; nevertheless they go on. Prague is the center of the struggle against Hitler. The most important weapon is the printed word, in flysheet, newspaper, or pamphlet. It is impossible to satisfy the demand for it. Even within Germany production goes forward. Most of those engaged in illegal activities are unemployed. There is a perpetual lack of money. There is lack of printing presses, typewriters, duplicating machines. Funds are scraped together penny by penny. The most illegal publication is the Socialist Action, an eight-page newspaper published every fortnight. A single copy weighs barely an eighth of an ounce. During its first year two million copies were distributed.

The titles of the pamphlets are interesting. "Plato's Feast" and "Do You Take Care of Your Hair?" are miniature editions of the Socialist Review. The paralyzing spell that first lay on the masses of the population has disappeared. A wave of discontent is spreading. Slowly but unflinchingly those opposed to Hitler are pushing ahead with their work of sapping and undermining, like moles, the walls of the Third Reich. They are fighting to bring back the civilized Germany that was.

Chicago, December 11

JAMES M. YARD

Jacques Romain

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Jacques Romain, poet and novelist of color, and the finest living Haitian writer, has just been sentenced at Port-au-Prince, Haiti, to two years in jail for circulating there a French magazine of Negro liberation called the Cri des Nègres. Jacques Romain is a young man of excellent European education, formerly occupying a high post in the Haitian government and greatly respected by intellectuals as an outstanding man of letters. He is one of the very few upper-class Haitians who understand and sympathize with the plight of the oppressed peasants of the island, and who have attempted to write about and to remedy the pitiful conditions of 90 per cent of the Haitian people, exploited by the big coffee monopolies and the manipulations of foreign finance in the hands of the National City Bank.

As a fellow-writer of color, I call upon all writers and artists of whatever race who believe in the freedom of words and of the human spirit, immediately to protest to the President of Haiti and to the nearest Haitian consulate against the uncalled for, unmerited sentence to prison of Jacques Romain.

Carmel, Cal., December 1

LANGSTON HUGHES

George Herbert Palmer

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The undersigned will be very grateful for any interesting data—letters, notes of lectures, personal reminiscences—concerning the late Professor George Herbert Palmer of Harvard University. All material received at 465 West Twenty-third Street, will be safely returned to the owner.

New York, December 10

FRANCES LEE PANCHAUD

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FISCHER is the Moscow correspondent of The Nation.

CARL BECKER, professor of European history at Cornell University, is the author of "The Heavenly City of the Eighteenth Century Philosophers."

HAROLD J. LASKI, of the faculty of the University of London, is the author of many authoritative works on political science. His latest book is "Democracy in Crisis."

ROSE M. STEIN is research secretary of the League for Social Justice of Pittsburgh.

EDA LOU WALTON is associate professor of English at Washington Square College, New York University, and the author of "Jane Matthew, and Other Poems."

LIONEL TRILLING is a member of the English Department of Columbia University.

AGNES SMEDLEY is the author of "Chinese Destinies" and "China's Red Army Marches."

ROBERT MORSE is a New York artist.

Next Week

Huey Long

by Raymond Gram Swing
and

An Article on the Power Fight

by Frank P. Walsh, Chairman of the New York State Power Authority

Labor and Industry

The Steel Barons "Mediate"

By ROSE M. STEIN

Pittsburgh, December 14

EARLY in last June, just as the National Industrial Recovery Act was nearing its first birthday, the Administration in Washington and the country generally were considerably disturbed by the serious threat of a nationwide steel strike. As the result, however, of a series of maneuvers initiated by the federal government, carried out by the more conservative union leaders, and not too vigorously fought by the rank and file, plans for an immediate strike were abandoned. This was done on the explicit understanding that the government would set up competent and authoritative mediation machinery to adjust labor difficulties in the steel industry. Such machinery was set up some six months ago, and it is not too soon to take stock of its accomplishment, for what happens in steel is both a barometer of conditions in other major industries and the force that regulates the barometer.

Public Resolution No. 44, passed during the closing hours of the Seventy-third Congress, together with President Roosevelt's executive order issued June 29, created the National Steel Labor Relations Board and outlined its specific duties and powers. It was made clear that the board had full authority to investigate employees' complaints, to mediate differences, and, if necessary, to order and supervise employees' elections. Judge Walter P. Stacy was made chairman of the board; Dr. James Mullenbach and Rear Admiral Henry A. Wiley were the other two members. No one who has had a chance to work with this board or who has observed the board in action can possibly question the competence or sincerity of its members. In fact, the board was so competent that there could not be found another one like it. When the textile situation became particularly acute last summer and a mediation body was sought, the same three men were asked to serve as the Textile Labor Relations Board. Automobile workers, disheartened with their own mediation board, have in a number of instances asked the Administration for permission to present their problems before the Steel Labor Relations Board. If the facts indicate failure on the part of the Steel Board to achieve the purpose it was created for, such failure must be charged not to the board's personnel but to the basic principle that mediation is inevitably doomed to failure when one of the parties concerned is so powerful that it can defy both the other contestant and the mediator.

At the outset the board reduced the problem to a simple formula. It said to employers in effect:

Under Section 7-a workers have a right to choose whom they please to represent them in collective bargaining with their employers. You, employers, may have a moral interest in the type of organization your employees choose, but you have no legal interest in it. You have no right to interfere with their choice. Your very presence here is only a matter of courtesy on our part. If you say that you are not certain which organization represents the workers in your plant, then we shall be glad to set up the machinery to determine that fact for you.

The three small companies involved in the board's first public hearings, held in Pittsburgh from August 14 to 16, were nonplussed by so frank and simple a statement of the issue. They could find no ready basis for opposing it. One of the participants, the Apollo Steel Company, discovered, literally overnight, by means of a "careful check-up" that the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers really represented a majority in its plant, and since it conceded the fact, there was no need for an election. Another of the companies promised to negotiate with union representatives. The third and smallest of the three threatened court action but finally agreed to an election, which the union carried by a substantial majority.

While some newspapers hailed the outcome of these initial hearings as a victory for mediation, the general consensus of opinion was that the real test would come only when petitions were heard against the larger steel companies, especially the United States Steel Corporation. This encounter took place, also in Pittsburgh, on October 3.

It was an impressive show. The small third-floor courtroom in Pittsburgh's Old Post Office building was jammed to the doors. The crowd consisted mainly of steel workers. What a variety of faces! Here was a real league of nations; broad-cheeked Slavs, Poles, and Croats; deep-eyed Hungarians; Italians, Swedes, Americans; all absorbed and somewhat bewildered, all eager to testify yet struck with fright when finally called to the witness stand. This was their show but they did not quite understand it. During recess one could hear them say, "Why they talk so much company union, company union? Everybody knows company union no good." In the mill there is no such make-believe. A worker may be forced at the end of a riot stick to vote for company-union representatives, but such action is frankly interpreted as an exercise of employer's authority. Here they talked of a company union as though it existed of itself. Every man in his senses knew that was not true.

"If it please the board, we will present the case of Fort Dukane Lodge No. 187, Duquesne Works, Carnegie Steel Company, a subsidiary of the United States Steel Corporation." It was Charlton Ogburn speaking, attorney for the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers. Mr. Ogburn presents these cases simply and undramatically, but with a kind of dogged persistence. The issue, after all, is perfectly simple, and very much the same in every instance. In accordance with the right granted them by Section 7-a, workers of Duquesne's steel mill have joined the Amalgamated. They claim to represent a majority of the 4,200 workers in the plant, and since the management appears to question this claim, they ask a government-supervised election. It is within the board's jurisdiction to grant such an election. The petitioners endeavored to prove that there existed a spirit of unrest which could be allayed only by an election. There was one Negro among the witnesses, Williamson by name. He works in the Duquesne plant and preaches on the side, but out of both jobs he "ain't been able to buy no decent pair of shoes them last four years."

"Do you know of any unrest among the workers in Duquesne?" he was asked. "Do I know of any unrest?" Williamson repeated the question in a rising crescendo. "Yes, sir, I knows they's unrest, 'cause some o' that unrest's in me."

The defendant was represented by three attorneys. But who was the defendant? The steel company, of course. Everyone knew that. Some of the corporation's "big shots" were present, among them Arthur H. Young, director of industrial relations and reputed to be the author of the company-union plan. On the witness stand Mr. Young admitted that his plan was not a union or even an organization, but "a contact scheme." One of the attorneys explained how this "contact scheme" fulfils the requirements of collective bargaining. With the aid of a new Standard Dictionary he defined bargaining as an endeavor to make a bargain. The definition, he pointed out, says nothing about the right to impose or exact a bargain. It merely says endeavor. Bargaining, then, is a contact of minds. That contact takes place when workers and management meet, whether or not a bargain ensues. Yes, it was perfectly clear that the employer was the defendant. But back in August the Steel Board had indicated that employers had no legal status at these hearings. A legal fiction was therefore obligingly adhered to; that is, legally, the United States Steel Corporation was merely an interested observer. The real defendants were representatives of the company union. Thus proceeded the farce in which industry engaged one-half of the working class to beat down the other half.

Workers were called to testify for both sides. Union men recited a long tale of unrest, of coercion and discrimination. "Boss's friend gets five days' work a week, union man get maybe one day or two." On the election day everyone was asked to vote for the company union. It was more than a mere request, it was a complete check-up. "Boss, he come around with pencil and paper. If you vote, he put your name and check number on one side. If you no vote, he put your name on other side, then it's too bad for you."

On the company's side workers cheerfully responded to their attorneys' leading questions. The company union was painted as a paradise in disguise. Under cross-examination, however, it was brought out that most of the company-union representatives had no idea of the real meaning of the plan's provisions. They had no notion of where their authority to bargain for the workers came from or of how to enforce such authority if they had it. The company admittedly pays all expenses, including the time representatives spend in bargaining with the management, and the expense of a full time secretary as well. The company, it was brought out, was paying for the attorneys and witnesses involved in this proceeding. Anyone could detect the insincerity of company witnesses. Why did they thus prostitute themselves? The answer was not hard to find. With but one exception, every worker who testified for the company had put in twenty-five years or more of service with the company. One man testified of having worked for the Carnegie Steel Company since 1884. They are too old to run the risk of having to seek new jobs, and many of them are desperately clutching the hope of getting a pension sometime soon.

The case of the Carnegie Steel Company plant at McDonald, Ohio, differs somewhat from the usual case.

Here workers in February, 1934, defeated the company-union plan by a vote of 714 to 627. Despite this fact, company-union representatives were put up for election on June 15, and when it was found that an insufficient number of votes had been cast, the polls were kept open for another twenty-four hours, the ballots having been in the meantime stored in the company's vault.

A number of hearings have been held since October 3. These involved, among others, the Jones and Laughlin Corporation, the Youngstown Sheet and Tube, and the Wheeling, Illinois, and Acme Steel corporations. In every instance the evidence was overwhelmingly in favor of the workers. In every instance glaring violations of Section 7-a were testified to. In every instance the companies tried to bring counter-testimony to prove coercion on the part of the union. Long hours were consumed in this counter-testimony, which on the face of it had no meaning. Even if coercion on the part of the union could be proved, it would still be beside the point. Section 7-a forbids coercion on the part of employers, not employees. If some workers try to persuade other workers to join a given organization, they are within their legal right if the means of persuasion are peaceful; they are subject to criminal prosecution if the means are violent. In neither case is coercion, as defined in the labor clause, involved. Employers could charge workers with coercion and interference only in the event that such workers endeavored to keep individual steel corporations from joining the Iron and Steel Institute or the National Manufacturers' Association. No such charges have as yet been brought forward.

The steel industry is taking none of these hearings seriously. The Carnegie Steel Company and some of the lesser satellites in steel have recently summarized their position in these words: they would "negotiate with members of any employees' organization as representatives of those employees which they represent." True, these words convey little meaning, but the very effort to becloud the issue is indicative of the employers' determination not to recognize any bona fide union. Even where Amalgamated lodges have by vote or company concession been recognized as representing a majority, no contract or working agreement has so far ensued. As a matter of fact, the companies have been quite frank in this respect. Both on and off the witness stand they have repeatedly stated they would recognize no union. For, they point out, this would lead to the worst of all bugaboos, the closed shop. The closed shop, they hasten to add, is specifically forbidden by Section 7-a. And of course the steel industry would do nothing that is forbidden by law. At the Weirton trial in Wilmington the same motif was emphasized; union recognition means the closed shop, and the closed shop is forbidden by the Recovery Act.

While seeking refuge in the Recovery Act, steel companies openly profess little confidence in or respect for that law. Every Steel Board hearing held so far has been opened by a uniform prologue, somewhat on this order:

We deny the jurisdiction and authority of this board on the grounds: (1) that the NIRA and Congressional Resolution No. 44 creating the board are unconstitutional; (2) that the board has no authority to investigate controversies arising between employers and employees for the reason that they do not affect interstate commerce; (3) that the President's executive order conferring jurisdiction is not authorized by the Recovery Act.

In effect, then, the companies, even though they take part in the hearings, are merely playing at cooperation. They show not the remotest intention of abiding by the board's decisions, unless of course such decisions should happen to be in their favor. Otherwise they will drag the case to the courts and bury it there for as long as possible. For the present, the hearings offer an effective means of playing for time. William Green also wants time. When he appeared before the reconvened steel workers' convention in Pittsburgh, on June 15, to plead for the acceptance of a mediation plan in place of a strike, he emphasized that by this means the workers would not only have their immediate grievances promptly adjusted but would gain time in which to achieve other essential objectives, among them the mobilization of public opinion and the building of a strong union organization. How has each side utilized these six months?

Employers have used these last six months to allow more work to non-union than to union men. On the least provocation, heretofore generally overlooked, union men have been fired or laid off. The employers have perfected their spy system and increased their threats of dismissal. They have in many instances, through the control of local relief administrators, interfered with relief grants, and have made the most of personal slander against union leaders. At the same time they have organized baseball teams, built swimming pools, and held parties. What has the union done to counteract these efforts? Practically nothing. Save in a few new localities, there has not been an Amalgamated organizer in the field for about a year.

The inevitable question arises: What will all this lead to? The Steel Board may or may not order elections in the larger plants—United States Steel, Jones and Laughlin, and Weirton. If such elections are ordered, and if the usual temper of these companies prevails—and nothing short of a miracle could change it—the orders will be defied. Even if elections are held and the union wins by overwhelming majorities, the steel industry will not accept the union as a bargaining agency without a bitter fight. Sooner or later, then, the testimony so patiently gathered by the Steel Board will be absorbing the interest of nine Supreme Court judges. This might not be necessary if a law were forced through the next Congress interpreting union-organization efforts as coercion and making coercion generally illegal. The National Manufacturers' Association, at its recent convention, went on record as advocating a revised labor plank that would "guarantee employees the right to deal with employers either individually or collectively or through representatives of their own choice without intimidation or coercion of either party from any source."

Most of the rank-and-file leaders have not lost heart. William Spang, president of the Pittsburgh district, says: "If we held an election in Duquesne tomorrow we would walk away with it. If they don't grant us an election, then we'll have to prove our strength in the only other way open to us." William J. Long, president of the Weirton lodge, says: "Not many in our lodge pay dues and not many come to our meetings. Why should they when everything is at a standstill? Give us an election and we'll go over the top. If we don't get an election, just wait until next April." Ed Leighty, president of the Alton, Illinois, lodge, says: "The rank-and-file feeling is one of bewilderment. But many of us are stringing along in case something does happen." And Cecil

E. Allen, president of the Indianapolis district, says: "If the steel corporations think the workers won't organize and strike for better conditions, they are foolish."

If the spring months bring any sizable increase in production, a renewed wave of strike sentiment among steel workers, as among other classes of workers, is almost inevitable. However, unless the union makes adequate preparation for such an eventuality, either the strike plans will again be squelched by government interference or the strike, if as now seems likely one is declared, will be unorganized and sporadic, and will almost certainly prove futile against the combined forces of the Steel Institute and business interests generally. The Amalgamated and the American Federation of Labor have at least three months in which to make preparations. Much can be done in that time. Will they rise to this opportunity?

Steadier Jobs in Automobiles

THE sensational hearings in Detroit on wages in the automobile industry were part of an investigation ordered by the President with a view to making jobs in that industry less seasonal. He promised such a study as a gesture to labor when he extended the automobile code without change to February 1, 1935. Since the industry has recently inaugurated its own plan for regularization, it can meet any government proposals by saying that this plan must be given a fair trial. For years new models have been shown in January and produced mainly in February, March, and April. After that workers are laid off in great numbers. The industry's new plan provides that some new models be announced in December, some in January, and some higher-priced ones in June. The main production period would then be spread through December and January and through the summer months, which are usually the slackest.

It is doubtful whether the manufacturers will undertake another obvious way of regularization, namely, offer pre-season low prices, although they did cut prices after the season this year. Nor is the prospect of unemployment-insurance legislation likely to influence them. They will certainly not encourage the passage of such legislation in Michigan and other states, and if a federal law is passed, it is unlikely to tax companies or industries according to the rate at which they lay off workers, or, if it does, to levy a tax big enough to stimulate further regularization.

Finally, there seems little immediate chance that the industry as a whole will follow Ford in dropping the policy of claiming radical yearly improvements in the hope of getting a rush of orders early in the year. The annual new model used to be justified when substantial improvements were being discovered. At present it is mostly ballyhoo. If the industry gave it up and introduced changes only when mechanical progress really justified it, orders and manufacture would tend to level off. To be sure, such a policy would remove style as a motive for buying and might cut down sales, but it would mean a substantial saving in other directions. It would decrease the enormous number of second-hand cars which compete with the new; tools would not have to be replaced every year; and the industry could produce as much as it does today with a smaller investment in equipment, which must now be maintained at the level necessary for peak production.

[Not Fit to Print, ■ article on the Newspaper Guild's fight for union recognition, which was announced for this issue, will appear next week.]

Books, Drama, Films

Mr. Pope

The Early Career of Alexander Pope. By George Sherburn. Oxford University Press. $5.

ALEXANDER POPE suffered an odd fate: his works were issued in a monumental edition prepared by men who neither admired his writing nor respected his character. That edition, somewhat revised, is still today the standard one, and it is not unreasonable to suppose that the attitude it takes has largely influenced nearly every estimate of his personality as well as the orthodox opinion of his literary rank. Mr. Sherburn now points out that Pope had been unfortunate from the very beginning in the men who elected to write about him, and he proposes to reexamine the years before the publication of "The Dunciad" in order to set the earlier career of its author in a truer light.

Not long ago Edith Sitwell undertook something of the sort, but she proceeded in an entirely different manner. Her book was the book of an enthusiastic amateur, interesting largely because of its crotchets and prejudice; Mr. Sherburn, on the other hand, is a research scholar who has devoted himself with tireless patience to picking the knots of a tangled web. He frankly disclaims any attempt at either literary criticism or biography in the usual sense, and his book can have little appeal to the general reader. His concern is with documents and old newspapers, with forgotten pamphlets, obscure allusions, and dates of publication. But no future historian of Augustan literature can afford to do other than consult it on numberless occasions. Here are hundreds of specific and relevant facts which only boundless patience could gather and arrange.

Mr. Sherburn would be the last to claim that he has whitewashed his subject, but he does make it clear that students have shown an odd disposition to forget the testimony of Pope's friends while listening to that of his enemies; and it is perfectly true that a hundred persons have heard that Pope "could not take tea without stratagem" to one who knows that Spence, a modest man with no ax to grind, set down in a manuscript the opinion: "All the people well acquainted with Mr. Pope looked on him as a most friendly, open, charitable, and generous-hearted man."

Now there is, to be sure, no reason for accepting such a statement as that without qualification. Pope was certainly capable not only of the most venomous spite and of hardly dignified intrigue but also of a childishly brutal revenge, like that which he took when he administered a purge to the disreputable publisher Curll. But Mr. Sherburn does make it clear that the quarrels were less often of Pope's making than we commonly suppose, and that Grubb Street had asked repeatedly for what it finally got. He might, to be sure, have treated his enemies as too far below him for notice, and he might, when he did reply, have chosen a higher ground instead of consenting to fight the battle out on their level of insinuation and vituperation. But at least he was no more coarse and no more brutal than his enemies, and the modern reader who winces when he hears Pope mock his opponents for their want of bread may take what comfort he can from the reflection that these honest poor had begun by twitting Pope with his crooked back.

There is also a consideration which, being aesthetic, is outside the province of Mr. Sherburn's book: Pope did, indeed, transform the manner if not the matter of the controversy and raised sneering to the level of art. To accuse a critic of being poor is not a pretty procedure, and neither is it exactly gentlemanly to suggest that a lady who has rejected your advances suffers from venereal disease. As a moralist I reprobate both actions; but I confess that I find it hard to remember that Dennis was a real man or Lady Mary a real woman when I read the two familiar couplets:

Yet then did Dennis rage in furious fret;
I never answer'd; I was not in debt.

and

From furious Sappho scarce a milder fate,
Pox'd by her love, or libell'd by her hate.

Whatever pain these lines may have caused disappeared two centuries ago. So, too, did the human and unlovely malice which inspired them. But something in them that is lovely—skill, gusto, and sheer felicity of utterance—remains. And beauty of even that unholy sort is a joy forever.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

A Handbook of Injustice

Human Exploitation. By Norman Thomas. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.75.

WHATEVER complacency still exists in the mind of the average American after the experiences of the past five years will be rudely shocked by the reading of Norman Thomas's latest book. Unlike his earlier works this volume contains little of his personal convictions or of Socialist theory. It is far more provocative than that. Possibly it might best be described as a social case study of American civilization or as a handbook of economic and social justice. It is written in Mr. Thomas's inimitably pungent style, and while not as comprehensive as a yearbook of statistics or as emotionally powerful as a great social novel, it combines many of the best features of each.

The picture which it presents is far from a pleasant one. The author begins by describing the toll of landlordism in this country, the incredible housing conditions in the slums and in rural districts. He cites authority to the effect that half the homes in the United States fail to measure up to the minimum standard of decent housing. In 1930, for example, only 15.8 per cent of all farm dwellings had running water, and only 13.4 per cent were able to utilize electricity for lighting purposes, while in certain sections of the South from 85 to 90 per cent of the houses lacked any sanitary conveniences whatever. In contrast to this, he describes the unseemly wealth of certain families whose only claim to distinction is that certain of their ancestors invested in real estate in what was later to become the heart of a great city.

Even more depressing is the chapter entitled Farming for Exercise, which portrays the plight of the million and a half share-croppers in the South. The average income of a share-cropper family in Arkansas, where Mr. Thomas has made a special study of the situation, is said to be less than $210 a year, and even this has been taken away from many by the dislocation resulting from the AAA crop-restriction program. The position of the migratory workers in agriculture is even worse in certain sections. For many of these, men, women, and children, the only home that they possess is the automobile in which they travel from place to place looking for an opportunity to work at starvation wages. Strikes and attempts at labor organization are ruthlessly suppressed, even in the more progressive portions of the country.

Conditions in the lumber camps of the Northwest are but slightly better. Hourly wages run from twenty-three to forty cents for a forty-hour week under the NRA, but out of this come exorbitant deductions for food, laundry, and other expenses. Even this wage is intermittent, for the working periods are interspersed with long intervals of unemployment. Exploitation is also flagrant in the mining industry. Wages are so low as to keep a large proportion of the miners constantly in debt to the company, virtually in a state of peonage; the housing conditions may be judged from the fact that the United States Coal Commission found only 2 of 713 typical mining villages which met the most modest requirements as to water supply and sewage disposal.

The standard of living of wage-earners in all fields of industry is shown to be far from reasonably satisfactory, even in years of so-called prosperity. Average incomes for manual workers in 1926 varied from $1,100 to $1,160 a year, while the estimates of the minimum cost of a health-and-decency standard of living for a family of five ranged from $1,900 to $2,500. Moreover, since the onset of the depression labor has suffered a greater than proportionate decline in income, in addition to bearing the brunt of the unemployment and general insecurity of the period. Add to this the social cost of the exploitation of women, children, and the Negro, and the indictment of our existing social order is overwhelming.

If one can make a criticism of such a valuable book, it is that Mr. Thomas has not interpreted his material so as to convince the average reader of the cause of the shocking conditions he describes. A detailed analysis of the operation of the capitalist system is of course beyond the scope of a volume of this type. Nevertheless, the indictment of present-day society which the author presents would be immeasurably stronger if he had taken more pains to integrate his material. Despite this weakness, which some critics would doubtless consider a virtue, the book is incomparably the best in its field, one which every socially-minded individual will wish to possess for reference purposes.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

The Pursuit of Glory

The Glory Hunter. A Life of General Custer. By Frederic F. Van de Water. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.75.

THIS is an important book, not so much because of its literary quality, which could easily be improved, as because of the author's obvious devotion to the truth. It was time for a judicially fair review of Custer's life, especially in view of the growing tendency to make a hero of an officer who sacrificed the lives of half his regiment by throwing all military caution and principles to the winds. His own death he fully deserved, as everyone who reads Mr. Van de Water's review of his military career—which included the killing in cold blood of Confederate prisoners in the Shenandoah—will agree. If some of the facts in it were carved on the shaft at the Custer battlefield—now visited by thousands of tourists every year—there would be a widespread feeling that especial distinction was hardly merited by the "hero" of the Little Big Horn.

Luck and fortune favored Custer far beyond his deserts. They gave him a wife wonderful in her blind devotion to him, who lived for more than fifty years after his death to sing his praises through her readable, if sentimental, books. She largely created the Custer myth, portraying him as a glorious, noble-hearted knight who lived only to do good deeds. As a matter of fact, Custer, who had been the sloppiest of cadets at West Point, graduating at the very bottom of his class, became a merciless martinet, drilling and driving his men until they hated him—except for his superb bravery; he always charged at the head of his troops. Twice they mutinied against him. He was absolutely ruthless and cold-blooded, as at the massacre of a village of unsuspecting Cheyenne men, women, and children on the Washita in 1867. At that time he refused to go to the aid of his major and nineteen men, who were surrounded by other Indians and killed after their ammunition was gone, with Custer and the regiment within hearing distance.

Custer was court-martialed once and suspended from duty for deserting his troops and ordering deserters murdered; on the charge of murder he was nearly tried. General David S. Stanley wrote of Custer when the latter was serving under him that he was "a cold-blooded, untruthful, unprincipled man." He was also a braggart, whose self-glorification was notorious; he was a poseur, who fought with a war correspondent to make him write about him. He was reckless in statement and act, but cringed and came to heel if called down by a superior. He had the friendship of General Sheridan, who kept him and others in the army when they should have been dismissed, and shared in his guilt in Indian matters, as did Sherman also, as Mr. Van de Water shows.

Indeed, one of the best parts of Mr. Van de Water's book is its fearless setting forth of the shameful and dishonorable treatment of the Indians throughout the period from 1865 to 1876, especially those events leading up to the campaign of 1876, when the Sioux were lied to, deceived, given lands only to be robbed of them, and generally outraged and exploited. A terrible chapter in American history! Mr. Van de Water has described the final Custer battle more clearly than any other writer, and with genuine dramatic power. All the way through he scrupulously tries to be fair, and he portrays well the love match of the Custers, one of the most remarkable cases of married devotion on record. Like Custer's courage under fire, it is a beautiful page in an otherwise brutal and bloody and repellent story. It is a pity that Mr. Van de Water did not supplement his narrative by adding historical data—a verified list of the dead at the Little Big Horn with brief sketches of the officers killed, of troopers who fell under Custer, of Reno and Benteen. Perhaps he will add this information in later editions, in which some of the repeated references to Custer's search for glory and the Greek fate which overtook him could be eliminated. This is a book which ought to be in all libraries since it is the only authentic life of Custer and the only true account available of the relations of the army to the Indian.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

A College Poet

Avalanche of April. By Kimball Flaccus. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

OUR colleges must be somewhat to blame for such poets as Kimball Flaccus. They have discovered the American tradition late but with enthusiasm, and are sending forth capable and very literary poets one and all imbued with the idea that America is a great country, that the American pioneer spirit can never die. Our young poets go, moreover, to such colleges as Dartmouth, Mr. Flaccus's Alma Mater—exclusive country colleges. For them, therefore, New York, even as Babylon, "is built of straw and fire-baked clay"; for them an adolescent American idealism endures.

Our earlier modern poets were not so handicapped. Many of them got their America at first hand, not through books. Now, of course, we are done with exploration, and folk poetry and specimens of native literature seldom appear. Our present poets are bound to be scholars of literature; but why need they be so self-consciously traditional? Modern young English poets are steeped in tradition and yet unaware of it. Young American poets apparently are so newly awakened to American ideals and patterns of thought as to be prevented by them from thinking or feeling for themselves.

Kimball Flaccus is a mature poet technically. He is no undisciplined moulder of words like Paul Engle. He writes of a young man's experiences in a country college—of college friendships, tramps, skiing trips, of New England springs and falls. He believes in the granite strength of New England hills, in good old American individualism. He is excited when he remembers the Indian life which once moved over his college hills. He believes, in other words, in writing out of America, in rooting his art in his own country. But for all his subject matter, his art is literary, his language and his rhythms are literary. He has not, as yet, struck through to an imagery, syntax, or rhythm which is authentic and his own.

He is too self-consciously the trained college poet, gifted, expert, capable of fine lyrics and fine blank verse, but only now and then capable of an unmistakably original line. In a few of his New England character sketches he approaches originality. But in most of the poems about his own experiences he uses the conventional poetic phrase, the poetic-sounding line, misfit though it be. Here, for example, he is talking about his canoe:

O balanced miracle of deft precision,
O factory-born, mechanic-midwived bird,
Earth craft projected through the tides of space
To touch me here by the Connecticut
With the impersonal shadow of your wing,
In the hot womb of the mind one man conceived you;
Though many hands welded the metal frame,
One hand controls you now.

Now this is dull, and dull, I think, because it is bookish—the sort of poetry which comes when a young writer thinks, "This is a good subject for a poem," and then, remembering all he has been taught about the art of poetry, writes.

Kimball Flaccus is only twenty-one. He is a careful student of poetic technique. Now and then he gives us a fine line or passage. If he were not worthy of analysis, one would not bother to point out his faults. His book has dignity, a certain fineness of conception, very real promise. But at present his work exemplifies the danger a young man runs in setting out to be an "American poet."

EDA LOU WALTON

Gamaliel Bradford

The Letters of Gamaliel Bradford, 1918 to 1931. Edited by Van Wyck Brooks. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.50.

EACH of Gamaliel Bradford's many books is a monument to his personal courage. During all his nearly seventy years he was almost intolerably ill; very feeble in physique, he was prey to many ailments, the frequent victim of terrible vertigo. Sustained effort was impossible for him, yet he trained himself to a system of reading and writing that allowed him to absorb huge masses of literature and to produce, besides the voluminous "Journal" and the indefatigable correspondence, of which the present volume represents but a part, a solid shelf of biographical essays, or, as he called them, "psychographs."

Quite apart from what it represents of his courage, his work is not to be despised. If Bradford does not ring the bell as Strachey always does, then at least he does not, as Strachey so often does, ring the bell at the wrong house or only out of mischievousness. Unlike Strachey, he was honest and strictly accurate; if he never misrepresents his characters into a new vitality he at least never misrepresents them. Writing in part at a time when biography was a rage and a fad, he appealed to the more cultivated popular taste—not to the special tastes of the literati—and served to offset the brash presumptions of "fictionalized" and "interpretative" biography. His "psychographs" (he fought for the needless word) are useful as pleasant arrangements of the conventional view. Short, and therefore seldom in danger of being dull, they give competent summary and convenient information; but they never truly enlighten.

Whoever reads Bradford's personalia must see at once why his work could not transcend this highly competent and useful mediocrity. Among other things the success of the modern biographer depends upon his sensitivity to his own time and people, together with the ability to cast this understanding back into a past time. But Bradford, because of his invalidism, was a man out of touch with his own time trying passionately to get into contact. Nor was his the rich inner life which convention ascribes to the recluse. His inner life was busy but not rich: he lived by a constant borrowing. The "Journal" seems to show a man trying to support his soul by raising loans from the culture of all mankind and perhaps most frequently from the more stricken romantics of the nineteenth century. His private meditations remain Amiel, Leopardi, Senancour, and the letter-writers of an earlier France, all at several removes.

The present volume of letters shows him trying to get into touch with the life of America between 1918 and 1931. The letters are pathetically long, pathetically humble, often pathetically uncalled-for and pathetically confused. He knew that he was between two cultures and he tried desperately to come into contact with the new. Had he been physically more robust, socially more vigorous, he might have achieved the stubborn yet gracious dignity of George Edward Woodberry as he saw the passing of the dominance of the culture he loved. But as Bradford said of himself (his humility and self-depreciation are pitifully and perhaps unfairly disarming): "I was born senile and am only by slow approaches just beginning to taste afar off the very slightest flavor of youth." To be young and at one with his nation he seems to have given up all the prerogatives of his years and all the certainties of his training, yet he did not have the one thing that would have compensated him for their loss—a truly sharp and skeptical eye.

He wanted to be in tune with the New America. And so he learned to worship energy for its own sake and to believe that Theodore Roosevelt, because he made a big noise, was useful. "What most of all fascinates me about Lincoln is the infinite tolerance, the unlimited understanding. . . . All the same, the righteous fury, the saeva indignatio, of Roosevelt is what helps the world, and I am immensely grateful for it." He put aside the old creeds and became the communicant of a skeptical, amorphous religiosity whose standards allowed the vulgar revivalism of Moody as somehow desirable. Rejecting the aloofness which his advanced age gave him, speaking from the simplicity of his touching new "youth," he found the America of the Smart Set, of realism mixed with silk-stockings sex, "sophistication," and contempt, to be true and important. From a man so confused, so anxiously straining to be included, we cannot expect biography of superlative insight; it is to the credit of his real tradition and of his honesty that he has given us sound journeyman work.

LIONEL TRILLING

"Peace and Order" in China

Problems of the Pacific, 1933. Proceedings of the Fifth Conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations, Banff, 1933. University of Chicago Press. $5.

IT is a fine commentary on this record of an international Pacific conference that it contains not one reference to the Chinese Soviet Republic or the six wars which the Nanking Government has waged against it. Perhaps that is because the Nanking Government has been defeated in every one of its wars. However, there is indirect reference. We are told that the Nanking Government is "reclaiming" regions in Hupeh Province "devastated by the bandits and Communists." The fact is, of course, that these regions were devastated not by the masses who had established their Soviets there but by the Nanking militarists who overran them.

There are two papers in this volume by Chinese delegates which deserve special mention. One, by Gideon Chen, is entitled Chinese Government [Nanking] Economic Planning and Reconstruction; the other is The Agrarian Problem in China, by Professor Chen Han-seng. Gideon Chen's report seems to have been one of the chief propaganda bids for foreign capitalist loans and investments in China. It did not get very far, however, for a summary of the Banff proceedings announces that the first necessity in China is the "restoration of peace and order." The leit-motif of Gideon Chen's report is the Five-Year Plan of the Nanking Government. Since 1929, when Nanking lifted the idea of planning from the Soviet Government, it has periodically announced a Four-Year, a Five-Year, a Six-Year, and a Ten-Year Plan. All began with a long list of the names of generals and politicians who constituted the Planning Commission, and all ended with a plea to foreign capitalists for money. Nothing has come of any of them. As for the restoration of "peace and order," what it amounts to in Nanking territory today is seen in the report of the Chinese delegate Professor Chen Han-seng, the noted Chinese historian and agrarian research scholar. Professor Chen has done a masterly piece of work. In it we see the labyrinthine system of feudal landlordism which constitutes one of the main pillars of the Nanking Government. We see the landlord, who is also government official, tax collector, usurer, judge, jury, and executioner all in one. It is this gentleman who maintains "law and order" in Chinese villages.

Professor Chen Han-seng begins his report like this: "That the whole economic fabric of China is constructed on the back of the peasant is a fact probably known to many people." Then he shows by citing facts what the land problem is in China: In one of the richest districts of China, that of Ting Hsien in the north, "70 per cent of the peasant population own less than 30 per cent of the cultivated land," while in the Yangtze delta region the landlords "are purely and simply rent collectors. . . . There the monopoly of land ownership has gone so far that 3 per cent of the population possess 80 per cent of the land." Near Wusih, a city five hours by train from Shanghai, "less than 6 per cent of the landlord families possess 47 per cent of the cultivated land, and 69 per cent of the families, poor peasants and hired peasants, keep only 14.2 per cent of the land." In Kwantung Province to the extreme south, "2 per cent of the landlord families enjoy the ownership of more than half of the land," while in the eastern part of Kwangsi Province, "2 per cent of the families possess 71 per cent of the cultivated land, and 70 per cent of the peasant families are landless." Professor Chen's report reveals how the temple lands are being secretly mortgaged and sold by the powerful landlord monks, or publicly auctioned by local militarists. Throughout Manchuria, even before the Japanese occupation, the local militarists had turned public lands into their own great private estates. In Suiyuan Province, northwest of Peking, "265 Catholic churches claim a total of 5,000,000 mow of land [one mow is one-sixth of an acre]." Two powerful Chinese landlords, Lee and Yang, own 70,000 mow and have usurped 400,000 mow of state land.

It should interest the American people to know that Chinese militarists and politicians take advantage of disastrous floods and famines to build up great estates for themselves. Professor Chen mentions facts to prove this, showing that in the great 1931 Yangtze floods, for which Americans donated money and food, the politicians and rich landlords merely utilized the occasion to get control of the land of the peasants. In the north-western famine region government officials gave starving peasant families one meal of rice and took in return 100 mow of land.

The role of rent and usury in the bankruptcy of Chinese agrarian economy is also brilliantly brought out. Professor Chen says: "Powerful absentee landlords sometimes do not pay taxes at all; their share of the tax burden falls upon the shoulders of poor peasants." The following paragraph gives a picture of the thing called "peace and order":

Village administration in China is simply permeated by the omnipresent influence of the landlord. Tax, police, judicial, and educational systems are built upon his power. Poor peasants who fail to satisfy the landlord-official in tax and rent payments are brutally imprisoned and tortured. In Kiangsu Province [Shanghai-Nanking area] as many as 500 tenants are kept in one small district prison. In Wusih [between Shanghai and Nanking] are 518 village chiefs. One hundred and four of these have been investigated as regards their economic status: 91.3 per cent of them are landlords, 7.7 per cent are rich peasants, and 1 per cent small merchants. . . . In this respect, Wusih is typical of all the districts in China. . . . Because of the extremely small farms, poor peasants in China cannot secure the credit they need from the banks directly. Thus the big landlords in the villages, besides their political power, always command the trade and usury capital in the locality.

In concluding, Professor Chen tells us that the landless peasants in China are growing in number, and pouring into the army—there are at least 2,000,000 soldiers in the armies of the militarists—in order to get rice. There are, he further says, at least 60,000,000 unemployed in the country.

Professor Chen draws no conclusions from his researches. But the masses of Chinese peasants and workers in the central and southern part of the country have reached their own conclusion, namely, revolution. Yet we are told by the Institute of Pacific Relations that "peace and order" must be restored by the Nanking Government, preparatory to the granting of loans from foreign governments. There is something seriously wrong with the brains and hearts of any group of people who would desire that the peace and order of the Nanking Government be inflicted longer upon the Chinese people.

Professor Chen's paper has been published in pamphlet form by the Institute of Pacific Relations, 129 East Fifty-second Street, New York City. The cost is 25 cents, but the value is a thousand times that. It is the result of scientific labor extending over a period of many years. Wherever China is studied, this pamphlet is indispensable.

AGNES SMEDLEY

Looking at Pictures

Enjoying Pictures. By Clive Bell. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

CLIVE BELL'S latest book explains as a meditation. The first essay is concerned with an hour's happiness in the National Gallery. An examination of this happiness brings out the central theme of the rest of the book: the aesthete confronted by a work of art is first conscious of a moment of ecstasy ("the aesthetic thrill"). Following this intense flash of feeling is a period of more sober pleasure ("the aesthetic mood") which cannot be attained without the agency of the original engendering spark. While absorbed in the aesthetic mood the aesthete subjects the work of art to "enthusiastic analysis." Any element of the painting may offer itself as subject for analysis, even such elements as iconography, influence of other schools, a fold of drapery, some acute piece of observation on the part of the painter. The best point Mr. Bell makes in this connection is that works of art differ in the pleasure they give according to the quality and amount of material they offer for enthusiastic analysis. Certainly, it seems to me, when this standard is applied to most modern paintings it becomes apparent that they were painted almost entirely for the sake of the original flash of feeling.

The second essay, In the Vatican, is for the most part an enthusiastic analysis of Raphael's stanze. It is always pleasant to hear a good word for these lovely paintings, too often scorned in late years by those fashionables who can only bear to look at Giotto and Picasso. I found the parallel Mr. Bell draws between Milton and Raphael a good one. He says of a quotation from Milton:

Now that is abstract in a way; certainly it is not direct but it is not rhetorical either. The primitive emotion has been carried to a far place and there converted to forms of splendor. But it is not rhetoric; the symbols are not ready-made, the epithets are vividly expressive. It is art in perfection. And so, I was to discover, are the stanze of Raffael.

I cannot feel, however, that there is much value in a book about painting that does not make the reader want to rush to the nearest picture. An "art book" should be a tonic for the visual nerve. Usually they tend merely to stimulate those who talk without looking to talk even more wonderfully. I am afraid Mr. Bell's book, except for twenty-eight of the illustrations and an occasional passage about a specific painting, is more about the man standing in front of the picture than the picture itself. Because of this there seems to be little point in criticism for or against; the whole issue is too personal and too remote. However, I cannot help questioning Mr. Bell's complete dismissal of narrative in painting, nor can I be sure that wit is a non-aesthetic element in art. I also balk at a certain grisly archness that creeps now and again into the writing. Mr. Bell, I think, would be wise to stick to his own serious and delicately pompous style.

I heartily agree with him when he states that just as some people will go unmusical to their grave, so others must always be blind to painting, and ignorant of the "aesthetic thrill." Here is Mr. Bell's message to the unfit: "There is nothing surprising or shocking or humiliating in not being able to appreciate pictures."

ROBERT MORSE

Shorter Notices

Sir Richard Steele. By Willard Connely. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.75.

The life of Sir Richard Steele was so stormy, so merry, so diversified, so perfect a small mirror of the eighteenth century, that it is surprising that contemporary writers have come very near to ignoring him. Much credit is due Willard Connely for having filled this vacancy in modern biography. Mr. Connely's study of Steele is lengthy, scholarly, unprejudiced, and well written. Much research has gone into this volume. Mr. Connely has studied, literally, every foot of ground that Steele's mortal body is known to have touched. Nor has any facet of his many-sided character been neglected. His improvidence, his wining and dining, his political enthusiasms, his love, his gossip, his wit, his sentiment, are all carefully presented to us. Any scholar or student may turn with confidence to Mr. Connely's book, and be assured that all the available facts about Steele are contained in its pages. Yet one must confess that for all its virtues this biography is not one that will delight a more disinterested, casual reader. The truth is that Mr. Connely has done too much research. The book is weighted down with detail, much of it really meaningless. The talent of Addison's collaborator was essentially a light and trivial one, often merely the talent of a gossip writer, and the dulness of his weighty political writings only confirms this. Mr. Connely has not properly perceived this point, and the airy Dick Steele has been smothered in a catalogue of facts better suited to an archaeological treatise. The father of the Tatler and the Spectator deserved a kinder fate.

Women Must Work. By Richard Aldington. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Women must work—but so, too, must men. It is this fact, when so many of the other sex are desperately in need of jobs, that makes Mr. Aldington's book seem strangely dated. Mr. Aldington has written good novels in the past, but this one is more than an exception. In it he has chosen to deal with a problem in terms that are important today, but he has done so anachronistically and in a highly specialized sense. One wonders whether the very quality of being civilized and sympathetic has not prevented him from coming to grips with the realities he means to deal with. His heroine is an unconscionable prig, and her hardness seems to be less the result of circumstance than of vanity and spitefulness. It is as if Mr. Aldington had become encased in tolerance and the attitude of strict balance that a sophisticated and liberal writer usually believes it is necessary for him to maintain. Indignation would certainly be preferable to the displeasures, mixed with admiration, that this author feels for a character that he himself has created. And real sophistication should have enabled him to realize that the story of a girl who is dissatisfied at home and goes to seek employment in London, before war and its results had made such a desire for self-expression relatively unimportant, is an evasion. One cannot be interested in Etta; one can only wonder why Mr. Aldington should have expected people would be.

["Half Mile Down," by William Beebe, costs $5. It was incorrectly listed at $3.50 in The Nation of December 12.]

Drama Holiday Suggestions

"Anything Goes." Alvin Theater. Victor Moore as Public Enemy No. 13 in a No. 1 musical revue, with Ethel Merman at her best.

"Dark Victory." Little Theater. Tallulah Bankhead being very attractive in a romantic tragedy.

"Gold Eagle Guy." Morosco Theater. How a ruthless superman built a shipping empire on the West Coast. Excellent production by the Group Theater of a forceful and picturesque drama, with a fine performance by J. Edward Bromberg. One of the best dramas of the season.

Eva Le Gallienne and the Civic Repertory Company. Broadhurst Theater. For two weeks beginning Christmas night Miss Le Gallienne is offering her colorful production of Ros-tand's "L'Aiglon."

"Life Begins at 8:40." Winter Garden. Disputes with "Anything Goes" for first place among the revues.

"Merrily We Roll Along." Music Box Theater. One of the outstanding hits and very good indeed if you don't mind having your serious plays use a little staycomb in their hair. By George Kaufman and Moss Hart, who excoriate cheap success without forgetting to put in a few wisecracks where they will do most good.

"Page Miss Glory." Mansfield Theater. Dorothy Hall in a rough and ready satire on beauty contests which isn't too particular how it gets its laughs, but gets them anyway.

"Personal Appearance." Henry Miller's Theater. Much like the above but about a movie star this time and perhaps a trifle less mechanical.

"Post Road." Masque Theater. Novel and exciting crook melodrama which begins as a quiet domestic comedy but has lots of surprises up its sleeve.

"Revenge with Music." New Amsterdam Theater. Charles Winninger, Rex O'Malley, and Libby Holman in a lavish and generally entertaining operetta with lots of comedy and some good dancing in a more or less Spanish manner.

"Sailors of Cattaro." Civic Repertory Theater. The third and much the best offering by the Theater Union, which goes in for plays with a revolutionary purpose. This one is all about a mutiny on board an Austrian man-of-war, and it is first rate as a play, quite aside from the red-flag waving.

"Small Miracle." Forty-eighth Street Theater. Hard-boiled melodrama more or less in the "Grand Hotel" tradition but expertly done and lifted above its own level by the startling performance of Joseph Spurin-Calleia as a murderer who didn't exactly want to be one.

"The Children's Hour." Maxine Elliott's Theater. Tense but grim drama about a fiendishly perverse child, who is played with extraordinary force by Florence McGee. One of the most-discussed plays of the year.

"The Distaff Side." Booth Theater. A sizable hit by John Van Druten, but one which seemed unnecessarily tame to me. With Sybil Thorndike.

"The Farmer Takes a Wife." Forty-sixth Street Theater. Picturesque and remarkably engaging comedy by Frank Elser and Marc Connelly about the great days of the Erie Canal. Mr. Connelly has written in his best manner and there are delightful performances by June Walker and Herb Williams. To me one of the most enjoyable evenings of the season.

"Valley Forge." Guild Theater. Maxwell Anderson's entertaining drama about George Washington, with Philip Merivale as the Father of His Country. The whole thing seemed very pleasantly theatrical to me, but there are many who take it more seriously without liking it any the less.

"Within the Gates." National Theater. Sean O'Casey's poetic and symbolic morality play about the Dreamer, the Bishop, and the Young Whore in Hyde Park. According to many good critics it is the great modern play, but I found it a bit pretentious.

The following opened too late for review: Ina Claire in "Ode to Liberty" (Lyceum Theater), Katharine Cornell in "Romeo and Juliet" (Martin Beck Theater), Walter Hampden in Shakespearean repertory (Forty-fourth Street Theater), "Accent on Youth" by Samson Raphaelson (Plymouth Theater), "Rain from Heaven"—Jane Cowl in S. N. Behrman's new play (Golden Theater). JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Films

Chaliapin's Don Quixote

AT the Cameo this week is to be seen an English re-take of the French talking-picture version of "Don Quixote" concerning which so many advance reports have been received during the past two years. The film turns out to be disappointing in almost every respect. It reveals, among other things, the almost certain failure of commercial enterprises based on the assumption that a corraling of outstanding talents in several different fields necessarily insures artistic—or even commercial—success. G. W. Pabst is the director; Paul Morand has written the dialogue; and Chaliapin plays the title role. One should perhaps mention the English music-hall comedian George Robey, who plays Sancho Panza, and the Hollywood ingenue Sydney Fox, who plays Don Quixote's niece. The roster of celebrities

□ PLAYS □ MOVIES □ LECTURES □

THEATRE UNION'S NEW PLAY

SAILORS of CATTARO

"A genuinely fine show and an exciting one."

—World Telegram

CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE, 14th Street and 6th Avenue
Prices 30c to $1.50; no tax. Matinees Tues. and Sat. 2:45

For information on reduced rates for Benefit Theatre Parties call Watkins 9-2050.

"A genuine contribution to the American theater."—Gabriel, American, HERMAN SHUMLIN presents

The Children's Hour

By LILLIAN HELLMAN

MAXINE ELLIOTT'S THEATRE WEST 89th STREET

Evenings 8:30—50c to $3. Reg. Mats. Wed. and Sat.—2:40—50c to $2.
Extra Mat. on Dec. 28. Also Mats. Tues., Jan. 1, Wed., Jan. 2, and Sat., Jan. 5

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

MAXWELL ANDERSON'S play

VALLEY FORGE

with PHILIP MERIVALE

GUILD THEATRE 52d St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30;
Matinees Thurs. and Sat., 2:30.

S. N. BEHRMAN'S comedy

RAIN FROM HEAVEN

with JANE COWL

with JOHN HALLIDAY

GOLDEN THEA. 45th St., W. of B'y. Evs. 8:30;
Matinees Thurs. and Sat., 2:30.

Limited Engagement, Beginning December 26th

RUTH DRAPER

FIRST WEEK 3 HOLIDAY MATS.—Wed., Dec. 26; Thurs., Dec. 27; Sat., Dec. 28 and Five Eve. Performances at 8:40, Wed., Thurs., Fri., Sat. and SUNDAY
Thereafter every evening including Sunday at 8:40. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. at 2:30.

SEATS NOW 50c to $2.50 Plus Tax

ETHEL BARRYMORE THEATRE, 47th St. W. of B'way.
Tel. CH. 4-2728.

ASSOCIATION OF WORKERS IN SOCIAL AGENCIES

Formerly Social Workers Discussion Club

FORUM—Section 7-a N.R.A.—An Analysis. ■■■ It Guaranteed Rights to Labor?

SPEAKERS

Dr. Milton Handler, Professor of Law at Columbia University. Former Counsel of National Labor Relations Board in Washington.

Dr. Colston E. Warne, Associate Professor of Economics, Amherst College.
Member of National Committee, American League against War and Fascism.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 10th, 1934, 8:30 P. M. ADMISSION: 25 Cents

WASHINGTON IRVING HIGH SCHOOL
East 17th Street, at Irving Place, New York City

Mme. TATIANA TCHERNAVIN

will lecture on

"ESCAPE FROM THE SOVIETS"

at TOWN HALL, 113 W. 43rd STREET

SATURDAY, 8:30 P. M., JAN. 12

TICKETS, $2.20 to 55c. on sale at Town Hall Box Office;
Dutton's Bookshop, 681 Fifth Ave.; Rand Bookshop, 7 East
15th Street. AL. 4-3094.

LECTURES

RAND SCHOOL

7 EAST 15th STREET

AL. 4-3094

A FEW FEATURE LECTURES

Beginning Week of January 7

Sociology of Modern Life. Mon. 8.30. Alter E. Fischhof
 Psychoanalysis Today. Mon. 8.30. Dr. Sandor Lorand
 International Crisis. Mon. 8.30. Nathaniel Peffer
 Appreciation of Literature. Tues. 8.30. David P. Berenberg
 Adventures in Music. Tues. 8.30. Adele T. Katz Psychology of Personality. Wed. 7.00. George B. Vetter Contemporary Literature. Wed. 8.30. Elias L. Tartak
 Literature of the Negro. Wed. 8.30. Earl Sydnor
 Contemporary Drama. Thurs. 7.00. Irwin Swerdlow
 Hitlerism at Work. Thurs. 7.00. Dr. Paul Kretzer
 Psychology: Knowing Ourselves. Thurs. 7.00. George B. Vetter
 Social and Political Philosophy. Thurs. 8.30. Dr. Abraham Edel

(Other Courses in Economics, Trade Unionism, Sociology, Socialism, Literature, Music, Psychology)

SIGMUND SPAETH

on

THE ART OF ENJOYING MUSIC

Fridays, 8:00 — Jan. 11 to Feb. 15

Admission, 50c.; Course of Six, $2.50

BOOKS

The SEX TECHNIQUE

IN MARRIAGE • By I. E. Hutton, M. D.

"Dr. Ira Wile describes the book in a clear, succinct, non-emotional, authoritative and conservative exposition of the practical factors involved in making marriage successful on the sexual level. That describes the book exactly. . . . It is primarily concerned with the conduct of the honeymoon and with the technique of the sexual performance."—Dr. Morris Fishbein.
 Price $2.00 (postage 15c extra) Recommended by Physicians

EMERSON BOOKS, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York City

There are more than 37,000 readers of The Nation doing what you are doing—reading this advertisement. If you have something of interest to offer them—call The Nation Advertising Department for particulars, as to space, cost and closing date of the next issue.

THE NATION

20 VESEY STREET

NEW YORK

is impressive, but the result of their collaboration is not. The burden of the failure, of course, must be laid to Pabst, whose task it was to subordinate these very different personalities to some single end or effect. But it may be said in his defense that the feat of curbing the irrepressible histrionism of the venerable Chaliapin was too much to expect of even the greatest of German film directors. No more perhaps can he be held responsible for the injection of the gross humors of the English music hall in the person of George Robey. These choices were probably not of his dictation; and Pabst, who left Germany for France in the hope of greater freedom for working out his ideas and theories, undoubtedly had to yield to the fact that the conscientious director in our present society can never quite escape the dictatorship of the box office.

According to report, Pabst was attracted to the present enterprise by the possibility of reinterpreting the Cervantes masterpiece as an allegory of social injustice. There are several evidences throughout the film of just such an intention. For the famous episode of the windmills Pabst actually supplies a motivation not to be found in Cervantes: Don Quixote, toward the end of his journey, comes upon a band of peasants carrying sacks of grain and hears from them a sad tale of taxes, exploitation by the millers, and the rest. It is immediately after this that the melancholy knight plunges his lance into the whirling windmill. But the social theme is not consistently developed. Like the more general theme of the impossibility of human justice, which was undoubtedly Cervantes's real theme, it is scattered and lost in the development of the action. It is subordinated in particular to the simple fact of Don Quixote's mental derangement, which Pabst, with a literalness that is possibly Teutonic, is so anxious to make clear to his audience that he devotes two of the longest episodes to its exposition. Taking no chances on his audience, Pabst makes the characters in the film itself register the necessary response to Don Quixote's folly. The result is that what is emphasized is this folly rather than the nobility underlying it—that nobility of folly which has caused Don Quixote's name to become an adjective in most of the languages of Western Europe. In Cervantes that nobility is conveyed through the uniformly sympathetic tone of the author's style whenever he is speaking of his hero. It is this sympathy which gives a justification to the poor knight's actions even when they are most absurd. No such uniformity of tone is established in Pabst's picture: we see Don Quixote from so many different points of view that in the end we see him from none at all. And it is this shifting of the point of view from Don Quixote himself to Sancho, from the devoted Sancho to the mocking populace, which is responsible for the disturbing jerkiness of tempo with which the story is unfolded. The picture remains in the memory only as a succession of uncoordinated images, most of them of the magnificent physical personality of Chaliapin, which once again manages to conquer everything within range.

"Babes in Toyland" is undoubtedly offered by Hollywood as a special treat for the children at this season of the year. But the warning should be issued that it is likely to leave on the more sensitive of them an indelible trauma. If they are not frightened out of their wits by the version of Bogyland (Hollywood macabre at its most terrifying), they will be instructed in the elements of sadism by the badly miscast Laurel and Hardy team.

WILLIAM TROY

Forthcoming Reviews

William Troy on John Strachey, Ernest Gruening on Carleton Beals, Oswald G. Villard on General Tasker Howard Bliss, Douglas Haskell on Catharine Bauer.

Vol. CXL

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 9, 1935

No. 3627

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	29
EDITORIALS:
Democracy in Flux	32
Need the New Deal Be Fascist?	33
Hitler and the Saar	33
Black Side of ■ White List	34
ISSUES AND MEN. A REPLY TO H. L. MENCKEN. By Oswald Garrison Villard	35
THE MENACE OF HUEY LONG. I. THE KINGFISH IN HIS KINGDOM. By Raymond Gram Swing	36
TAXATION IN THE NEW SOCIAL STATE. VIII. EUROPEAN FINANCE IN THE WORLD CRISIS. By Gerhard Colm	39
DON'T DO IT, MR. HOPKINS! By Edith Abbott	41
GOLD BRICKS FOR THE AGED. By M. B. Schnapper	43
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
The Great "Bootleg" Coal Industry. By Louis Adamic	46
White-Collar Strikes. By H. K.	49
BOOKS AND DRAMA:
Nada and "Diamat." By William Troy	51
The Drama of Peru. By Ernest Gruening	52
Was It a Needless War? By David Saville Muzzey	52
Lloyd George Continues. By Sidney B. Fay	53
An Interesting New Poet. By Eda Lou Walton	54
Unemployment Insurance. By Paul H. Douglas	54
The Nineties. By Eric Estorick	54
Shorter Notices	55
Drama: A Brilliant Comedy. By Joseph Wood Krutch	55
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	56

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

DURING THE PAST WEEK we have been deluged, as is usual at this time of year, with cheerful descriptions of the prosperity which is to be ours in 1935. We have been told that while the past year was not extraordinary, a firm basis for advance has been laid, and that the corner will be definitely turned within the next twelve months. It may be bad taste to add a realistic touch at this season, but we are old-fashioned enough to believe that the New Year should be a period of stock-taking as well as a time for the exchange of felicitations. And if we are scrupulously honest, we must admit that in many respects the economic situation is more critical than it was a year ago. Unemployment, according to the latest available figures, is at least a half million greater than last year, while the number of persons on relief has increased by approximately five million. That the actual deficiency of resources in the hands of the underprivileged has grown even more than these figures indicate is shown by the fact that the cost of relief has more than doubled. Industrial production for the first ten months of 1934 was only 3 per cent above the very low figure for 1933. Department and chain-store sales have been running from 11 to 13 per cent over those of a year ago, but the gain in part reflects higher prices and in part the increased business done by these units as compared with the small dealer. On the other hand, a few persons will doubtless find grounds for cheer in the fact that dividend declarations by 675 companies in November were higher than for any month since February, 1932, and that for the first eleven months of 1934 they were more than $350,000,000 above the corresponding period of the previous year. We note also that the attendance at night clubs in the early hours of 1935 is said to have been greater than for many years despite prices of from $5 to $20 per person, and no doubt many of these people—for a time at least—believed that prosperity had indeed returned.

WE HOLD NO BRIEF FOR JAPAN, and find no justification for its denunciation of the Washington naval treaty. But no action taken by the Japanese in the past year has been more calculated to stir up animosity and bitterness than the recent statement by Admiral Reeves that the American fleet would hold its annual maneuvers this year off the coast of Japan. The fact that the announcement was timed, whether deliberately or otherwise, to coincide with Japan's denunciation of the Washington agreement only adds to its unfortunate effect. Inspired press accounts which describe the fleet as a "vast armada, the largest and most powerful by a wide margin ever assembled under a single command in the world's naval history" are not likely to soothe existing irritations. It would be scarcely less accurate to describe the maneuvers as a dress rehearsal for a war with Japan, which it most certainly is. As such they reveal quite clearly what the naval board of strategy conceives such a war to be like. There is no thought of defending American soil. The main body of the fleet is to be concentrated from 2,500 to 3,500 miles off the American coast, and is to be accompanied by four aircraft carriers with 477 airplanes, possessing an enormous cruising range. In other words, if the rehearsal is any indication, we are preparing for an offensive rather than a defensive war, a fact which the Japanese are not likely to be slow in discerning. We wonder if the American people as a whole realize the implications of this move, and if so whether they approve.

THE NEW YORK UTILITY FIGHT appears to have settled down to an endurance contest with both sides playing hard for public support. Not to be outdone by Mayor LaGuardia's flair for the dramatic, the Consolidated Gas Company, parent of a flock of smaller utilities, announced a reduction in the quarterly dividend payable March 15 from 50 to 25 cents. In making this announcement George B. Cortelyou, president of the company, referred piously to the corporation's obligation "not only to its customers and employees but also to 120,000 stockholders, of whom three-quarters own less than fifty shares each." Significantly enough, however, the action was not accompanied by a financial statement showing the company's earnings during the past year. Meanwhile, Commissioner Davidson, in cooperation with Washington officials, formulated definite plans for the erection of two municipal plants in Manhattan to meet the needs of the city and the federal government. Apparently convinced that New York meant business, the power trust countered with an offer to put into effect the "Washington" plan for rate reduction, whereby half of the excess profits of any one year would be applied to reducing charges in the following year. While this plan might ultimately bring considerable relief to the consumers, it can scarcely be said to be a solution to the problem. The companies would still doubtless insist on estimating their capital investment on the basis of their present highly inflated valuation, and they would probably ask for a return of 6 or 7 per cent, which is completely out of line with present-day capital earnings. In addition, they would demand half of all profits above that amount. Mayor LaGuardia has cogently termed the proposal "amusing." To accept a compromise at this juncture would be little short of treachery to the hundreds of thousands of voters who have looked to Fusion to drive racketeering and corruption out of high places.

ELSEWHERE IN THIS ISSUE we publish an article by Edith Abbott, well known in social work and in education, taking violent issue with the proposal, just made official, to take "unemployables" off federal relief and turn them back to the tender mercies—and slim pocket-books—of state and local agencies. This action will relieve the federal relief associations of the care of four million persons, or 20 per cent of the federal relief roll. Unemployables are defined by Harry L. Hopkins, Federal Relief Administrator, as "chronic dependents"—the aged, sick, crippled, widows, and the insane. (One must conclude that Mr. Hopkins means disabled widows, since there is evidently nothing inherent in widowhood which precludes gainful employment.) It is evident that to turn four million persons, however selected, back to local poor relief will strain beyond the breaking-point resources which are already hopelessly taxed. The federal government took over relief in large quantities when local and private agencies found the job too much to handle. What reason is there to suppose that today these agencies will be any more able financially to bear this burden or any better equipped for constructive maintenance and rehabilitation. Harold Ickes, in discussing, apropos of the government's new relief plans, the problem of subsistence homesteads, made a statement which is only too unfortunately descriptive of the entire program. Mr. Ickes said: "Like our other jobs, we begin it with no experience, no plan, and no goal."

THE PUBLISHERS let loose another flood of crocodile tears on the day the National Labor Relations Board requested the NRA to remove the Blue Eagle from the San Francisco Call-Bulletin for its failure to reinstate Dean Jennings. In a letter to the NRA which for sanctimonious hypocrisy has seldom been equaled even by former statements from the same source, the publishers, through Howard Davis, lament a situation which "may render the code invalid." In sad tones the letter recalls the sacrifices the publishers made in their desire to cooperate with the President by signing a code; in abused tones it charges the N. L. R. B. with attempting to annul the code by taking jurisdiction over the Jennings case instead of leaving it to the Newspaper Industrial Board (at this point it invokes Donald Richberg with much effect); in a magnificently simulated burst of ringing indignation it says, "We cannot allow the integrity of the instrument to be violated for any reason great or small"; and with a long-suffering air it asks that the NRA repel this "usurpation of power" "in order that the good faith of the government may be maintained and the code preserved." The whole statement is a tissue of misrepresentation. In the first place the publishers accepted the code only when they had assured themselves that it meant absolutely nothing; the idea that the N. L. R. B. was attempting to annul the newspaper code by ruling on the right of employees to organize is fantastic; as for what seems to be the most plausible contention of the publishers, that the case should have gone to the Newspaper Industrial Board, it is the most glaring misrepresentation of all. The fact is that this board was never designed to handle anything but disagreements on local wage scales between the printing-trades crafts and their employers, disagreements for the most part within the terms of already existing contracts.

THE INEFFECTIVENESS of the board in collective-bargaining cases is indicated by two recent developments. The first Newspaper Guild complaint to reach it involved the firing of an employee by an Italian newspaper, Il Progresso. The guild requested a vote on two issues: (1) Is the decision of the board final or may it be appealed? (2) Has the board the right to demand the financial records of a publisher who bases dismissal on the grounds of economy? The board split four to four on both questions. In the other case a typographical union charged that printers on the New Orleans Item-Tribune were coerced into a company union. The attorney for the union asked for a secret election. The board split on this question four to four. A publisher representative then offered a motion that the controversy be submitted to an impartial chairman. The vote resulted in another deadlock. It is not surprising that the union attorney at this point gave notice that he would present no more typographical cases to the board. Is it unfair to suspect that the publishers are invoking the Newspaper Industrial Board precisely because it is ineffective?

HEARST'S PERENNIAL RED-HUNT has gone into a new phase. His papers have recently undertaken what is obviously a systematic drive on liberal and radical teachers in colleges, universities, and even private schools. The story of the campaign to discredit members of the faculty at Syracuse University was told by Albert V. Fowler in the correspondence columns of The Nation of December 26. The same clumsy technique was followed at Columbia University, where Professor George S. Counts received a letter, presumably from two prospective students, inquiring whether the "real stuff about capitalism, socialism, and communism" could be obtained at Columbia and requesting an interview. It happens that Professor Counts is acquainted with both stool pigeons and yellow journalism; he had also heard of the Syracuse affair. The interview was granted but it was Professor Counts who made the scoop. The two young men not only made the damning confession, before a stenographer, that they were Hearst employees, but one of the inquiring reporters said in effect that he had written the letter under orders from the city desk. Having collected his evidence Professor Counts submitted it to the McCormack-Dickstein Committee Investigating un-American Activities with the request that it investigate William Randolph Hearst. Furthermore he took care to have the request signed by a list of famous names which are likely to get enough publicity to spoil Mr. Hearst's well-laid if badly hatched plans for a red scare, even though another all-American chanticler, Matthew Woll, has taken his place beside Hearst and is crowing for an investigation of the colleges. For our part, the proposal to investigate Hearst appears to be one of the best suggestions made by any professor during the Roosevelt Administration.

PRESUMABLY THE LIBEL LAWS of this country are still in effect. Donald Richberg's letter to the editor of the Saturday Evening Post, therefore, advising him that the articles by General Hugh S. Johnson which Mr. Richberg "had been told" the Post would publish presently, would contain—or so Mr. Richberg had been informed—libelous statements about himself and that he would proceed accordingly, comes down to nothing more or less than a Big-Bad-Wolf threat to scare the Post into a more receptive and kindly attitude toward the Administration, and particularly toward Mr. Richberg. It is fair to assume that Mr. Lorimer, having been editor of the Post for some years, is fairly conversant with the legal responsibilities attendant upon his important position. One would guess that he had already submitted General Johnson's articles to counsel, and that if they contain statements which are considered to be actionable, he is fully aware of the fact and of the possible consequences. In any case, it would have been more seemly for Mr. Richberg to have relied upon something more than hearsay before making his threat. Being confronted with his letter in the press, Mr. Richberg stated that he did not understand how it had been made public, since he had not given it out. Mr. Lorimer declares that he did not give it out either. The whole matter must remain just another of those mysterious leaks in public—or is it private—affairs, unless one of the principals decides to clear it up. But what does plainly emerge is Mr. Richberg's determination, evidenced more than once lately, to wield the big stick in much the fashion of his colorful predecessor.

ALTHOUGH FRANCIS BIDDLE, chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, has his hands full at the moment, we wish he would look into the troubled anthracite situation bequeathed him by his predecessors. The strife between the United Mine Workers and the insurgent Anthracite Miners of Pennsylvania is unabated, and ■ has been pointed out in these columns, only a Labor Board election will bring peace. Within the past month several strikes have been called by the insurgents, and although the old-line union did its best to obstruct them, the men came out each time, indicating that the claims of strength made by the rebels are not imaginary. At the present writing the collieries of the Glen Alden Company in the Wilkes-Barre area, said to be the largest coal company in the world, are tied up in a general strike, with 8,000 men out and more joining them daily. Other plants have been crippled by walkouts. Yet the operators, most of whom have contracts with the United Mine Workers, steadfastly refuse to recognize the Anthracite Miners, despite ipso facto proof of their existence. The rebels for a time sought harmony, but their overtures were flatly turned down by the United Mine Workers officials, and the dissension has been renewed. The Anthracite Miners, their leaders say, are willing to disband if an employees' representation election fails to show them in a majority. It seems only fair to these thousands of workers who have turned away from the old union to give them their election.

LITTLE IS KNOWN of the repressive measures, amounting sometimes to terror, which are prevalent in Austria. The Black Book on the Austrian terror has presented the situation in general, but has given little idea of the position of women, of the mental pressure exerted by the clergy, or of the militarization of the children. As in other fascist countries, women have been driven from well-paid positions. The law requiring women teachers to remain unmarried has been extended to Vienna, which had long held out against it. Married women who had positions in the government were dismissed at once. The clerical-fascist regime in Austria is opposed to any development of women's intellect. Before the war there were no government middle schools for girls, only costly private schools. The Socialist government in Vienna, with neither time nor money to build girls' schools, turned the military-cadet academies into model schools of a high type, three for boys, three for girls. It also opened the boys' middle schools to girls, instituting coeducation. The clericals opposed this from the beginning, and in 1930, when the power of the Social Democratic school board of Vienna was already broken, succeeded in striking their first blow: girls were no longer allowed in the boys' classes, but girls' classes might exist in the boys' schools. In June, 1934, attendance of girls at the middle schools was prohibited altogether. At the same time one of the three model schools for girls was changed into an institution for military cadets. With the exception of the two remaining model schools, therefore, there are no government—that is, no cheap—middle schools for girls.

HERR SCHUSCHNIGG is copying Mussolini's Balilla and is fitting out the six-year-olds with uniforms and wooden guns. Under the name of Jung Vaterland they are being trained by their teachers in the schools. The pupils of the middle schools, however, with a thorough grounding from elementary school in the social-democratic doctrines of Glöckel-Fadrus, have put up a brave fight against "Fatherland" education. The administration has threatened wholesale expulsions, but without effect. In the Vienna schools, when pupils were asked to enrol voluntarily for Fatherland Front celebrations, it is reported that not a child did so. All possible repressive measures were then instituted—withdrawal of privileges, of free tuition, of bath cards—until finally the poorest children "voluntarily" took part. Herr Schuschnigg has not attempted to force these firm-hearted children into uniform. Gas-mask practice was attempted but the middle-school pupils made fun of it as a humbug. All of them refuse to wear the Fatherland badge, although threatened with rigorous punishments for their recalcitrance. After the February revolution membership in a so-called Fatherland Union was made the condition of employment, first in the government, then in private industry. One can only become a member of the union if one can show a Catholic certificate of baptism. Teachers who may be known to their pupils as Socialists and free-thinkers are obliged to revert at least officially to the Catholic faith in order to keep their jobs. In other words, Austria is in the grip of a tyranny as intolerant, although not quite so bloody, as is Germany.

Democracy in Flux

THE brief reference in The Nation's Honor Roll for 1934 to Senator George W. Norris's achievement in winning the electorate of Nebraska to vote for the abolition of the bicameral Nebraska Legislature and the substitution of a single house could not for lack of space do justice to this significant development. This Senator, so often called "the noblest Roman of them all," is building one monument after another to himself. Four are now to his credit. He voted against the war, went home and told his people why, and was triumphantly reelected. By years of fighting, almost single-handed, he prevented the turning over of the great water power at Muscle Shoals to private interests. Next, by similarly arduous and unceasing labor, he convinced Congress of the necessity of amending the Constitution in order to abolish the "lame-duck" session of Congress and to set a new date for the convening of that body and for the inauguration of the President. Nobody took him seriously at first, but year after year he worked at this task until finally he wore away all opposition and this far-reaching reform was made part of our fundamental law. And now comes the revolution in Nebraska.

Here we have a remarkable record of accomplishment which gives the lie to those who say that under existing conditions no member of Congress can really achieve anything; that it is of no use to elect "good men." Senator Norris is one of the finest men in Washington; he is under obligations to no one and has always been in revolt against the machine; when he was last reelected to the Senate in 1930, the Republican organization, with Mr. Hoover—if one may judge by that great statesman's silence—conniving, ran an obscure grocer of similar name against him in order to deceive the electorate. Correspondingly the party machines are under no obligation to him. Hence he has won his victories by his steadfast and logical appeals for the proper course—he makes no pretense of being an orator. He has been aided, of course, by his shining character, his absolute trustworthiness; no one can ever doubt either his sincerity or his unselfishness. Thus a man who is apparently one of the least outstanding Senators, who rarely makes the first page of the press, has actually achieved vastly more than men like Senator Borah who forever bask in the public eye.

But we are less concerned today with Mr. Norris himself—deeply impressed as we are by his patriotic devotion and the extraordinary character of his achievements, which in the case of Muscle Shoals made the whole Tennessee Valley program possible—than with this additional proof that it is possible to make far-reaching changes in our democracy for the purpose of speeding up its processes and adapting them to our modern life. There never was any sound reason that the individual American states should have bicameral legislatures, except that the founders had the English precedent before them and that the colonial system of government perpetuated the idea that there were separate classes in the community which could only be adequately represented and protected if they had their separate legislative houses. As everyone knows who has studied for any length of time the working of a legislature like that of New York State, two houses do not make for prompt legislation, nor are they necessarily checks upon each other. Rather they aid under-cover agents, the lobbies, that control by privileged individuals and by corporations which is so largely responsible for our corrupt and inefficient state legislatures. Moreover, no one can give any sound reason why national political divisions should rule within the state legislatures—the Norris reform abolishes party designations on the ballot.

That our American democracy must modernize itself, speed up its machinery, and make itself more efficient is obvious. What could we not achieve if the Administration were to set itself at this task with the perseverance and the devotion of George W. Norris! By extending the merit system to all our civil offices Mr. Roosevelt could strike a body blow at political corruption and governmental inefficiency and end one of the unanswerable indictments of our democratic government. A reorganization of Congressional procedure is another need, one much discussed in Great Britain, where there is grave question whether the House of Commons is or will be able to deal with the ever-increasing economic problems thrust upon it without the creation of some additional expert machinery to aid in the drafting of bills. Mr. Roosevelt has shown us how Congress can be driven to unprecedented speed in a dire emergency; what we must work out is a continuously greater speed in normal times without, however, sacrificing intelligent and adequate consideration of measures. Again, we need the referendum and initiative urged by Woodrow Wilson and other leaders, and numerous other changes. Even former Representative James M. Beck, who views with disfavor so much of the New Deal, agrees that the time is at hand for planning a radical revision of our federal system, since he finds that the popular will is in the direction of greater and greater concentration of power in Washington.

Beyond doubt revision of the Constitution is indicated—and feared by most people, lest too radical and dangerous alterations be introduced and carried under stress of popular emotion or pressure. Meanwhile we have proof positive in the varied activities of the New Deal, as well as in Mr. Norris's remarkable record, that we do not have to stand still. There are many who still believe that in the next two years Mr. Roosevelt will enormously aid our democracy by carrying it along the road toward social and economic justice. But governmental changes must come, too, if the administrative machinery is to meet the requirements of the new order. Increasingly the federal government is assuming responsibilities—in public health, in education, in finance, even in the building of homes for our population—which demand not only imagination in conception but efficiency and clear-sightedness in administration. How ironical it would be to superimpose the old clumsy bureaucracy on schemes for the new day! We should not think of running a 1935-model, streamlined motor car with the engine used by Henry Ford in his famous first car. It just wouldn't go—and neither, under the same conditions, will the New Deal. The great pioneer, George Norris, has shown the way. Let those in high office take prompt heed.

Need the New Deal Be Fascist?

THE business men who met at White Sulphur Springs to write a platform of cooperation with the government did not help either the President or themselves, but demonstrated once more the fateful want of business statesmanship in America. Under the stimulus of the profit motive an American Morgan can amass a fortune and a Henry Ford can even change a people's habits, but when it comes to working out a social program of national scope the vaunted American business genius is sterile. The platform which these ninety leaders sent to Washington, where it was not even personally presented to the President, was more tactful than the one adopted by the Congress of Industry in New York, but it was essentially the same Dead Sea fruit. Business really has no major solution beyond the familiar one of being left alone, the devil to take the hindmost. With no real alternatives it can only comment on what the government is doing. The ninety at White Sulphur Springs found gracious words at last for social insurance and the minimum wage, and they even revealed resignation to the dole, a welcome evidence that if these men are unable to lead they are at least able to change their minds. But the real value of their pronouncements is to show the country that constructive thinking is not in their line. Such statesmanship as we have is in Washington. Confused, contradictory, and pragmatic as the Administration has been, it still is superior to business both in imagination and in the sense of realities. The Administration has learned much in less than two years. It is shaking down to some of the real necessities of the country. But business has learned only how to say what it likes and what it does not like in the plans Washington is formulating.

What this inevitably means is that more and more the government must lead business, a prospect which frightens us as much as it does business men, though for different reasons. Professor Calvin Hoover, speaking at Chicago, compares the systems in the dictator lands of Germany, Italy, and Russia with the New Deal, and finds the chief difference to be that we are trying to retain political democracy. Professor William F. Ogburn, also seeing the coming union between business and the government, admits it will not save us from grave social disturbances. Once business and the government are united, unless the union is dedicated to the equal interest of all, it is fascism. "The nation may expect our government to control, regulate, or take over those economic functions which it becomes obvious cannot be left to manage themselves," says Professor Hoover. "In this respect the economic policy and the program of the New Deal somewhat resemble fascism and national socialism." What alone can save our system from becoming fascist is the realization of economic as well as political democracy, a truth which in one aspect the President falters in serving. Unless labor is given equal power with management in the new dispensation, ours will be fascism of the European brand. There is no escape from it. Yet the President continues to favor the idea of a watered-down collective bargaining, in the misconception that he is steering a middle course between the domination of big business and the domination of the American Federation of Labor. We confess our own dissatisfaction with the A. F. of L. as a wise and vigorous organization of American workers, but it will be far healthier to let labor grow to wisdom through responsibility than to render it impotent.

The President may not see that collective bargaining is vitiated by proportional representation. The coin, however democratic its ring, is counterfeit. The power in collective bargaining, however many phases of conciliation and arbitration it may go through, in the end is the strike. A committee made up of men some from an independent union, some from a company union, cannot wield this weapon effectively. Big business knows that proportional representation is the ideal ruse to maintain the dominant power of the employer. If the President really believes that labor equality must of necessity lead to labor domination, let him ask for a memorandum on the role of the trade unions in Great Britain. There they have grown to be a stabilizing and conservative influence. If the President is a gradualist, and believes we can only come to full-fledged collective bargaining after a transition period, he should realize that the transition period in America is already at hand; we are changing into a new society day by day. Once the decision is made that labor must remain inferior in the new order, the New Deal becomes still more fascist than Professor Hoover's description of it. But it is not too late to save the situation. Senator Wagner will introduce in Congress a bill defining still more clearly than his last bill the charter of labor, and sweeping aside the subterfuge of proportional representation. It is to be hoped that it is quickly passed. Should Congress have the least hesitation, it need only look at the fate of the parliament in Italy and the Reichstag in Germany to see what happens to free legislatures in countries where business and the government become one and labor is repressed.

Hitler and the Saar

SIX weeks ago the entire world looked with apprehension on the approach of January 13, the date of the Saar plebiscite. It was rumored that Hitler would attempt a putsch irrespective of the final vote, a step which must have led to a clash with the French army. Today, on the eve of the poll, there is little anxiety and even a certain amount of indifference as to the outcome. This alleviation of tension is the result of two developments, either of which seemed impossible a short while ago. First came the agreement signed at Rome on December 3, which provided a solution for the difficult problem of payment for the mines in the event of a German victory. This was made possible by France's unexpected generosity in assenting to partial payment in kind over a period of years. In return the Reich promised to extend the benefits of its social-insurance laws to all inhabitants of the Saar and to grant full immunity against reprisals, regardless of race or political belief, for the next twelve months.

Of even greater importance was the decision reached two days later by the League Council to send an international force—not to include French or German soldiers—to police the territory until after the vote should be completed.

Prior to this it had been taken for granted that if any troops were required they would be sent by France. Great Britain had consistently opposed the use of its army on European soil, and without Britain no other country would have been invited to undertake the task. The sudden shift in the British attitude, together with France's unexpected willingness to remain in the background, has completely altered the outlook for the plebiscite. While the British, Italian, Dutch, and Swedish soldiers were received with ill-concealed hostility by the pro-Nazi German Front, the feeling is scarcely comparable to that which would have been aroused if French troops had been sent in; nor is there reason to doubt that the presence of the international force will prevent such disturbances as occur from growing completely out of hand, and act at least ■ ■ partial check on Nazi terrorism.

These factors, combined with the more settled state of affairs within the Reich, make a German victory almost ■ foregone conclusion. This does not mean, however, that the plebiscite will be without significance. Hitlerism remains the primary issue in the minds of ■ large number of the voters, and the poll will be as near to ■ free expression of opinion on Nazi political philosophy as we are likely to see in a German country. The bourgeoisie is united in the Nazi-controlled German Front, which is leading the fight for reunion with Germany, while the working-class parties are apparently equally determined in their opposition. Since the Communists and Socialists together polled 27 per cent of the total vote in the last election for the State Council of the Saar, and will be supported by at least a minority in the Catholic trade unions, the vote for continuing the status quo should be reasonably large. If so, it will be significant, for the voters are practically all Germans who desire to see the Saar reunited with the fatherland. A large poll against Germany, even though it is not more than 30 per cent of the total, will be a moral defeat for Hitler and should have some influence on German public opinion.

For economic reasons a German victory is likely to prove disadvantageous to the Saar. While under League control the Saar enjoyed the full benefits of a customs union with France, which has led to a marked industrial expansion. This arrangement had the dual advantage of giving the Saarlanders access to the Lorraine iron fields nearby and of allowing them to dispose of their product duty free either in France or in Germany. As ■ result the proportion of Saar coal absorbed by the Reich dropped from 59 per cent in 1913 to 17 per cent in 1925-30, while that marketed in France rose from 24 to 65 per cent. Similarly in the iron-and-steel industry the percentage of the output taken by France increased from 4 to 34 per cent. The reincorporation of the territory in Germany will bring the Saar into direct competition with the Ruhr, to the great disadvantage of both regions. On the other hand, there can be little doubt that a victory for Germany, followed by the restoration of the entire district to the Reich, will prove distinctly advantageous to Franco-German relations. Continuing the status quo would provide ■ constant source of irritation and friction to both countries and would only postpone the day of economic readjustment. Therefore while we may sympathize with the tens of thousands of Saarlanders who may involuntarily be placed under Nazi rule, it would seem that the best interests of the greatest number of people will be satisfied by abiding by the decision of the plebiscite.

Black Side of a White List

THE Legion of Decency, originally inspired by the Catholic church, goes merrily on its way with very little opposition from any quarter. The general attitude has been that the movies were pretty bad from almost any point of view and that the Catholic church might as well undertake the job of cleaning them up, since it would not, in all probability, be more unreasonable in its demands than any one of the always imminent censorships proposed by secular authorities. Moreover, the legion's activities so far tend on the whole to support this view, if one also assumes as a matter of course that ■ censor's business is to censor. Thus the list recently made up by the Chicago Council classes thirty-six films as "unobjectionable," twenty-nine as "for adults only," and thirty-six as "indecent." The fact that some on the "indecent" list appear to have been put there for doctrinal reasons rather than because they are equally offensive to non-Catholic mores will hardly attract much attention, and the general public may be likely to conclude that the Legion of Decency is moderate—at least as reforming organizations go.

We wonder, however, just how much of this apparent moderation is due to the desire to enter ■ wedge, and just how much disposition there will be to demand more as soon as what is now asked for has been granted. This may seem an unworthy suspicion, but it appears justified by the Catholic attitude toward the stage. As this is being written there are twenty-six plays current on Broadway, but—so we are assured by the Catholic News—the "approved list" has dwindled to three, and to a rather extraordinary three at that. The Catholic who wishes to be scrupulous has his choice to make from among the following: the Abbey Players, "The First Legion," and "The Great Waltz." Unfortunately for him, however, the second is ■ play far from warmly received by the critics, and the third is an overblown spectacle which may do nobody any harm but which is not likely to do anyone much good either. Certainly, it is no very liberal policy which, to take two random examples, cannot "approve" "The Farmer Takes a Wife" or "Gold Eagle Guy."

It is commonly argued that censorship movements are brought on by irresponsible producers of flagrantly indecent books and plays. We ourselves, on the contrary, have long had ■ suspicion that the natural-born censor is never satisfied, that he always rails against whatever seems to afford him the best opportunity for railing, and that so long as he has simple pornography to keep him happy he feels no necessity for finding offense where the ordinary citizen finds none. If this is true, then the "irresponsible" producer performs a certain function in drawing the fire, and the Legion of Decency is liberal in dealing with movies because it has sufficient banning to do without straining a point. An approved list of films contains such not too innocent-sounding titles as "Hell on Earth" and "Manhattan Love"; the list for adults only includes "Where Sinners Meet" and "The Private Life of Don Juan." Why should they be approved when all but three current plays are denied their nihil obstat unless the intention is to grow less tolerant with the films as time goes on?

Issues and Men

A Reply to H. L. Mencken

AS one who was in favor of the repeal of the prohibition amendment to the Constitution, I cannot allow to pass unchallenged my friend H. L. Mencken's review of a year of legal liquor in The Nation of December 12. It seemed to me inaccurate, entirely one-sided, and an unfortunate playing down of the tremendous evils which have followed the reinstatement of the sale of liquor. As the Dallas, Texas, Journal has pointed out editorially, Mr. Mencken's article "is delightfully devoid of statistics—and correspondingly full of Menckenia." He deliberately refrains from printing any of the figures as to increased drunkenness, so clearly evidenced in the alarming increase in drunken drivers of automobiles, in his effort to portray that all is well with the drinking world. Here are some of the facts which he carefully failed to print: The Travelers' Insurance Company of Hartford, Connecticut, reports a 16 per cent increase in automobile fatalities in the first ten months of 1934 as compared with a similar period for 1933, and declares that in the total number of drivers involved in automobile accidents there has been an increase of almost 24 per cent in the number who were intoxicated. As for the pedestrians involved in automobile accidents in 1934, the records show an increase of more than 55 per cent in those intoxicated.

If there is any reason to doubt the figures of the Travelers' Insurance Company, let us take those of the New York State Department of Correction, which on August 12 reported that arrests for intoxication in the state had increased since repeal no less than 23 per cent. The same report announced an increase of 2.7 per cent in the number of major crimes committed during that period. It would be, of course, absurd to say that this latter increase was solely due to the repeal of prohibition, but in view of the statistics cited above it is surely warrantable to attribute a fair proportion of them to increased intoxication. When the International Association of Chiefs of Police met in annual convention in Washington at the end of September, 1934, a large portion of their time was given to a discussion of the drunken driver. Dr. T. W. Kilmer, police surgeon of Hempstead, New York, produced figures showing how the number of drunken drivers who come into contact with the police has increased since repeal: New York 25 per cent, Massachusetts 37 per cent, District of Columbia 42 per cent, Rhode Island 100 per cent, Pennsylvania 77 per cent, Oregon 36 per cent. In cities the figures ran as follows: Philadelphia 300 per cent, Cincinnati 380 per cent, New Orleans 122 per cent, Los Angeles 24 per cent.

But let us turn to the general results of repeal over which Mr. Mencken gloats so enthusiastically. He declares that "the present supply of the latter [hard liquors] comes mainly from lawful distilleries, but there is still some bootlegging. . . ." That is certainly an extraordinary way of putting the facts. Joseph H. Choate, Jr., director of the Federal Alcohol Control Administration, has said: "Since the beginning of 1934 . . . the seizures [of illicit distilleries] have actually increased. In January 732, in February 582, and in March 674 were seized, a total for the quarter of 1,988." Many, he said, were large plants of the most modern description with stills tall enough to extend through three or four stories of well-equipped buildings, with the almost incredible capacity of 67,905,770 gallons. He declared that if this increase continued throughout 1934 there would have been seized 7,952 illicit plants with a combined annual capacity only about 12 per cent less than the legitimate total permitted by the alcohol administration. In other words, the bootlegging trade in liquor is today about equal to the legal. And this fact is what Mr. Mencken dismisses with the words, "but there is still some bootlegging." In passing, let it be pointed out for Mr. Mencken's attention that on December 8 the Coast Guard captured in New York harbor $330,000 worth of bootleg alcohol on one ship. Secretary Morgenthau does not share Mr. Mencken's easy optimism. He is reported to be organizing the greatest drive yet undertaken to suppress bootlegging—how many such have we had!

Again, Mr. Mencken says that repeal achieved the "destruction of both motives for excess" drinking, and so "the demand quickly settled down to parity with the actual national appetite, which turned out to be very moderate. How did it become so moderate? Here again it seems to me we may seek a cause in the effects of prohibition." Well, here is what the Chicago Daily News, which was never accused of being for prohibition, has to say about one year of repeal in Illinois:

So far as a year's results may be judged from experience in Illinois, the enthusiasts for repeal were as much astray in their predictions as were the enthusiasts of prohibition. None of the promises have been fulfilled. The saloon is back, liquor is in politics, bootlegging continues, drinking has increased, unemployment is worse, the revenue returns to the state treasury are far below the hopeful estimates of 1933, and the cost of fighting the illicit traffic is still burdensome. From other states than Illinois similar conditions are reported.

So the national appetite is moderate? In New York City arrests involving drunkenness rose from 4,492 in the first ten months of 1933 to 5,357 in 1934 for the same period of the year. The New York State Motor Bureau reports that up to November, 1934, the licenses of 3,653 drivers had been revoked or suspended for driving when intoxicated, as contrasted with 3,008 during the entire year of 1933.

Dear Brother Mencken, the situation is alarming enough to cause national concern. The remedy is, of course, not to return to prohibition, but to work out a decent and sane system of rigid liquor control. That should have been done in every state before repeal.

Isabel Garrison Villard

The Menace of Huey Long

I. The Kingfish in His Kingdom

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

Baton Rouge, Louisiana, December, 1934

THE state legislature is in session for the fourth time this year. The summons went out Friday for a meeting Sunday night, December 16, which anywhere else would trumpet an emergency. Here it meant simply a new maneuver by Huey Long. More patronage is to be grabbed for the Long machine, though there isn't much left to grab. More Long enemies are to be punished. But the purpose of the session is also to create diversion. Seymour Weiss, unofficial treasurer of the Long organization, president of the Dock Board, and nationally known hotel man, was indicted on Thursday. The federal investigators who trapped Al Capone have dug up evidence for charges that Weiss evaded paying income tax on $176,972 in the years 1929-33. Everyone on Thursday was talking about Weiss, the second of the inner four of the Long machine to be tangled in the federal net. So far eight men have been involved in charges of evading the tax on more than a million dollars of income in the four years of Huey Long's rule. New Orleans was humming with gossip on Thursday. But by Friday night everyone was talking of the special session. As if to create a further diversion, Huey Long, United States Senator, clashed on Saturday with Captain "Biff" Jones, football coach at Louisiana State University. The Senator wanted to give his favorite football players a "pep" talk between halves of the Oregon game. The coach refused, exchanged hot words with the Senator, resigned. By Monday not only was the Weiss indictment off the front page; the Jones incident was outranking the special session in the newspapers.

The legislators meet Sunday night in the new $5,000,000 Huey Long Statehouse, a fine building with a thirty-story tower, which went up in a year. Everyone is happy, as though coming to a party. There is much hand-shaking and back-slapping. Only the insiders, back from a caucus in the governor's mansion, know what Huey Long is up to. These legislators are much like those in other states. Here and there is an outstanding fellow, but most are good-hearted, representative small-town citizens. One ten-gallon hat from an upstate parish (the Louisiana name for a county) is on parade. The lofty, overdecorated assembly hall of the lower house is noisy with the buzz of talk. The galleries are crowded. A few women sit in members' seats, but they are only wives, privileged on an opening session. (Huey, bitterly opposed by the society women of New Orleans, is no feminist. To my question, "How does he stand on feminism?" a close colleague replied: "He is perfectly normal on that. I never heard him discuss it.") The session begins; everyone stands in silence for a prayer, beseeching God's guidance during the work of serving the people of Louisiana. It is an earnest prayer; one feels for a moment that Huey's people actually believe they are there for public service. The prayer ended, roll call is taken by electricity; members press buttons on their desks, a light shines beside each name on a huge board behind the Speaker's dais. Then all is confusion again, as thirty-five bills are read by title into the microphone and resound through the hall over the din of a hundred conversations.

Huey Long is ubiquitous. Now at the Speaker's chair for whispered consultation, now on the floor, he speaks to this man and that, then in the aisles, laughing, shouting, gesticulating. His loud voice is easily heard over the din. He is in a boisterous humor. As United States Senator he has no business there, no official status. The technicality occurs to no one. Why should it? This is Huey's Statehouse, Huey's legislature, Huey's state, his and his alone. The business proceeds; Long answers a question from the floor, he grins and waves his arms, he struts and grimaces with eyes protruding, face flushed. He is like a young father on a romp in the nursery. Anyone can see how much fun it is being dictator. Six years ago a Louisiana legislature nearly impeached him. Now see where he is: he has more power in one state than ever a man in American history; he is stronger than a king. He revels in his triumph, and most of the members appear to enjoy it too. The last of the bills is read. Only a few members have risen to ask questions or to protest against the hurry. The opposition still does not know what is hidden in the bills; it wants them printed before the committee meeting in the morning. Huey halts in the aisles to promise he will see to it. The meeting adjourns, and the legislators rush out to the gala chocolate-marble lobby to continue their fraternizing.

Let us follow the course of the thirty-five bills in the Committee of Ways and Means, which met Monday morning at nine o'clock. This committee has seventeen members, fifteen of them Huey's, only two from the opposition. All house bills, whatever their contents, now go to this committee, which meets on the tenth floor of the Statehouse tower. Here, one would assume, the real work of legislation is done. Here bills should be studied, analyzed, modified. Here should emerge the conflicts of interest and principle later to be fought out in debates of the house, and subsequently carried to the state at election time.

At five minutes before nine Huey arrives noisily with his bodyguard. He looks well-groomed in a brown suit. But everything about this man is exaggerated; his voice is too loud, his color too flushed, his gestures too sweeping, his sudden moments of earnestness too fanatical, his commands too noisy. No man could well be more bereft of dignity.

"This is no way to run a legislature," he shouts on finding he is almost first on the scene. "Nine o'clock, and nobody here!" One of his bodyguard slips out; members begin scrambling in, taking their places around the committee table. Roll is called promptly at nine (and one thinks how Mussolini made the trains run on time). The night before, Huey dominated the legislature, but it still was managed by its own officials. This morning, without formality, he takes full charge. A United States Senator, he has no right before the committee unless invited to address it. But this is dictatorship. Huey stands at the side of the chairman. "Before I explain these bills," he begins with unctuous humor, "I want to hear any comments by opponents." The bills had come from the printers just in time for the meeting, so the opponents had had no time to read them. The leading member of the opposition, a handsome young man of twenty-three, scowls and mutters a complaint. Huey grins. The chairman hands up Bill No. 1 and Huey glances over it.

"This bill," he begins conversationally, still reading, "is just a formality. The last legislature passed a liquor law—" He then tells in a few words what the bill provides. Someone whispers in his ear. "Oh yes, the bill also—" A member moves a favorable report, the gavel smashes down, the bill is approved. Huey is handed Bill No. 2, an income-tax measure. He explains it in a sentence; it is reported favorably. Bill No. 3 is a patronage grab giving the state machine the appointment of thirty employees in the tax collector's office in New Orleans. Huey again is solemnly humorous. "This is a very charitable law. It gives the gentlemen down in New Orleans the advantage of the best talent available. It relieves the heart of Mr. Montgomery [the tax collector] of a heavy burden."

"Has he requested the change?" speaks up twenty-three-year-old Representative Williamson.

"Not yet," says Huey; "we just anticipated that."

"Do you think he will like it?" asks Williamson.

"He will have to like it." The bill is approved at once. Three bills are out of the way in an elapsed time of six minutes. The same rate is maintained throughout. Huey stands there the entire time, the chairman's only function being to call for a vote, bring down his gavel, announce that the measure is approved, Representative Williamson and usually the second opposition member, voting no. Such questions as are raised are addressed to Huey and he answers them. One or two of the members interject remarks but Huey talks them into silence. He is running the show. Only one committee man makes a short speech, as by a special dispensation.

The object of much of the legislation is patronage grabbing. One bill takes from the city attorneys the right to name more than three assistants. New Orleans has ten. Hereafter this patronage goes to the Long machine through the Attorney General. Another bill transfers to the state the naming of all but five deputy sheriffs in any parish. Another requires all police and firemen to hold a warrant issued by the state. Huey promises that the state will not exercise discretionary power in issuing warrants, but the promise is not written into the bill. So the state gets control over every local police force and fire station after having taken over the appointment of police and fire chiefs in the last session.

The most important bill of the day provides for new schools of dentistry and pharmacy at Louisiana State University. Loyola University in New Orleans already has a dental college; Loyola also operates a radio station which did not give Huey all the time he wanted during the last campaign. Loyola will now feel the competition of a wealthy new dental school and Louisiana will have improved dental facilities. Instead of three free chairs in the Charity Hospital, there will be seventy-five. Huey, not mentioning the Loyola radio station, promises the committee that the new dental college will have the finest faculty in the world. It will enable young men to study dentistry at very low cost.

"How about the low cost to the taxpayers?" speaks up young Williamson.

"The little fellow won't feel it," Huey explains. "It will cost the corporations a little more, but we have to take care of the poor people. From those that have shall be taken away." Later a bill is approved which increases the tax on corporation franchises from $1.50 to $2 a thousand, the proceeds to be earmarked for the new colleges.

One bill is rejected during the sitting, not by the committee, but by the "visiting" Senator. The chairman hands it up to him, he looks at it, frowns. "We don't want this. Let them come to us." With this cryptic remark he hands the bill back. The committee is told no more, but it formally shelves the measure. There is a bill aimed to prevent companies with pension schemes from discharging an employee just before his pension is due, requiring them to pay a proportion of the pension in such cases. Huey refers to a company within view of the committee window. (The Standard Oil Company refinery is smoking out there. Huey has fought Standard Oil all his political life.) Young Williamson remarks that the bill may lead all companies to abandon their pension schemes.

"Whoever goes out of the pension system because of this law just admits he is a crook," says Huey. The bill is approved. Once Huey finds the draft of a measure defective and scribbles an amendment himself, leaning over the table, writing rapidly on a large sheet of yellow paper while the committee waits. But even this delay does not spoil the record; thirty-five bills are acted on in seventy minutes, thirty-four approved, one shelved. This was the pace at the last session, and no doubt will be the pace so long as Huey's machine holds together. Two minutes for a law; this is dictatorship.

America has never seen anything more brazen or more slick. It is an object-lesson in the ease with which the form of democratic government can be twisted to serve the reality of one-man rule. The legislature meets, it pretends to initiate and enact laws, to scrutinize and debate them, and yet the operation has no more merit than it would have if these men moved in hypnosis.

What happens in the later sessions is that Huey makes further inroads into the broken lines of his opponents. By a ruse he gains control over the appointment of school teachers. He takes powers to remove the elected Mayor of Alexandria, the one town which had the temerity to shower him with eggs when he spoke there in the last campaign. The parish of Baton Rouge, which he did not capture at the polls, is subdued by a law which gives the state control of the "police jury," or local-government board, through the appointment of extra members. Huey explains he will make the parish into a District of Columbia, to safeguard the vast wealth of the state there situated. Standard Oil is at last subjected to an "occupational" tax for refining oil. The principle is resented by all business men and during Long's four years as Governor they kept him from applying this tax. Now it is slipped in unheralded and cannot be blocked. It will cost Standard Oil a million a year. Nor is this the end; there is talk of a further session in January, and beyond that of a new constitutional assembly to rewrite the basic law of the state to suit Huey's purposes.

To witness such a session is an almost unbelievable experience. It bristles with elements hard to comprehend.

Why do these committee members take it lying down? This legislature is composed of men who are most of them ordinary, nice human fellows. How can they stomach Huey Long? How can they put up with his bullying, his unsavory, blasphemous, overbearing language? They do not seem to be afraid of him; they appear to like him. Psychology explains the dictators of Europe as appealing to the innate yearning for father-authority in most people. But Huey Long is no father-figure. He is a grown-up bad boy.

Here is the way Huey's most plausible interpreter justifies the dictatorship. The speaker is the Reverend Gerald L. K. Smith, who is in charge of the "Share Our Wealth" movement, through which Huey aspires to national leadership. "It is the dictatorship of the surgical theater," he explains. "The surgeon is recognized as being in charge because he knows. Everyone defers to him for that reason only. The nurses and assistants do what he tells them, asking no questions. They jump at his commands. They are not servile, they believe in the surgeon. They realize he is working for the welfare of the patient."

"But the patronage grabbing?"

"Frankly, I believe in the spoils system. You have to have power before you can serve the people effectively. Senator Norris says you mustn't sacrifice any of your principles. Huey Long believes you have to yield on a lesser principle to serve a greater one."

That brings one back to the old, old argument about the end justifying the means. But it also raises a vital question. Is Huey Long a "surgeon" who "knows"? Is the surgeon concept worth taking seriously? It is, for if Huey realizes his ambition and campaigns throughout the United States for the Presidency, he will be asking for the surgeon's dictatorship. He will seek the support of the masses on the plea of doing for them what he has done for the masses in Louisiana. He will want all the "nurses" and "assistants" in the Capitol at Washington to jump at his command, as they now do in Baton Rouge. "Now this is a bill—" he will wish to explain to the Committee of Ways and Means, and he will expect the chairman to smash down his gavel and record its approval, with no more questions than a nurse voices in the operating room. This is the way Huey Long works. It is the only way he can work. He is not a fascist, with a philosophy of the state and its function in expressing the individual. He is plain dictator. He rules, and opponents had better stay out of his way. He punishes all who thwart him with grim, relentless, efficient vengeance.

But to say this does not make him wholly intelligible. One does not understand the problem of Huey Long or measure the menace he represents to American democracy until one admits that he has done a vast amount of good for Louisiana. He has this to justify all that is corrupt and peremptory in his methods. He really has been a remarkably competent surgeon. Taken all in all, I do not know any man who has accomplished so much that I approve of in one state in four years, at the same time that he has done so much that I dislike. It is a thoroughly perplexing, paradoxical record.

If he were to die today, and the fear and hatred of him died too, and an honest group of politicians came into control of Louisiana, they would find a great deal to thank Huey Long for. He has reshaped the organism of an archaic state government, centralized it, made it easy to operate efficiently.

Most important of all, he has shifted the weight of taxation from the poor, who were crippled under it, to the shoulders that can bear it. He has increased the debt of the state from $11,000,000 to nearly $150,000,000, the second largest per capita debt in the Union. But each stage of debt increase has been financed with new taxation. While the state has benefited from most of the money spent and its credit has been maintained at a high level, he has relieved the poor from many taxes and arranged for an early exemption of all property of $2,000 or under. This means that most Negroes in Louisiana and more than half the whites will be tax free, save for what they pay in taxes on tobacco, liquor, and gasoline. Further, his law postponing the payment of debts, though its effectiveness in practice still is to be demonstrated, makes him appear as the debtor's savior. He has laid out a system of highways and bridges that will lift Louisiana out of the backwoods tradition and make it coherent and accessible. Since 1924 two thousand miles of concrete roads, eleven hundred of asphalt, and thirty-seven hundred of gravel have been built, according to A. P. Tugwell, chairman of the State Highway Commission. Then, surprisingly, he has devoted himself to the cause of education. He has remodeled the school system of the state. His legislation has made it possible for a full eight-month term to be maintained in the poorest parishes. The burden of school attendance has been lightened by the state's providing all textbooks free of charge, a measure which has added around 15,000 to school attendance. (This is not to deny that school classes are far too large, or to condone dragging the schools into politics.) His enthusiasm for Louisiana State University, say his enemies, is the result of a feud with Tulane University, just as the new dental school is described as a punishment for Loyola. Leaving that aside, Louisiana State now is a flourishing, wealthy institution, with a first-rate faculty, doing work which marks it Grade A among the universities of the country. It has 4,000 students, as against 1,500 when Huey became Governor. Its equipment is superb, and it is taking a leading place in education in the South. Huey added a medical college to the university; the building was begun in January, was opened in October, the faculty was assembled, and the following May it won the grade of A among medical schools. Moreover, Tulane itself is improving its work in the face of this competition.

In the first year of his term as Governor, Huey put his shoulder behind the campaign to stamp out illiteracy. Louisiana was near the bottom of America's disgrace list. The late Julius Rosenwald, who paid out $50,000 for this campaign, deserves much of the credit. More than 100,000 adults, white and black, learned to read and write in a single year. (The work is now proceeding under the federal relief authorities.) Huey has fought the public-utility companies during his whole political career and has won important victories. Power and telephone rates have been reduced, and will be reduced further if he has his way. He is now fighting to lower electricity rates in New Orleans, the highest in the country for a city of its class. It must be recorded that his brother, testifying before the Senate committee investigating the Overman election, denied the sincerity of Huey's fight against the corporations, and this denial is vigorously supported by his enemies in Louisiana. But I am not attempting now to judge his motives, but rather to summarize his achievements as they appear to the majority in the state who support him. Even the $5,000,000 Statehouse, about which so much that is derogatory has been said, would be considered a boon without Huey and his henchmen in it. Most of it is in good taste, all of it is useful, and rearing its lofty tower beside the Mississippi it symbolizes the strength and even the dignity of a modern commonwealth. Behind Huey's record is not the enunciated social philosophy to be found, say, in Wisconsin, but he has lifted Louisiana from a backward position to one that in many respects is advanced. I have said that until this is appreciated, the menace he represents to democracy in America cannot be measured. The ~~man~~ has good works to offer in return for his dictatorship. One needs only to think a moment to realize that without the good works he would be no menace whatever.

[A second article on Huey Long by Mr. Swing will appear next week, and a third the week following.]

Taxation in the New Social State

VIII. European Finance in the World Crisis

By GERHARD COLM

IT has been estimated that before the depression taxes took from 20 to 25 per cent of the national income in the great European countries and only from 10 to 12 per cent in the United States. In Europe the World War left a deeper imprint on financial and economic conditions than it did in the United States, and even before the war most European governments supported a much larger group of social and economic functions than did government in this country. In comparing the public-finance policies of European countries with those of the United States one must also consider the greater natural resources of the United States, and hence the greater objective tax resources. Together these differences result in a much greater tax burden, relative to the national income, in Europe than here.

Because of the higher tax burden certain problems arose earlier and became more urgent in European countries—problems which can reasonably be expected to arise or become increasingly urgent in the United States if the share of public finance in the national economy continues to grow as it has grown in the last few decades. One lesson learned by Europe from the crisis may be touched upon here. European states in general experienced a steady increase in functions without any realization of the consequences of this process. Both in the conflict of philosophies and in social science the two extremes were dealt with predominantly—a laissez faire economy with a minimum of state activity, and a socialistic economy with a comprehensive state organization. For the middle course of a profit economy with important and growing public functions, both the philosophy and the technique were lacking. To be sure there existed in Germany as well as in England certain beginnings of a theory of "interventionism"; but they remained incipient, without extensive strength or influence. Many blunders, uncertainties, and half measures were traceable to this deficiency. Herein lies the first and most common failing of European financial policy from which a lesson may be drawn. A greater share of public finance in the national economy is not necessarily a reason for economic disturbances. The generalization does not hold that the countries with the highest relative tax burdens are necessarily plunged first and most deeply into the crisis. But there can be no doubt that the inconstancy of financial policy has been one reason for the failure to overcome the world depression.

Budgetary deficits are a general phenomenon of the present depression. Dalton writes, in his introduction to the study "Unbalanced Budgets," that in 1932 of thirty states surveyed only three had balanced budgets. The question is whether the use of idle credit reserves to cover these deficits contributes toward recovery, or whether recovery depends on first balancing the budget. Great Britain is often pointed out as the first and until now the only country to balance its budget and simultaneously to find its way out of the depths of depression. What is more natural than to assume that balancing the budget is the cause of recovery? What is more natural than to advise other countries to follow the British example? But this very example illustrates how difficult it is to interpret the experiences of one country in terms of another. The balancing of Britain's budget was possible chiefly for the following reasons: The country had been for a decade in a depression with a relatively large number of unemployed. Its budget carried grants for an unemployment-insurance system which paid a fairly high dole. With the increase in the number of unemployed during the world depression the rate of the dole was reduced, and therefore the total burden increased less than it did in countries which set up relief systems for the first time. Reduction in the relatively high government salaries was a further means of retrenchment. Similarly, the conversion of the public debt could have a greater influence on British expenditures than on those of other countries because of the proportionately greater importance of debt service in the British budget. Finally, the new tariffs opened up a source of revenue of considerable importance. The deflationary effect of this policy of economy was partly offset by an increasing real purchasing power of wages, which did not fall as fast as prices. It may be said that from the point of view of international competition the devaluation of the pound had the same effect as a reduction of wages. Despite the increasing number of unemployed the real purchasing power of labor rose, according to the Economist, about 5 per cent from 1929 to 1933, while in the United States, according to the calculation of the national income made by Dr. Simon Kuznets, a decline of about 25 per cent occurred from 1929 to 1932. The fact that the British government did not need to resort to credit in 1933 effected a further reduction in the interest rate and eased the resumption of private investment. But the reduction of the interest rate did not have the same effect in other countries, where tremendous credit reserves remained idle. The conservative financial policy alone cannot explain the recovery. Much more decisive was the fact that there existed in England a latent need for investment. British industry was organized to a great extent for foreign trade, yet many manufactured products were being imported into England even though they could have been produced at home. After the loss of important foreign markets England had no choice but to turn her production increasingly toward the home market, and she furthered this process of reorientation by means of tariffs and other governmental measures. This transformation stimulated investment in new plants and also created demand for new housing, since it involved a certain amount of geographical redistribution of population. Thus England experienced a recovery through reconstruction which arose from her peculiar situation and which cannot be duplicated in other countries.

Other examples indicate that a deflationary policy is not in itself sufficient to overcome depression. They indicate also that such a policy cannot even achieve the result of balancing the budget if conditions are different from those in England. In France the policy of governmental economy succeeded in diminishing the deficit but did not balance the budget. Economic conditions did not improve in spite of not unfavorable general conditions. Another example of deflationary policy occurred in the German republic under Brüning. Brüning made heroic efforts to balance the budget, chiefly through radical retrenchment of expenditures but also through a considerable increase in tax rates and the imposition of new taxes. But these attempts were rendered futile by the deepening depression, which led to new increases in relief expenditures and subsidies, and to decreasing tax revenues. And yet this policy of Brüning's, which involved so many sacrifices, was not entirely fruitless. Brüning himself had in mind, I suppose, to turn, after the period of radical retrenchment and after the definite settlement of the reparations question, to a policy of public works and credit expansion. To a certain extent, and not without a degree of success, such a program was later carried out by the National Socialist regime, which was thus able to realize the advantage of Brüning's earlier and thankless efforts. In view of the special situation of Germany's foreign trade and international credit, a policy of public works and credit expansion would have been quite impossible without previous or at least simultaneous reduction of costs. Italy's financial policy during the crisis also combined a tendency toward reduction of expenditures and costs of production with a policy of public works. Sweden followed, with a fair measure of success, a policy of modest expansion and carried a temporary budget deficit. We may therefore conclude from the experiences of Europe that a drastic attempt to balance the budget is not sufficient in itself to overcome the depression if business is not in a position to make use of large capital outlays. Recovery occurred simultaneously with a policy of budget balancing only where, as in England, large investments were made necessary by a transformation of the basis of production. Moreover, other countries achieved a certain degree of recovery without first balancing their budgets.

If we examine in detail the measures taken by European countries to balance their budgets, we find that, despite the larger appropriations for relief and other social purposes made necessary by the depression, the governments were more successful in decreasing expenditures than in increasing tax revenues. Economies were effected partly by the adjustment of governmental purchases and salaries to the lower price level, and partly by a curtailment of appropriations for social and cultural institutions. Reactionary forces frequently used the depression as an excuse for disposing of governmental activities which seemed undesirable to them. In nearly all countries normal expenditures for public building and repairs were drastically reduced. Public works only partly compensated for these reductions. Expenditures for armaments in most European countries did not fall in proportion to other administrative expenditures; in some countries they were even increased. In many cases the policy of public expenditures appears to fluctuate planlessly between drastic curtailment and uncontrolled expansion. Nowhere is the necessity for long-range planning more strikingly revealed than in this field.

In their efforts to increase tax revenues European countries did not discover remarkable new tax sources. Many non-European countries, in South America for example, were able to impose income taxes for the first time. In the United States liquor taxes and state sales taxes constituted important new tax sources which had already been used in most European countries before the depression began. The argument that taxation has passed the limits of productivity is often overstressed in the current depression, as Dalton points out in the work cited above. Nevertheless, it is a fact that in some European countries the income tax has reached at least its psychological limits. The German states and municipalities imposed many new taxes which fell most heavily on the lower and middle income groups. Even a kind of municipal poll tax was levied, less with the intention of increasing revenues than of interesting the masses in a policy of economy. Of particular interest is the imposition in Sweden of a heavy inheritance tax, the yield of which is to be used for the retirement of loans for public works.

In nearly all European countries a striking change in the tax structure took place during the depression. The proportion of income and property taxes in the total tax receipts was sharply reduced. A survey made by the League of Nations (World Economic Survey, 1933-34) which compared the tax receipts of the year 1929 with the estimated revenues for 1934 illustrates this tendency clearly. In general, the importance of excise and sales taxes, and in some countries of customs duties, has increased. (For nearly a century it has been the opinion of progressives that the relative importance of the income tax should be increased. Has the income tax, the ideal tax from the point of view of social justice, passed the peak of its development?) To a certain extent this tendency may be a temporary result of the fact that the income tax is levied on the income of the preceding year and is therefore more under the influence of the depths of the crisis than sales taxes, customs duties, and the like, which reflect more immediately the influence of recovery. Yet this phenomenon is more than merely temporary. It is not by chance that the relative importance of income and property taxes could be increased during the depression only in those countries, such as Hungary, Spain, and several South American countries, which did not have fully developed tax systems. In most European countries, with the exception of England, income taxation could be extended only by increasing the burden on lower and middle income groups, thereby reducing the social value of the income tax. The broad field of business taxation is capable of further development. But such taxes have not been studied scientifically and developed technically to the same extent as the income tax.

Finally, another aspect of Europe's experiences during the crisis may be profitably considered. With increasing financial burdens the problem of coordinating the various agencies assumes increasing urgency. Many European states in the last decades delegated certain of their functions, such as social insurance, to autonomous or semi-governmental bodies. Though this policy had certain administrative and political advantages, it became impossible to continue the fiscal autonomy of these bodies during the depression, when they ceased to be self-supporting or to meet even their minimum expenditures. Unemployment-insurance systems, for example, ceased to possess the feature of "insurance" in the technical sense of the term. Even states and municipalities lost their financial autonomy. As a consequence of the war and post-war exigencies, state and local governments had lost to the national government many of their taxing powers. The result was that these governments were in no position to meet the new demands which were placed upon them by the depression. It was impractical to attempt to restore their former taxing powers. The most reasonable alternative was further to centralize the taxing powers and responsibilities in the national government, in the interest of increased eficiency, and to continue the elimination of double taxation and equalization of tax resources as between wealthy and poor districts. The most extensive reforms along these lines have occurred in Great Britain and Germany.

Germany has been working toward a single system of public finance, in which the central authority exercises a controlling influence. The local units are required to fulfil a prescribed minimum of public functions. They can maintain services in excess of this minimum at their own discretion, but only up to a certain maximum regulated by law. Certain taxes are reserved for local uses, but in many cases these are administered by the central government. Other local revenues are derived from state aid. Formerly these were distributed chiefly according to the local contribution to the national tax revenues. Recently the basis of this distribution has been modified to that of the relative needs of the different districts. By such reforms the financial operations of central and local governments have been coordinated.

It is evident from this review of the European experience that with a rising level of taxation and increasing influence of public finance on business activity it becomes imperative for a country to coordinate and unify the financial operations of its various governmental units. We may expect during the next few years increasing activity along these lines in the United States, and the development here of a plan of coordination that will meet the peculiar needs of this country.

[This is the eighth of a series of ten articles on taxation, planned and edited by Professor Paul Studenski. The ninth, on Public Finance in Time of War, by Hugh Dalton of the London School of Economics, will appear in an early issue.]

Don't Do It, Mr. Hopkins!

By EDITH ABBOTT

THE Washington announcements that a new employment or work-relief program is to be initiated on a much more adequate scale than even the CWA is good news to all who understand the unmerited sufferings of the unemployed and their eagerness for work. Newspapers continue to carry new and revised versions of the story which many state relief administrators already know by heart—that when the Federal Relief Administrator launches his great work-corporation, or whatever he decides to call it, the new system will provide "work for the employable," and as for the so-called "unemployables," well, they are to "go back to the states."

Back to the states, Mr. Hopkins? Back to the local authorities that have no facilities and no funds for taking care of these people? For going back to the states really means going back to the counties and back to the townships; and back to the inefficiency, incompetency, and inadequacy of the system of poor relief supported by local property taxes.

Greatly respected citizens apparently have some mysterious faith in the supposed virtue of local taxes and local administration. The liberal and generous-spirited President of the United States still speaks almost devoutly of the importance of the local communities "doing their part"—as if they had adequate funds and leadership for a social-welfare program. There is, of course, an influential body of public opinion that, for unexplained reasons, desires and expects a prompt return to the old, local, poor-law system. For example, Newton D. Baker, distinguished both as a statesman and a philanthropist, has recently pointed out the supposed dangers of federal relief and the supposed virtues of the local administration of all poor relief, and has announced his "eager hope that soon the entire burden of relief may be returned to local shoulders." But all who have recognized the miserable incompetence of the old system know that returning to the local relief authorities means returning to everything that is reactionary in the field of social welfare. It means going back to the old system of political county boards and township trustees, back to the "poor masters," "overseers of the poor," "poor boards," and other antiquated relief administrations.

There are 3,072 counties in this country, but there are many more local poor-relief authorities than there are counties. A recent Ohio report showed that in that state, for example, where there are only 88 counties, there are 1,337 townships and 110 cities, a total of 1,535 local governments, all with a statutory responsibility for some form of relief to persons outside of institutions. And if a count is made of the officials responsible for administration under the state poor law and under the various special laws concerned with public aid, "there are approximately 6,000 public officials responsible for the administration of some form of outdoor relief" in Ohio. They are, for the moment of course, inactive, and their work is now being carried on by the FERA with a better understanding of human needs. How many different statutory poor-relief authorities and officials there are in the whole country no one knows.

Public calamities like the great depression and the great drought were apparently needed to expose the weakness and the incompetence of the outworn local relief system. As a result of these calamities, emergency poor-relief legislation, creating new central poor-relief authorities, federal and state, has been hastily enacted in the last few years by Congress and by the state legislatures, to supplement the antiquated poor-law machinery of the states. These new emergency laws that have been passed since the autumn of 1931 have temporarily revolutionized the old system by removing the primary responsibility for relief from the minor local authorities. But, unfortunately, these new central authorities have been created only for temporary purposes and are generally described in the statutes as "emergency" commissions or administrations.

In a fine decision (Ach v. Braden, 125 Ohio State 307), the Ohio Supreme Court recently quoted the ancient maxim of the law "Salus populi suprema lex est," and accepted the theory that the emergency poor-relief act was an exercise of the police power for promoting the common welfare, for "the alleviation of human suffering, the prevention of want, by aiding the poor in their distress." The court said that the state, like "the Good Samaritan of old, had extended a helpful hand to those of its people who through no fault of their own had become destitute and needful of the necessities of life." And in an emergency the superseding of the local authorities by the state was justified. But only for the emergency! What then? In Ohio the old poor laws "are still in force, and the principles which have characterized the legislation in this area since 1790" remain substantially unaltered in the emergency.

One of the most exigent questions of the day is how to construct a modern system of public assistance on the old poor-law foundations. For there is much that is valuable in the fundamental principle on which the old poor law rests. The basic principle of these statutes, accepted in America since colonial days, is that the state accepts the responsibility for the maintenance of all its citizens who are unable to maintain themselves on the accepted minimum standard of living. However inadequate the administrative machinery has been, the basic principle of public responsibility remains as sound in the twentieth century as it has been in the preceding three centuries of its history. But there is abundant evidence of the need of reorganization, revision, and codification of the state laws dealing with public aid. The trend of the last century has been away from local responsibility toward public aid from the state administrations. More than a century ago this movement began with the removal of the indigent insane from local poorhouses and jails, from local jurisdiction and local responsibility, to state hospitals supported by state funds. More recently the newer forms of public assistance, such as mothers' aid and old-age pensions, have not infrequently recognized the principle of state aid as distinguished from local responsibility. These new forms of public assistance have usually been set up outside of the poor law, while the old laws have remained substantially unchanged. The principles of local responsibility, of "settlement" or a long period of residence as a basis for eligibility, and of the legal responsibility of members of the family for the maintenance of certain relatives have been substantially unchanged since the English poor laws of the seventeenth century were brought to this country by our earliest colonists.

In the last eighteen months the President and Mr. Hopkins have made a notable beginning in applying the principles of federal aid to the social-welfare system. The FERA has had far-reaching influence on the development of the new welfare programs in parts of the country where there has never been any social work before. Competent "emergency relief" organizations, with state directors, regional and district supervisors, and county social-work units, have been set up in areas where social-work standards had heretofore barely existed. But if Mr. Hopkins turns everything but a work program "back to the states," federal supervision and federal control will go. More than that, state supervision and state control will also go, and the discredited local authorities will be promptly restored. Local politicians, temporarily banished by the resolute orders of the Federal Relief Administrator, will return to welfare control.

Instead of "turning the unemployables back to the states," will not the Federal Relief Administrator take a position of leadership in demanding that the states abolish their old pauper laws and set up a new American system of public assistance? The disgraceful and un-American word "pauper," which still appears as the title of the Illinois poor law, is also used in twenty-nine other states as the legal title of the statute making provision for public aid, in the section heads, or in the text of the statute. That these are really "pauper laws" in spirit as well as in terminology was sharply brought home to many people during the campaign of 1932 and again this last fall when an effort was made in certain communities to enforce the old pauper disqualification for the franchise. The old system will die hard, and few states will be able to make any substantial progress in the abolition of the pauper laws without Administration pressure. All the petty officials drawing petty salaries for the incompetent "pauper law" administration of which they are a part will welcome help from Washington that will seem to restore the old system.

Has not the time come when the Federal Relief Administrator can announce a plan or policy that will assure the setting up of a permanent Federal Welfare Department with continued federal aid not only for old-age pensions, unemployment compensation, and mothers' pensions but also for general home relief? If the federal government, in its zeal for the more popular forms of economic security, withdraws from the relief program, and if the pressure of the federal government for adequate standards of care is removed, the states will lose no time in returning the statutory local responsibility for relief to the statutory but incompetent local governments. Only by continuing federal aid for human welfare, as well as for roads and agricultural experiments, can the old degrading and disgraceful system of local relief be brought to an end. Will not Mr. Hopkins set us free from our un-American American poor laws, instead of returning to them the so-called "unemployables" and their families?

Gold Bricks for the Aged

By M. B. SCHNAPPER

BACKED by a high-powered propaganda machine which is capitalizing the desperate hopes of elderly men and women, the Townsend plan proposing a pension of $200 a month for all persons over sixty is sweeping the country. Playing up President Roosevelt's promise of pension legislation to their own advantage, the sponsors of the Townsend plan are leading elderly people to believe that the scheme has the indorsement of the Chief Executive himself. And the plan is exploiting not only the dreams and the patriotism of the aged, but their pocket-books as well; for each of the reputed four million Townsend adherents is paying hard-earned cash for Townsend pie in the sky. There are millions of possible dollars and adherents among the ten million persons in the United States above the age of sixty.

The Townsend scheme—strictly speaking, the Townsend Old Age Revolving Pension Plan—is promoted by a group of organizations using the same address in Long Beach, California, and calling themselves Old Age Revolving Pensions, Ltd., Old Age Revolving Pensions, Inc., the Prosperity Publishing Company, and the Modern Crusader. While California was the birthplace and is the center of activity, local Townsend clubs have been formed in all parts of the country.

Economically absurd, the Townsend scheme is yet simplicity itself. Each man or woman reaching the age of sixty—who doesn't happen to be a habitual criminal—will be entitled to receive from the federal government a check for $200 on the first of each month. The only conditions are that the recipient shall not work or engage in any other money-making activities, and that he spend the entire $200 within the month. The Townsend prestidigitators propose to finance the scheme through a 10 per cent retail sales tax. If such a tax seems high, Dr. Townsend is quick to assure you that it is really going to be a blessing in disguise, because the $200 a month will create an enormous demand for goods. While prices will rise, profits and wages will also increase. In short, Hoover prosperity days may turn out to have been a depression compared with the Townsend era.

It would be difficult not to treat the Townsend plan as a joke if it were not such a serious matter for so many. Its economics are so absurd that it should hardly be necessary to analyze them, to compare them with the facts, but let us do just that. The Census of 1930 showed that there were in that year 10,350,000 persons in the United States who were sixty years of age and over; at present there are slightly more in this older age group. In some of the Townsend literature it is claimed that ten million persons would be pensioned and that two billion dollars a month would be paid out in pensions. In other publications the number expected to be pensioned is placed at eight million, which would reduce the pensions to $1,600,000,000 per month. Expressed as an annual figure, the total cost of the pensions is thus between $19,200,000,000 and $24,000,000,000. Either figure is more than double the total disbursement of the federal government last year, including all loans, and ten times the present relief costs. Either one approaches one-half the total present income of all of the people of the United States and one-fourth of the entire national income in the best year we ever had. (According to the estimates of the United States Department of Commerce the total gross income produced last year was less than forty billions and in 1929, the best year, less than eighty-three billions.) People who are sixty and over constitute less than 9 per cent of all the people of the United States, but at present income levels they would under the Townsend plan receive more than half of the entire national income.

Neither a 10 per cent retail sales tax nor a 10 per cent tax on all money transactions would yield anywhere near the amount required to finance the old-age pensions under the Townsend plan. The total retail sales in the United States—including food, clothing, and all other necessities, without any exemptions—amounted to $31,500,000,000 in 1932, and to $49,115,000,000 in 1929, the largest total we have ever had. A 10 per cent additional tax on all retail sales would thus produce only from three to five billions a year, while the Townsend pensions would require from nineteen to twenty-four billions. A 10 per cent tax on all money transactions would produce a great deal more revenue than a retail sales tax, because in addition to retail sales it would reach all wholesale sales, farm sales, professional incomes, salaries, and wages, and even sales of homes and other real property. At that it would not yield enough money to pay the pensions, since the total of all money transactions in 1932 was only $136,000,000,000.

To meet these facts establishing the impossibility of the Townsend plan, the claim is made that the adoption of this plan would increase the total national income to 240 or 300 billions a year. This claim is based on the premise that every dollar of money issued turns over ten times before it is retired—some of the publications say ten times per year. This is manifestly a concept of the physical circulation of money which has no relation whatever to national income. The absurdity of the claim of a marvelous increase in business is manifest when it is realized that thirty-two billion dollars was distributed in wages, salaries, and other forms of labor income in the United States last year and yet total retail sales were less than forty billions. How nineteen to twenty-four billion dollars paid to from eight to ten million retired persons over sixty years of age will produce from 240 to 300 billion dollars of business, while thirty-two billion dollars actually paid to forty million persons gainfully employed produced less than forty billion dollars of business, the Townsend literature does not explain.

A claim of the Townsend plan advocates which has a great appeal is that the granting of the proposed pensions would immediately create jobs for eight or ten million persons. The assumption in this claim apparently is that everybody over sixty years of age who would be granted a pension is now working. This, of course, is not a fact. Of the entire number of people sixty years old or over, only 4,155,495 were reported in the Census of 1930 to be gainfully employed.

The largest number of those working, moreover—more than 1,400,000—were employed in agriculture, and there were other very large groups in trade, in the professions, and in public service. In fact, there were only a little more than a million persons of sixty or over who were engaged in manufacturing industries, and not all of these, of course, were wage-earners. Adoption of the Townsend plan would not give jobs, at least immediately, to any large part of the total number now unemployed. Whether it would do so ultimately depends upon the validity of the claim that the payment of pensions would enormously increase business. The placing of a great deal of money in the hands of eight to ten million persons in the oldest age group would undoubtedly have a stimulating effect on business, but the proposed sales tax would have just the opposite effect and a transactions tax a still more retarding effect. The net total effect upon business cannot be foretold, but it certainly is very unlikely that the Townsend plan would be a panacea for all present economic ills.

In the Driftway

IN the London New Statesman and Nation for December 8 the Drifter has just read a mournful article exploring the ruination of the English landscape by that miserable tree, the conifer! They may be well enough, says the New Statesman's "Critic," "in high latitudes where no other trees will grow," or on Mediterranean cliffs or Alpine valleys or the Alban Hills. But not as a substitute for "the traditional trees which are part of the poetry of England." "This process," Critic adds, "like the stripping of their historic contents from great houses, is a part of the price we are paying for the gradualness of our socialization." About the socialization of England the Drifter is not competent to speak; but he is rather an expert on conifers, or rather as much of an expert as a little knowledge and much admiration entitles him to be.

THE conifer, of course, needs no defense from the Drifter, but he has just returned from a New England holiday, and has seen it in all its northeastern glory. Even in a mild English climate, he seems to recall, the deciduous trees shed their leaves in winter. In New England they are delicately bare, their twigs making the various patterns, so readily distinguishable, conditioned by their genus. And in between and around them the hillsides are darkened by pine and feathery hemlock. Even the second- and third-growth pine makes a good showing, and here and there the bold crown of an older and taller pine stands shaggily out. These are conifers, neighbor Critic. They are full, dark green, copious, grand. Close up, the hemlocks drip small, neat cones from the ends of their branches; closer still, the bark of the old pines is deep-furrowed, reverently ancient: stand next the trunk and look up along its great height, and at the top see the sun glancing on the green plumes. There is nothing like a gnarled oak in a meadow by itself, or a tall, umbrella-topped elm—unless it is a solitary pine. On the farm where the Drifter spent his Christmas there is a grandfather pine, growing on the edge of what a hundred years ago was a well-traveled road. Unlike the tall, straight forest pines, its massive branches begin less than ten feet from its base. They are gigantic arms thrust out protectingly over the old highway, making deep crotches for children to climb easily about in. Not the largest living giant could circle the trunk with his long arms. Just a conifer, Critic; but take the Drifter's word for it, it really wouldn't make a bad impression even in the New Forest.

THE Drifter forbears to mention the Western redwoods that have grown 400 feet high and 31 feet through at the base. Nor will he discuss the carpet of reddish-brown needles which, under a grove of conifers, is so yielding and soft under foot. The cause of Critic's complaint, of course, is not that noble tree, the conifer, but the English climate, in which, apparently it only ignobly grows. A country which—like the Duchy of Cornwall, for example—can produce trees only about twenty feet high, with branches twisted and warped by the everlasting wind, is not suited to mast-tall pines. (It is true that in that English climate some very creditable oaks and beeches grow, and considerable impressive green grass.) But the English landscape as a whole is too intimate, too cultivated for pines—except for the moors, on which practically nothing grows except gorse, sheep, and Brontës. And the Drifter will agree with Critic that nothing would be so depressing, in that landscape, as plantations of suburban evergreens, primly thrusting up their little pointed noses—conifers in name only.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Farm Loans Once More

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Your issue of November 7 containing Mr. Jerome Waxman's letter entitled Farm Loans has only just reached me. He says that, in my letter to you entitled Bankers and Money Changers I failed to state important facts, and being unable to accuse me explicitly of such failure, he implies that the land on which I sought a farm loan was uninhabitable swamp land, and that in my letters to Messrs. Gaston, Johnson, and Van Sant I did not state the truth about it. I challenge him to produce these letters and publish them. I wish to inform your readers that the land was truly described at and after the time of the original application for the loan. The land is not "uninhabitable swamp land." In pretending that it is "uninhabitable swamp land" the bank officials are trying to deceive the public and to justify their arbitrary interpretation and administration of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act.

The land in question is fertile upland, as a brief inspection would prove. It is in a regular farming country and was used by the owners for the production of a great variety of fruits, vegetables, grain, and hay. The man who occupied it when I applied for the loan had corn growing on it, but the rocking-chair inspector from the land bank closed his eyes to the growing corn as his bosses ordered him to do. As I stated in my letter to you, the Federal Land Bank of Springfield never lends money on any farm unless its owner possesses large resources in addition to the value of his farm equity, but this fact is not openly admitted by the bank or by government underlings for fear of public censure. The Emergency Farm Loan law was enacted to help all those who wanted to make a living on land instead of asking for "relief," but the bank continued to run in its pre-emergency ruts of greedy, narrow-minded favoritism, forgetting that the people of the country will be benefited by small loans more than by the so-called dole.

Rutherford, N. J., December 24

MARY E. LIVESEY

Relief in the Coal Fields

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

For the past three years you have kindly opened your columns from time to time to reports of the special services of relief and rehabilitation being carried on by the Quakers, with the cooperation of the Federal Council of Churches, in the bituminous coal fields of West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Kentucky. We should like to extend our thanks to your many readers who have contributed money or clothing to this emergency work in what is perhaps the neediest area in America.

You will be glad to learn that this work is entering its fourth year with increasing emphasis on rehabilitation and educational aspects. A conference of the twenty-four field workers held recently at Morgantown, West Virginia, brought out the urgent needs to be met and the substantial services being rendered by this picked group of workers. The varied projects include subsistence gardens and canning, furniture and handicraft shops, supplementary relief, a health clinic service, and workers' education classes, both on subsistence homesteads and in certain active coal-mining centers. Close cooperation is maintained with state and federal government relief agencies, coal operators, and the union. Small libraries are now being started in a number of communities which have never had such facilities before. A study course entitled "The Human Price of Coal," including suggested solutions for the problems of the industry, is available for churches and study groups at twenty cents per copy.

Contributions are urgently needed and may be sent to Olive Van Horn, Treasurer, Coal Areas Committee, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City. Books and clothing should be shipped prepaid to 1515 Cherry Street, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

New York, January 2

JAMES MYERS

A Come-back for Judge Lindsay

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I am sure the readers of The Nation will be happy to know that Judge Ben Lindsay, after being so outrageously treated in Colorado, was elected in November to be Superior Court Judge of Los Angeles County, California. The vote was the largest ever cast for that office in the history of California and Judge Lindsay won in spite of bitter and unscrupulous opposition.

New York, January 2

PERCIVAL MUSGRAVE

Not Fit to Print, an article on the Newspaper Guild by one of its leading members, will appear next week. It gives the newspaperman's answer to the publishers' bitter attack on the principle of collective bargaining as set forth in the recent decision of the National Labor Relations Board.

Like "100,000,000 GUINEA PIGS", this book "names names"!

SKIN DEEP

The Truth About Beauty Aids—Safe and Harmful

By M. C. Phillips

of Consumers' Research (the organization whose researches provided the facts behind 100,000,000 Guinea Pigs.)

DO YOU KNOW of the prominent Dayton, Ohio, society matron who lost her eyesight as the result of using an eyelash dye? The dye is still being sold.

?

—of the wife of a Hollywood director whose face, arms, and neck were burned when a well-known dry shampoo (really a "dry cleaner") exploded?

?

—of the woman who was blinded by a depilatory?

—that certain cosmetics contain salts of mercury?

—of the reducing drug "discovered" in a munitions factory, where the workers who were fat soon lost their rotundity—and which is so dangerous that a doctor who attempted to administer it to himself was slowly cooked to death?

?

DO YOU KNOW what perspiration suppressor also tenderizes the cotton cloth it touches?

?

DO YOU KNOW that hair dyes can—and frequently do—cause skin eruptions, facial disfigurement and even more unpleasant consequences?

?

DO YOU KNOW that the so-called "women's magazines" of the "better kind" (including those that have "household institutes" and "seals of approval" accept advertising for many of the potentially dangerous cosmetics mentioned in this book?

Some Press Comments:

"It is an entirely frank and fearless book and bluntly names names."

—THE NEW YORK TIMES

"Not only readable but full of valuable information . . . Miss Phillips does not rail at the use of cosmetics in general; what she does is to name preparations which are harmful and even dangerous to life, and at the same time to recommend those which have been found to be safe and reliable after unbiased analysis by the chemists of the Consumers' Research."

—THE SATURDAY REVIEW OF LITERATURE

"A devastating analysis of widely advertised beauty aids and cosmetics, naming names of products dangerous and harmless."

—LEWIS GANNETT IN THE N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

 "There is, however, no general law at present that requires a manufacturer to declare the ingredients of his cosmetics on the label or even to include a warning of any potentially poisonous ingredients."

—Skin Deep, page 54

$2.00 At All Bookstores

THE VANGUARD PRESS

100 Fifth Avenue

New York City

Labor and Industry

The Great "Bootleg" Coal Industry

By LOUIS ADAMIC

Shamokin, Pennsylvania, December 22

EIGHT nights ago, on driving into Pennsylvania's hard-coal country, I put up at a roadside hotel in the southern part of the region and, although tired, slept hardly a wink all night. My windows were on the crossing of two state highways, and every three or four minutes a truck roared by. A coal truck. Now and then four, five trucks thundered or sputtered past in a row, shaking the ground under the hotel and me in my bed. I could not help rising every once in a while and going to the window to watch the procession. Through the night there passed that spot hundreds of trucks, large and small, new and old—some loaded with coal to the rim, others empty. The loaded ones, as I learned in the ensuing days, were headed for New York City, Brooklyn, various New Jersey towns, Philadelphia, Chester, Wilmington, Baltimore. The "empties" were returning from these places. The two-way streams of heavy traffic moved all night and continued, a bit thinned out, in the daytime. But this was nothing new. It has been going on now at this rate for over a year, practically without interruption. And similar streams of coal trucks have been moving all this time on other highways connecting the southern section of the anthracite region with the great population centers on the Atlantic seaboard and in upstate New York.

They are part of one of the most interesting, not to say exciting, socio-economic phenomena developed in the United States during these years of depression—the so-called "bootleg" coal, coal illegally mined by the unemployed in the mining towns from company-owned lands, for the most part in open daylight, by the most primitive methods imaginable, in complete disregard of private property rights and successful defiance of company police, and, in most places, with the full approval of the constituted authorities and of the overwhelming majority of the other inhabitants of the community; it is sold in the open market to the tune of nearly a half-million tons a month in competition with the legitimately mined coal—a fact which is beginning to cause anthracite operators and regular coal dealers in numerous Eastern cities and towns no end of perturbation.

Bootleg coal has a long, complicated history. Here, for brevity's sake, I shall summarize its innocent beginnings and, lest I strain some reader's credulity, somewhat simplify the fantastic situation as it exists today.

Ever since anyone in the Pennsylvania anthracite field can remember, it has been customary for miners and their families to go with sacks or pails to the culm dumps surrounding their bleak towns and pick coal from among the rock and slate thrown out in the breaking and cleaning processes at the big collieries. The pickers usually were the poorer families. Most of the companies permitted this, and the "pickings," as a rule, were used for fuel in miners' homes. Occasionally some miner paid his church dues or a small grocery bill with a few bags of coal he had picked up on the dumps. No one ever sold it for cash.

An old miner in the town of Shenandoah told me that during the great 1902 strike, when many families experienced serious difficulties in keeping body and soul together, so many pickers invaded the culm heaps that after a while hardly a lump of coal was to be found; so he and several other family men went "in the woods up on the hill over there," where they knew coal was near the surface, and "sunk a few holes," and dug what coal they needed for their own use. They worked at night. They had an uneasy feeling that this was not unrelated to thievery, "but what could a man do, I ask you, with winter here and not a dollar to his name to buy fuel with?" This, so far as I can determine, was the first time that miners started "holes" on company property without authority from the owners.

Early in the 1920's equipment in the collieries became so efficient that not only were thousands thrown out of work, but practically no coal was thrown upon the culm dumps; free pickings became scarcer and scarcer, and finally almost a matter of history. The result was that when hard times hit them, the miners resorted to illegal mining in increasing numbers, but still only for their own use and mostly at night. During the winter months of the stubborn 1925 strike several hundred holes were opened throughout the anthracite region. The strike ended, but conditions went from bad to worse because the companies, finding labor more and more difficult to deal with, began to install still more efficient machinery, which threw additional thousands out of work and permitted other thousands but part-time employment; so some of the holes opened during the walkout continued to be operated, and from time to time others were started. By and by, under the pressure of extreme economic necessity, illegal miners began to dig coal for their neighbors for cash, and in 1928 and 1929 there probably were from seven to nine hundred men in the six anthracite counties whose income came solely or mainly from "bootleg" coal—as they and their customers commenced jokingly to call it, because it was, in most cases, mined and delivered secretly at night.

In 1930, when the current depression engulfed the country, coal bootlegging probably doubled. In the town of Centralia, where nearly all legitimate coal production had ceased even in 1929, the number of illegal miners at least trebled. In the winter of 1930-31, when growing numbers of people appeared before township and county poor boards with requests for fuel, the board in not a few cases told them to get their own fuel. Where? How? The board members sometimes shrugged their shoulders or suggested that the nearby hills were full of coal. That winter coal bootlegging again doubled or trebled in most towns. In Centralia it became the main industry. It kept the stores open, the people from moving out. The bootleggers, as they actually called themselves, started to work their holes and haul down their loot in the daytime. When the coal companies had some of them arrested, the poor boards promptly effected their release if they proved they had dug the coal for their own use; and in most cases the bootlegger's say-so was sufficient proof to satisfy the poor-board members, most of whom were ordinary townspeople and, for reasons of their own, more or less anti-company. Then, too, the local courts were strongly disinclined to sentence these offenders; and when they sent them to jail, the wardens soon turned them loose. Here and there the companies blew up the bootleggers' holes, but, as the depression continued, for every hole they blew up three or four new ones immediately appeared. Also, town and county officials cautioned the representatives of the various companies that unless they allowed the jobless to operate their holes, taxes would have to be increased to pay for more relief, and some of these higher taxes would be levied on the coal mines. Thus the companies were forced or induced to "tolerate" the bootleggers, and bootlegging—not only digging, but selling as well—came into the full light of day (as in Centralia a year before) in Shamokin, Mount Carmel, Ashland, Treverton, Kulpmont, Shenandoah, Girardville, Mahanoy City, Tamaqua, Lansford, Coaldale, Pottsville, Lykens, Tower City, Reinerton, Valley View, Hegins, Donaldson, Tremont, Branchdale, Minersville, Heckscherville, Brackville, Gilberton, Middleport, Port Carbon, Williamstown, William Penn, Big Mine Run, Lost Creek, and other towns and villages in the southern section of the region.

In 1931 most of the coal distributed by the bootleggers was sold within twenty-five miles of where they had dug it. Much of it was delivered in sacks in the back of the bootleggers' flivvers or in small trucks hired for the purpose. That year the whole illegal output probably did not amount to more than half a million tons. In 1932, with unemployment reaching a new high, the number of bootleggers at least doubled once more and their output and business probably trebled. In the same year, it is estimated, around a thousand men, mostly young men and boys just out of high school, sons of bootleg miners, acquired second-hand or new trucks on the instalment plan by paying one, two, three hundred dollars down, and bootleg coal began to be sold as far as fifty, seventy, ninety miles from the holes.

Since bootleg coal was peddled at a price anywhere from one to three dollars cheaper than regularly mined coal, there was great demand for it, and after a high pick-up in the last half of 1932 the business got into full stride in 1933, and today, as 1934, the fifth year of the depression, is about to amble off, there are in the anthracite region around 5,000 holes or tiny coal mines in places where coal is near the top of the earth, operated six days a week, each by from two to five men who, in most instances, have no other equipment than picks, shovels, dynamite, a lamp, a pail, and a hoisting rope; while 10,000 or more such holes already have been "robbed out." In a single town, Shamokin, about 3,500 men and boys are busy every day of the week but Sunday illegally digging and transporting coal. In Mount Carmel their number is close to 2,300, in Shenandoah approximately the same, and so on. In the entire region of 500 square miles which stretches from Forest City in the northeast to Shamokin in the southwest we have from 15,000 to 20,000 men and boys thus occupied, more than two-thirds of them being in the southern field, where bootleg mining is favored by geological conditions too complicated to be explained here. The total number of trucks hauling bootleg coal from the holes to the consumers is between 3,500 and 5,000, and from two to three men earn their living on each vehicle.*

Most of the miners and truckers are heads or members of families; so it is safe to estimate that 100,000 men, women, and children are directly dependent for their livelihood, solely or mainly, on bootleg coal, while indirectly nearly everybody in the above-listed and several other towns and villages benefits from bootleg coal. Bootleg coal, in fact, is the chief basis of economic life not only in Centralia, which I have mentioned, but to a lesser extent also in Shamokin, Mount Carmel, Shenandoah, Girardville, Mahanoy City, Tremont, and at least a dozen other communities. Even Pottsville and Hazleton wouldn't be the lively cities they are without bootleg coal. The amount involved in the bootleg coal business in 1933 is estimated to have been between $30,000,000 and $35,000,000, while in the last twelve months the illegal miners and truckers have "stolen" from the anthracite companies' lands from four and a half to five and a half million tons of coal, involving between $40,000,000 and $45,000,000; and most of this money stayed right in the communities where the miners and truckers reside, and was spent and respent there.

In other words, bootleg coal is big business; only no one engaged in it makes big money. Through the year few bootleg miners and truckers average more than $2.50 a day. The huge total sum involved in the bootleg industry is spread out very thin. It benefits enormously, not privileged individuals, as does the so-called legitimately mined coal, but the communities and the region as a whole. It keeps stores, banks, movies, restaurants, drinking places, gas stations open. It enables business people to employ help and buy advertising space in local newspapers. And so on.

Naturally, then, nearly everybody in the towns where bootleg coal has become an established industry is very much in favor of it. I interviewed hundreds of persons, and practically no one free of connection with a coal company had anything to say against it. I spoke with scores of bootleg miners and truckers, and the following are some of their statements: "We gotta live, don't we? . . . There's no work for us in the collieries with their new machines and new ways of doing things. We must do something! . . . In this town 75 per cent of the mine workers are unemployed. The relief we're supposed to get isn't half enough even for food; how about rent, light, gas, and water, clothes and tobacco? And we're entitled to a glass of beer once in a while, ain't we? Our kids and women want to take in a movie now and then. Also we gotta pay our union, lodge, and church dues. . . . As for the 'stealing' part of it, how did the different companies get their coal lands? In some cases they paid $6 an acre; was that a fair price? In other cases they stole it from the Indians. Was that a nice thing to do? Well [laughing], we're the new Indians, taking what coal we can back from the companies. . . . We 'steal' coal in order to keep from becoming thieves and hold-up men, which, to keep alive, we probably would be forced to become if we didn't have these holes."

The storekeepers with whom I talked were unanimous in saying that, as far as their businesses were concerned, bootleg coal was a lifesaver. Most of them burned illegal coal in their homes and stores. The chief of police and a city councilman of Mount Carmel were unreservedly in favor of bootleg coal. An editor of the Mount Carmel Item remarked that while the paper was neutral in the matter, he had no hesitation in saying that but for bootleg coal he might not have a job. Other newspapermen expressed themselves similarly. An officer of the state police, when I asked him what his force was doing to protect the company's property rights, smiled and shrugged his shoulders; for Governor Pinchot's administration in Harrisburg has been decidedly friendly to the bootleggers.

* Some of the above, as some of the following, figures may be disputed. No accurate statistics are available, of course. The figures are a compromise between the bootleggers' exaggerated idea of their strength and the more moderate estimate of the company officials.

The bootleg towns are preponderantly Catholic; so, feigning concern for the Eighth Commandment, I approached several parish priests, some of whom, I had heard, were accepting church dues in the form of bootleg coal and were using it to heat their churches, parochial schools, and parish houses. All declared that the Eighth Commandment had no bearing on coal bootlegging. The so-called bootleggers, they said, had as much right to the coal they were digging as the companies. Besides, most of the bootleg holes were in places where the companies would never have bothered to take the coal out anyhow—which is true. Father Weaver, the rector of a parish in Mount Carmel, said that should the companies employ armed force to clear their lands of illegal miners, and should the men in such a case decide to fight, he would be unable to restrain himself from getting into the battle on their side. "Some of them," he went on, "are my parishioners; honest, upstanding working people. I'm proud to be their priest. It is absolutely untrue that this bootleg coal situation is having a bad effect on the bootleggers' characters or that, as the companies say, there have developed in this town 'other rackets' in connection with, or as a result of, bootleg coal. Coal bootlegging has no bad moral effect on the people. It keeps them from starving and turning into criminals. . . . Let the companies give the men work in the collieries and illegal mining will cease at once. The men are not bootlegging because they like it. They risk their lives every minute they work in those holes, and deserve everyone's respect and admiration. They have mine."

They have mine, too. In fact, after I saw them work in and around their holes, my respect for the human race in general went up several notches. The sheer "guts" and stamina necessary to sink and work a bootleg coal hole is all but incredible. Imagine a hole in the ground, barely wide enough for a man to let himself down in, usually vertical, sometimes cut into living rock, anywhere from twenty to a hundred feet deep, with just sufficient room at the bottom for the miner to sit or kneel and work his pick and shovel and sticks of dynamite. Personally, I would rather do anything than start and operate such a hole; but then, of course, I am not a miner in extreme economic circumstances, nor a miner's son with mining in his blood and no chance of regular employment. It takes two, three, or four men from two weeks to two months to sink a hole and reach the outcrop, after which they usually strike coal. Working mainly on hunches, they very often find no coal, and all the terrific labor is in vain. When they find it, two, three, or four men produce about as many tons a day, hoisting the stuff to the top of the hole with rope and buckets, then breaking it, often with hammers by hand or chunk against chunk, and cleaning and sorting it also by hand, unless they have a primitive breaker and shaker either at the hole or behind their houses in town. The work is back-breaking and extremely hazardous. Most holes are inadequately timbered and cave-ins are frequent, trapping or crushing the men below. Sometimes the ground at the bottom of the hole, where the man is knocking or blasting out the coal, sinks away from under him and he tumbles into the flooded cavern of some worked-out mine, and that, of course, is the last of him.

Everybody who knows anything about the conditions under which bootleg coal is produced respects and admires the bootleggers, and often considers them heroes; and this—together with the fact that the whole thing is so typical of this resourceful, highly individualistic, anarchic, and fantastic America of ours—operates to create public sentiment strongly in favor of the illegal miners, quite apart from the economic benefits that this curious industry brings to the communities. Even a company official said to me: "Those fellows take such gosh-awful chances that in a way they're entitled to that coal."

The coal is sold to truckers who come to the holes at from $4.50 to $5.75 a ton, depending on the quality and on whether it is stove or nut. The truckers have either direct customers of their own in Philadelphia, New York, Baltimore, or wherever they take it, or agents who get the orders for them from housewives and landlords. Delivered, say, in Philadelphia, Newark, or New York, the coal sells from $8.50 to $11, or a dollar or two cheaper than regular coal. The agent gets from 25 to 75 cents a ton commission. The bootleg coal usually is not as clean-looking as regular anthracite, but actually most of it is quite as good. Demand for it continues to exceed production, and everywhere in the southern section of the region I saw trucks waiting for loads at the holes. Production, however, rises steadily; and if nothing drastic is done by the companies or the state to stop it, the business is likely to continue booming in 1935.

Most of the coal now being "stolen" from the bootleg holes, as already suggested, would never have been touched by the companies who legally own the lands. It would have been too uneconomical for them to mine it. Much of it was left over by regular mining operations. Only in a few places—Shamokin, for one—are the bootleggers tapping big veins, which the owners eventually would strip and get out with giant steam shovels. So in most cases the regular operators do not object so much to the coal being "stolen" as to its being sold so successfully in such large quantities; for between 5 and 10 per cent of all anthracite sold in the United States these past two years was bootleg. That is serious competition, cutting deeply into the profits of the operators and distributors. In view of the fact that the whole law and order apparatus, the moral forces, and most of the general public opinion favor the bootleggers, the operators can do little about it at the sources of bootleg coal, now that the thing has been allowed to develop as I have described it. In Shamokin, early in December, the Stevens Coal Company tried to start stripping operations on the so-called Edgewood Bootleggers' Tract, where 1,700 illegal miners eke out their livelihood, but the men promptly dynamited the steam shovel and told the company employees who brought it up to beat it. No one has been arrested for the deed. At Tremont, two months ago, more than a thousand bootleggers faced about fifty company police, and a battle was averted only by the withdrawal of the police. At Gilberton not long ago the automobile of a coal-and-iron cop was dynamited after he had blown up several holes. The Philadelphia and Reading Coal and Iron Company's private police blew up, between the first of January and the last of November of this year, 1,196 holes, but in that time at least 4,000 new ones were started on their properties. During the same period the same company caused the arrest of seventy-seven bootleggers, but in vain. No jury in any anthracite county is ready to convict anyone for "stealing" or trucking coal.

So lately the desperate operators and distributors have been spending vast sums of money and no end of energy and legal and public-relations talent to ruin the bootleg coal business in Philadelphia, Newark, and elsewhere by telling the public, through the newspapers and otherwise, that bootleg coal is a heartless racket run by a few wise guys who exploit thousands of men, women, and children; that bootleg coal is dirty and otherwise inferior; that bootleg truckers deliver short weights, and so on. In Philadelphia the authorities were induced to invoke against the bootleg coal truckers old ordinances regulating weights and truck traffic which had not been enforced against the regular coal dealers and truckers for years. Upon the highways in New Jersey the state police are induced to arrest bootleg truckers for transporting stolen goods, and there have recently been instances of heavy fines and jail sentences. But so far all these efforts of the companies have had no serious effect on the virility of the bootleg-coal industry. What other measures the companies will think of, I don't know. Certain it is, however, that they will do everything possible to regain the market that bootleg coal has taken from them. Much will depend on the attitude that the incoming administration in Harrisburg will take toward the problem. Governor Earle will probably be inclined to follow the Pinchot policy of friendliness toward the bootleggers, for in the last election they showed themselves to be a political power; but it is possible that the new Lieutenant Governor, Tom Kennedy, who is also international secretary-treasurer of the United Mine Workers—which organization in the anthracite region is essentially a collection of company unions and therefore anti-bootlegger—will try to prevail upon the highest authorities in the state to help the companies bring about a showdown on the matter and drive the bootleggers out of their holes.

Meantime the bootleggers are organizing to protect what they call their interests. In Shamokin I attended a meeting of the Independent Coal Producers at which I was given to understand that, while eager for peace, they were ready to fight "for their right to live." The same is true of organizations in the Tremont district and in Mahanoy City, where not long ago Congressman-elect James Gildea spoke at a meeting of 400 bootleggers called to protest against the dynamiting of a number of holes by the companies. Mr. Gildea, who is a Coaldale man, declared he was with the bootleggers. They had been instrumental in electing him. Several illegal miners said to me: "If they close our holes, we'll gang up on their collieries and close them."

The bootleggers are so strong that in all probability no drastic action will immediately be taken against them. The thing probably will go on for quite a while. It will be full of possibilities, however, chiefly in the direction of violence; for in the anthracite region dynamite is plentiful, while labor-trouble service agencies are urging the companies to fill the holes with light poison gas, which would stay in them for months and sicken the bootleggers who attempted to work them.

At the end bootleg coal probably will peter out, as do most things in America. Here and there groups of bootleggers already are coming to terms with the companies and are beginning to pay them royalties on every ton of coal they dig. I met company officials who felt that eventually the New Deal might come to their aid. The federal government might take the surplus populations in these towns and transfer them to the land—to subsistence homesteads, of which there has been talk for some time.

Some of the radical intellectuals who have visited the region to the contrary notwithstanding, there is no revolution in coal bootlegging. Most of the bootleggers are anti-Communist, and the few, very few, radicals I met among them told me that bootlegging is largely responsible for the fact that there is almost no real radicalism, no movement of any size, in the southern anthracite towns. Coal bootlegging is nothing more or less than a depression industry. But eventually it may have some slight revolutionary importance. This "stealing" on such a grand scale in open daylight unquestionably causes hundreds of thousands of people—not only the bootleggers—to contemplate private property rights with less awe, and the eventual nationalization of coal mines possibly will come a bit easier and faster because of it.

White-Collar Strike

By H. K.

Milwaukee, December 27

FOUR weeks ago, in a stinging rain, picketing began in the first large white-collar workers' strike of the New Deal. After weeks of futile advances to the Boston Store management, more than 600 of the store's 1,000 employees struck. The pickets are still marching, the strike is still on, though the United States Department of Labor and the national, regional, and local labor boards have done their utmost to stop them, though the A. F. of L., through its state officers and counsel and a personal representative of William Green, has urged them to give in to terms of defeat. A victory, all sides agree, will lead at once to higher wages and better conditions in other Milwaukee stores, including the Gimbel Brothers and Sears Roebuck chains; a victory will be the beginning of the abrogation of the vicious national retail code with its starvation wages. Defeat for the Boston Store strikers may easily kill the efforts of all store employees to better their intolerable conditions for years to come. None know these truths better than the employers. Through their widely circulated daily and weekly papers the powerful mercantile interests of the country are exerting the pressure that no doubt led to the sending of numerous peace emissaries from Washington and Chicago. Locally the other large stores have aided their stricken competitor against the common enemy by furnishing him with lists of extra employees and closing their eyes to price chiseling.

Needless to say, the local press has given the management the benefit of all doubts. Such news items as the throwing of stink bombs that routed customers and an amazing march through the store of thirty women shoppers sympathetic to the strikers were not mentioned. The all impor-

The N. A. A. C. P.

(National Association for the Advancement of Colored People)

"defended" him into a life sentence

George Crawford, a Negro, today is serving two consecutive life terms. He was convicted of the murder of two Southern women, because Charles Houston, of the N.A.A.C.P., his lawyer, betrayed him. Crawford's innocence might have been established through alibi witnesses — but Houston refused to call them. There was strong suspicion that another man had compelling motives to commit the crime—Houston refused to press the investigation in this direction. An appeal from the conviction might have resulted in a reversal of the verdict of guilty and the establishment of Crawford's innocence—but Houston refused to take the appeal. Why? . . . Read the complete, detailed story of

The Truth About the Crawford Case

by Martha Gruening

IN THIS WEEK'S

NEW MASSES

□ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says □

ANYTHING GOES. Alvin Theater. Victor Moore as Public Enemy No. 13 in a No. 1 musical revue, with Ethel Merman at her best.

GOLD EAGLE GUY. Morosco Theater. How a ruthless superman built a shipping empire on the West Coast. Excellent production by the Group Theater of a forceful and picturesque drama, with a fine performance by J. Edward Bromberg. One of the best dramas of the season.

EVA LE GALLIENNE and the Civic Repertory Company. Broadhurst Theater. For two weeks beginning Christmas night Miss Le Gallienne is offering her colorful production of Rostand's "L'Aiglon."

MERRILY WE ROLL ALONG. Music Box Theater. One of the outstanding hits and very good indeed if you don't mind having your serious plays use a little staycomb in their hair.

SAILORS OF CATTARO. Civic Repertory Theater. The third and much the best offering by the Theater Union, which goes in for plays with a revolutionary purpose. This one is all about a mutiny on board an Austrian man-of-war, and it is first rate as a play, quite aside from the red-flag waving.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR. Maxine Elliott's Theater. Tense but grim drama about a fiendishly perverse child, who is played with extraordinary force by Florence McGee. One of the most-discussed plays of the year.

THE FARMER TAKES A WIFE. Forty-sixth Street Theater. Picturesque and remarkably engaging comedy by Frank Elser and Marc Connelly about the great days of the Erie Canal.

VALLEY FORGE. Guild Theater. Maxwell Anderson's entertaining drama about George Washington, with Philip Merivale as the Father of His Country. The whole thing seemed very pleasantly theatrical to me, but there are many who take it more seriously without liking it any the less.

WITHIN THE GATES. National Theater. Sean O'Casey's poetic and symbolic morality play about the Dreamer, the Bishop, and the Young Whore in Hyde Park. According to many good critics it is the great modern play, but I found it a bit pretentious.

tant news that the federated trades council had placed the Boston Store on the unfair list got only a paragraph at the end of a long statement by store officials, copied from their advertisement in the same issue. Moreover, this blacklisting, though it was announced on Saturday, did not see print until Monday, when the store's advertisement also appeared.

In spite of the overwhelming forces against them, the strikers have to date been surprisingly successful. Their vigorous picketing utterly ruined the store's Christmas trade. Its officials admitted a drop of 30 per cent in sales from the same period of last year—this at a time when other Milwaukee stores were piling up huge increases over last year.

The attitude of the store management has been provocative; its statements have been uniformly distorted or untrue. It began by furnishing a list of all strikers to the police and instructing new employees to report to the police at "the least sign of disturbance." In a full-page advertisement it falsely stated that the international of the clerks' union had outlawed the strike, and boasted that it was paying the full $14 a week code minimum to all full-time employees. The League of Women Shoppers, a group organized independently to aid the strikers, called a meeting to tell the public the strikers' side. About eight hundred persons attended. Mrs. Victor L. Berger was chairman. Eight strikers told their reasons for walking out. Income-tax reports were quoted showing that in 1933 four officials of the store received salaries and dividends totaling $149,000. Strikers said they were living better on county relief than they could on their salaries.

The strike is in fact a strike in behalf of all store employees against the miserable retail-trade code, written by the powerful interests, administered by all-employer boards, approved by the government, and upheld by a press which depends on the good-will of the big stores.

A Rubber Election

TAKING its stand beside automobiles and steel the tire and rubber industry has refused to comply with a recent decision of the National Labor Relations Board calling for an election of collective-bargaining representatives. Ordered by the board to submit payroll figures and other data for a secret election, the Firestone and Goodrich rubber companies petitioned the federal Court of Appeals at Cincinnati to review the order. The companies challenge not only the constitutionality of the board but also the right of Congress to create such a board; and company attorneys have admitted that the fight will be carried to the Supreme Court if necessary. The arrogance of the rubber barons has not been lessened by the quality of A. F. of L. leadership in the industry. On the theory that union objectives could better be obtained through an election, a strike has not even been threatened. The union has avoided taking any aggressive step as an organization apart from government help, in spite of the horrible examples of Weirton and Houde. At the same time a staff of corporation lawyers is preparing further court action to "protect" the company unions in case the petitions are denied, promising more delay. Meanwhile active membership in the A. F. of L. unions is said to have dropped to about 30 per cent of the 18,000 previously reported. With the seasonal increase in production now beginning, the companies will undoubtedly further weaken the unions by replacing old employees with "raw" labor from the hills of the Southern states.

Books and Drama

Nada and "Diamat"

Literature and Dialectical Materialism. By John Strachey. Covici-Friede. $1.

THE title of this lecture by Mr. Strachey is much more ambitious than anything in its contents justifies. As an informal application of the Marxist thesis to various pressing contemporary concerns—the challenge to culture under fascism, the increasing contradictions of the capitalist system, the predicament of modern literature in general and of certain modern writers in particular—the lecture possesses those qualities of personal persuasiveness which have made Mr. Strachey the most popular exponent of Marxism in the English-speaking countries. But order, in the sense of a concentrated development of a particular subject, it does not possess; and one may best describe Mr. Strachey's lecture as a series of variations on the Marxist theme. You will look in vain for any intensive treatment of the precise relations between the two topics announced in the title. The reason for the lack of concentration on these relations is, of course, not hard to discover. Literature, being one of the most complex of cultural manifestations, is always extremely difficult to define both as to its nature and to its function. And dialectic materialism is a phrase which has come to be used so loosely nowadays that it is no longer clear how much it is supposed to cover. Like so many others, Mr. Strachey embarks on the discussion of a relationship the exact meaning of whose separate terms he has not taken enough trouble to determine in his own mind. And the result is only the addition of a little further confusion to a subject which is perhaps doomed to a certain degree of confusion always because of the complexity of the conceptions with which it has to deal.

The primary confusion in Mr. Strachey's lecture arises out of the problem of the function of literature in any culture. For the most part Mr. Strachey, like so many other writers devoted to the cause of proletarian revolution, is inclined to claim at once too much and too little for literature. He seems to claim for it a social function of the greatest importance, that of stating and clarifying the best interests of society in any time and place. At the same time he seems unaware of its possible function, like that of every other form of art, of serving as a corrective to dogma by breaking through the too sharply defined patterns of experience set up in every time by every dogma. For Mr. Strachey, most of the time, the value of a literary work is to be discovered through some more or less explicit statement of a conscious attitude or point of view, usually of a politico-economic nature. From among Archibald MacLeish's voluminous poetic works he chooses for illustration "Frescoes for Mr. Rockefeller's City," that one of this poet's compositions, namely, from which something like a social point of view, however mixed and emotive, may be detached. And to match the fascist implications of this poem Mr. Strachey turns to a very poor lyric by that young English poet who is most likely to become the Rupert Brooke of the present generation. (In both examples, it may be remarked, the inferior quality of the poetry as poetry is a direct consequence of the too self-conscious enunciation of the point of view.) Naturally, the problem of literary judgment is much simplified by this peremptory reduction of literature to social statement. It becomes merely a problem of deciding on which side of the line, to use Mr. Strachey's phrase, a writer is to be placed: Stephen Spender is ipso facto a better poet than Archibald MacLeish. If the statement of a dogma is the principal function of literature, the orthodoxy of the dogma becomes the sole question. It is only when Mr.

Strachey comes to a more fully developed literary personality like Ernest Hemingway that he is forced to recognize that the critical problem may not be so simple. Once again he turns to a rather rare and uncharacteristic lapse into abstract statement on the part of his chosen author. The work quoted from is the short story A Clean, Well-lighted Place in the volume "Winner Take Nothing," in which appears the now celebrated meditation on death which concludes that all is "nada y pues nada y pues nada y pues nada y pues nada." Of course this is offered, and rightly so, as an expression of the essentially pessimistic view of life underlying all of Mr. Hemingway's work. (That this is a philosophical rather than a politico-economic view, however, Mr. Strachey willingly enough admits, although he feels compelled to invoke some far-fetched hypotheses to dispose of it.) But a little farther on, after extolling the method of criticism employed by Granville Hicks, Mr. Strachey comes straight to the heart of his embarrassment. He is forced to admit that Mr. Hicks, despite the excellence of his devastating analysis of Hemingway's nihilism, has left something out. Mr. Hicks has failed to recognize Hemingway's "power to create adequate images for his own nihilism." The trouble with Mr. Hicks's type of criticism is that "he hardly seems to pay enough attention to the merits of writers as writers." Here is the most striking admission of the inadequacy of the critical criteria which Mr. Strachey himself has been using throughout his discourse. Here it is that he seems to be most clearly setting up an unresolvable dualism between the writer as spokesman of a doctrine and the writer as writer. When does the writer throw off the one role and assume the other? Is there, or is there not, any inherent connection between his "merits" in the one role and his merits in the other?

The source of the confusion is, as a matter of fact, to be found in a very much earlier passage in which dialectic materialism is mentioned first as "one part of human culture," next as a "cultural system," and finally as a "new synthesis." Leaving to one side the question of how something can be a part of a whole and that whole itself at one and the same time, one wonders whether the error does not really consist in a too easy use of the word culture. Is it justifiable, even in strictly Marxist terminology, to refer to dialectic materialism as a culture? In such an orthodox Marxist commentator as Nikolai Bukharin, for example, dialectic materialism is always referred to as an angle, a method, an approach—never as anything more concrete than a point of view. It is an intellectual instrument for describing, analyzing, and predicting the processes of cultural change. But it is never represented as being in itself a culture, that "superstructure" which arises out of the periodic equilibrium of economic forces in the history of a people or of a civilization. If this is an accurate definition, literature and dialectic materialism have only the most remote and indirect relations with each other. "Diamat" (as the term has become abbreviated in the Soviet Union) has always to be applied first of all in the realm of social and economic change—the substructure, according to Marxist dogma, on which all cultural forms are ultimately founded. It must be used to bring about a reorganization in that realm before a culture in which writers are able to function as writers is possible. The two processes—the one of political and social revolution, the other of individual creation—are not unrelated at the present time. But they are not coincident in time, and the attempt to represent them as such is not very helpful either to revolution or to literature. In the European past, literature has shown itself to be the child rather than the companion of social revolution—and usually a very backward child. It is a mistake to believe that its growth can be accelerated by artificial means.

WILLIAM TROY

The Drama of Peru

Fire on the Andes. By Carleton Beals. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.

MEXICO and its resurgent Indianism having for some time been the happy hunting ground of archaeologist and ethnologist and then the vogue of American tourists, it was inevitable that the public would be invited to gaze on Peru. The analogies are well known and striking. It too boasts ancient cities, pre-Columbian village cultures, Inca handicrafts, pisco as ardent as tequila, mightier mountains, jollier jungles, mystery more entrancing, valuta! And—tip to the adventurous—whom the casinos of Cuernavaca and the comforts of Chapala begin to cloy, the Inca revolution is still to come, is mayhap imminent. One can fly to Lima in three days.

No one is better qualified than Carleton Beals to make this first comprehensive analysis and survey of contemporary Peru. Written with brilliance and verve, his book conveys the color, the intense contrasts, the cruelty and beauty of the land. Like Gaul, Peru is divided into three parts: the rainless Pacific coast fringe, where scorching aridity shrivels life; the bleak Andean "fortress of a race of quartz men," of crags and condors, rising into the eternal snows, land of the llama; and east of the continental divide the vast equatorial forest through which the melted snows of the cordillera tumble to form the headwaters of the Amazon—the "Green Hell," jungle land of the deadly maraquita tree, of poisonous flowers, snakes, insects, and arrows, of naked cannibals and plumed head-hunters.

This physiography, the variations of climate, the lack of inter-communication have done much to shape the destiny of Peru. But no less important is the ethnic basis of Peruvian history; four centuries after Pizarro it is still the land of Mochicas, Aimaras, Quechuas, Cholos. It is they who, Mr. Beals predicts, will rise against the rule of the "corrupt Creoles" to form "a great unique mountain-tropic culture." Mr. Beals suggests ample justification for such a revolt. Peru is "yet to become a modern state." Its "agriculture is more deficient . . . than under the Incas." Its governments have been "corrupt, inefficient, unpatriotic, unjust, and most stupidly tyrannical," and the land, he asserts, is "held to golden exploitation by ignorant landlords, brutal soldiers, rapacious priests, and degenerate politicians." Lima, the coastal Creole capital, "is still dawdling in the Porfirio Díaz epoch in Mexico," while "all Andean Peru is in the coils of the cocaine vice." A dark picture, unrelieved by heroism, devotion, sacrifice, intelligence, or effort. Not once during Peru's hundred years of independence, asserts the author categorically, has a really noble figure arisen to revindicate the rights of man. Not since the Incas has Peru had a really important national hero, a leader to strike a path to new freedoms.

Will Raul Haya de la Torre, founder and leader of the A. P. R. A. (Alianza Popular Revolucionaria Americana) prove to be such? Mr. Beals expresses doubts, although he declares him to be "the outstanding popular figure of all Latin America." But his program Beals deems "too comprehensive . . . opportunistic, bureaucratic, hybrid . . . based on petty-bourgeois reforms with slight collectivist tendencies." Mr. Beals further condemns the A. P. R. A. as "essentially middle class" and asserts that "its nationalistic emphasis gives it a fascist complexion." With the unfavorable connotations of this verdict, the reviewer takes issue. Whatever may be the shortcomings, actual and potential, of the A. P. R. A. movement, it is a counsel of perfection to imagine any attempt at revolution or reform in Peru that will lack these or greater weaknesses. Aprismo, as Mr. Beals recognizes, is "the most vital popular force in Peru." Its leader, Haya de la Torre, is high-minded, courageous, steadfast, enlightened. Since he has repeatedly risked his life for his cause, it is scarcely to be wondered that his followers idolize him. He himself has fought against the personalism involved in their worship of him—which is inevitable in Indo-Hispanic America—and has sought to erect his sorely needed reformation of anachronistic Peru on a basis of principle and program. Intellectually and morally he is far ahead of his contemporaries. And his compromising of the A. P. R. A. program, which Mr. Beals censures, may be, given the herculean dimensions of the task, the practical realism of a statesman and patriot who has long since ceased to be doctrinaire. Apra under his leadership may fail, but if it does so, there is scant prospect for anything but tyranny or chaos in Peru during our generation.

ERNEST GRUENING

Was It a Needless War?

The Eve of Conflict. Stephen A. Douglas and the Needless War. By George Fort Milton. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

MR. MILTON'S full title suggests his threefold purpose. As "The Eve of Conflict" his book is a detailed and lively history of American politics in the decade immediately preceding the Civil War; as "Stephen A. Douglas" it is the definitive biography of the great Illinois statesman; and as the "Needless War" it is the defense of a thesis which seems to me open to serious objection.

Those familiar with Mr. Milton's masterly presentation of the Reconstruction Era in his "The Age of Hate" will not be disappointed in expecting the same qualities of exhaustive research, skilful arrangement of material, incisive style, and sustained movement of narrative in his treatment of the fateful decade preceding the outbreak of the war between the states. The period has been treated by scores of historians, and it would probably be rash to say that Mr. Milton has put any of its outstanding events, such as the Kansas-Nebraska Act, the Le-compton fraud, or the disruption of the Charleston Convention in a new light. Nevertheless, his access to tens of thousands of unpublished Douglas manuscripts has enabled him to supplement our knowledge of these events with many facts hitherto unknown. He is able, thanks to the exploitation of a vast amount of new Douglas material, to make more precise the contacts of Douglas with other influential men of the era, and to measure the impact of Douglas's views upon the politics of the era with a fulness of detail impossible to the previous historians of a decade in which Douglas, by general consent, was the most conspicuous political figure.

As a biography Mr. Milton's book clearly supersedes all the former lives of Douglas from James Sheahan's to Allen Johnson's and Louis Howland's. Not only does the material put at his disposal by Douglas's grandsons and by the descendants of such intimate coworkers with Douglas as Charles Lanphier, editor of the Illinois State Register, furnish the author with documentation for many a hitherto uncertain or disputed point in Douglas's public life, but it also tempts him at times to let loose a perfect spate of footnote references to authenticate some statement of quite minor import as to Douglas's looks, dress, or personal habits. Yet the biography marches with the history in close lockstep. It is the Douglas of "The Eve of Conflict" on whom Mr. Milton wishes to fix our attention. The ancestry, birth, early years, and meager education of the Vermont lad are passed over in a few hasty pages. There are no chapters on Douglas as state's attorney, member of the legislature, Secretary of State, or justice of the Illinois Supreme Court. There is little on his two terms as Congressman from Illinois or on the first half of his first term as United States Senator (1847-1850). But from 1850 to his death eleven years later Douglas is revealed to us with a completeness which leaves no thought of his unexplored nor any least political move unprobed.

But Mr. Milton's book is something more than an objective history of the decade of the fifties or a disinterested biography of Stephen A. Douglas. It is a warm indorsement of Douglas's contention that the acceptance of the doctrine of non-interference by Congress with slavery in the territories would have silenced the extremists both north and south of Mason and Dixon's line and so prevented the "Needless War," or at least would have prevented the war from coming as soon as it did—which is a rather embarrassing concession for Mr. Milton's thesis. We can readily agree that no war is "inevitable" in the sense that an earthquake or a tidal wave is inevitable. The question is whether Douglas's remedy could have prevented this particular tragedy. I think it extremely doubtful for several reasons. In the first place, Douglas failed to understand the strength of the moral opposition of the North to the extension of slavery. He laid that opposition to Abolitionist hysteria at first, and in its later manifestations to the base and selfish determination of the Republican leaders to make profit for their party out of the misery of their country. He was himself opposed to slavery, as he frankly confessed on many occasions, and he had declined his father-in-law's gift of a Mississippi plantation as a wedding present. But having no objections to others holding slaves wherever the majority of the community approved it, he did not perceive the rapidly maturing conviction, outside the South, that slave property, to quote James Truslow Adams, was "an anachronistic form of property, as obsolete as marriage by capture."

In defending what seems to me Douglas's anachronistic position Mr. Milton says: "Most of the party leaders realized that Popular Sovereignty had a firm hold on the hearts of nine-tenths of the American people." If this was so, it is very difficult to understand why the majority of the voters, North and South, rejected it in 1860. Mr. Milton also says: "In their interchanges on the House-Divided doctrine, it was Douglas, not Lincoln, who read the future aright." But it seems to me that the "future" vindicated Lincoln's prophecy completely. The proposed Thirteenth Amendment of 1861 made slavery inviolable in the states where it was protected by law; the actual Thirteenth Amendment, adopted in 1865, made the nation all free soil. Did Douglas or Lincoln, then, "read the future aright"?

One would like to ask the shade of Douglas many questions touching the efficacy of his doctrine of Popular Sovereignty to quiet strife and preserve the Union. If a geographical line of demarcation between slave and free, like the Missouri Compromise line, would only serve to perpetuate sectional hostility, as Douglas maintained, what prospect was there that such hostility would be cured by permitting the very institution which caused it to go into any territory of the United States? Douglas insisted that slavery restriction was excluded from the power granted Congress by the Constitution "to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory . . . belonging to the United States." The Free Soilers insisted on the inclusion of slavery restriction in that power. It was a difference of interpretation. How could Douglas rightly reiterate that his view was "constitutional" and his opponents' not? To maintain his position that the Negro was "property," Douglas declared in a speech in Chicago (July 9, 1858) that the Negro must never be given "social or political or other equality" with white men. Yet he acknowledged that the State of Maine had a perfect right to give the Negro the vote. The truth is that Douglas's doctrine raised more difficulties than it settled, and he resented the discovery of those difficulties. I do not question his sincerity. I simply believe that he was wrong.

Although Mr. Milton, in my opinion, has not made out a case for the efficacy of Douglas's proposed doctrine of Popular Sovereignty to prevent the "Needless War," he has given us a most interesting and valuable volume on the fateful decade of the fifties, and by far the most complete portrait of its most distinguished figure.

DAVID SAVILLE MUZZEY

Lloyd George Continues

War Memoirs of David Lloyd George. Volume IV. 1917.
Little, Brown and Company. $4.

HAVING flayed the British admirals in his third volume for their pessimistic obstruction to proposals for dealing with the submarine menace, Lloyd George now takes to task the British high command, especially Haig and Robertson, for their fatuous optimism in undertaking the Flanders offensive in the fall of 1917.

This "futile, fantastic, and dangerous" venture, as Foch correctly characterized the Paaschendale campaign many weeks beforehand, fills more than a quarter of this fourth volume and is its central theme. And Lloyd George seems to have an even better case against G. H. Q. than against the Admiralty. He shows that while the plan was under discussion much essential information was withheld from himself by Haig and Robertson. He and the rest of the Cabinet were not told that Foch and Pétain disapproved of Haig's plan. They were not informed of the extent of the French mutinies which made the French, after the failure of the Nivelle offensive, decide that they had better avoid any more costly offensives on the western front until the Americans had arrived in force. Concealed also were other essential facts, notably the wet nature of the terrain which would be churned by the artillery preparation into a frightful morass of mud, impassable to man and even more impassable to the tanks which were expected to operate. Had Lloyd George and the Cabinet been fully and frankly informed of all these things, they would never have consented to the "muddy and muddle-headed venture." But Haig and Robertson, safe in G. H. Q. far from the trenches, and encouraged by the adulatory reports of their staff, were so optimistic and confident of hurling back the Germans and winning Ostende and the Belgian coast, that the politicians yielded—with misgivings—to the military experts. The disastrous consequences of the "Campaign of the Mud" were the frightful and futile loss of life, the rejection of an Italian offensive which might have cracked up Austria or at least prevented Caporetto, and the weakening of the morale of the British troops before Ludendorff's terrible drive in the spring of 1918.

In the remainder of his volume Lloyd George treats very interestingly and lucidly of other important aspects of 1917: the creation of the British Air Ministry, the Stockholm conference, labor unrest and electoral reform, the peace moves of Sixte de Bourbon, Kühlmann, and the Pope, the successes in Turkey and the disaster of Caporetto, and the much-needed steps toward securing unified Allied supreme command.

As Lloyd George and M. Poincaré were the dominant political figures in their respective countries, one inevitably compares their memoirs. The contrast is striking. The Frenchman gives a dry, diary-like record, primarily devoted to domestic French politics. Where he touches an international question like the secret Sixte de Bourbon negotiations, he takes it up and drops it a dozen times, following the scattered notes in his journal. Lloyd George, on the other hand, writes with a wide sweep envisaging many lands. He skilfully gathers all he has to say in well-grouped chapters, which may overlap chronologically but which bring to a clear focus the irresistible course of interlocking events. Whether his memoirs, like those of M. Poincaré, will run to ten volumes, it is too early to say. But if they do, and if he keeps up to his present level, he can count on eager readers to the end.

SIDNEY B. FAY

An Interesting New Poet

Thing of Sorrow. By Elder Olson. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

ELDER OLSON is an interesting lyric poet chiefly because of his rhythms and his use of sound as texture. By means of a short, rather breathless line and great facility in the use of the caesura, he states over and over again his main theme: that beauty lies in change, in the quick shift of something caught at and lost. This beauty of change is especially ■ sensuous beauty. The mind considers it but cannot really fathom it; the senses touch it lightly and let it go. Each flickering image is therefore a thing of sorrow. And principally by his rhythms the poet conveys just this mood.

Mr. Olson is ■ little too facile. He is also, now and then, amazingly imitative. One lyric in this book is almost ■ replica in thought and even in imagery of one of Archibald MacLeish's best-known lyrics. And in other poems one catches echoes. Mr. Olson's range is not great. He does not achieve Miss Adams's sure leap into the very heart of mystic truth or beauty. He is best when he flutters, as it were, just over the heads of such poets as take their full inspiration from sensuous and earthly beauty and just below the true mystic. He is a mystic in so far as this can be said of any modern thinker who is aware of the Bergsonian philosophy of fluctuating emotions and shifting ideas. Technically Mr. Olson knows what he is doing. His images, his language, his turn of line and phrase show ■ command of forms. Particularly is he possessed of ■ fine ear for word sounds. His own line, "Make of no thing but breath," almost exactly defines his art. He lacks fiery or complete intensity. He is now and then a bit literary. He is best when he deals with the exact perceptions of youth. We judge him to be young himself since he is so preoccupied with impermanence and its sorrow. Elder Olson is worth reading and worth watching.

EDA LOU WALTON

Unemployment Insurance

A Program for Unemployment Insurance and Relief in the United States. By Alvin H. Hansen, Merrill G. Murray, Russell A. Stevenson, and Bryce M. Stewart. University of Minnesota Press. $2.50.

THIS book shows a growing clarity of thought among the students of unemployment insurance. A previous volume by the two senior authors had proposed ■ system of unemployment insurance which carried with it plant and industry reserves instead of ■ state-wide pool, and which in order to provide forty weeks of benefits imposed a waiting period of no less than eight weeks. In the period which has elapsed the authors have had further time to mull over the whole problem, and they have now essentially come over to the fundamental tenets which certain of us have been expounding for a number of years. Thus they now see that separate plant reserves on the Wisconsin model will result, in ■ period of depression, in ■ gross inequality of benefits. For since a depression hits some industries far more severely than others, it will reduce reserves and hence benefits in greatly varying degrees. The authors, therefore, in the present volume favor the state-wide pool with uniformity of benefits which the Ohio Commission advocated and which the American Association for Social Security is fostering.

Secondly, they now see that insurance can only break the first impact of ■ depression, and following the example of Belgium, Switzerland, Germany, and England, they favor the establishment of ■ system of state-financed emergency benefits which will supplement unemployment insurance when the standard benefit period is exhausted. The addition of this feature, caring as it does for most of prolonged unemployment, justifies the authors in now reducing their suggested standard benefit period from forty to twenty-six weeks and in shortening the waiting period from eight weeks to four. This plan of limiting the burden which the insurance system as such can carry and then explicitly providing for supplementary aid from the state cannot be too highly commended. It may not be inappropriate, however, to mention that the authors are not, as they seem to suppose, the first in this country to advocate such a plan, since almost precisely the same idea was developed at some length in my "Standards of Unemployment Insurance," and should indeed have been evident to anyone who has watched European developments with any care.

One of the best features of the book is Mr. Hansen's discussion of the problem of transferring funds from periods of prosperity to those of depression. With several others I have for several years stressed the importance of this issue and have urged that it be met (1) by investing approximately nine-tenths of the reserves accumulated during prosperity in government bonds, and at the same time neutralizing ■ possible credit expansion by placing the remainder in ■ sterilized hoard of cash, (2) by issuing Federal Reserve or Treasury notes upon the bonds during periods of depression in order to pay benefits and expand purchasing power at such times without being compelled to sell the bonds on ■ difficult market. Mr. Hansen suggests various possibilities but does not seem to be definite in his preferences.

Taken as a whole, the book is to be commended for its open-mindedness and deserves to be studied by legislators and insurance experts. It is, of course, a personal pleasure for those of us, including I. M. Rubinow and Abraham Epstein, who have advocated these policies for ■ number of years to find the logic of events bringing to us in increasing numbers such clear-headed students as the authors of this excellent work.

PAUL H. DOUGLAS

The Nineties

The Age of Confidence. By Henry Seidel Canby. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

IN a brilliant historical study, "The Rise of the City," Professor A. M. Schlesinger of Harvard University points out that in the eighties and nineties of the last century the United States trembled between two worlds, one rural and agricultural, the other urban and industrial. In the span of those years the fateful decision was made: an urban-industrial America, one more akin to Europe, triumphed over its former traditional, rural-agricultural self. Yet, infers Dr. Canby in "The Age of Confidence," many individuals have come to think of the nineties as nothing more than "a bad, small-town joke." Such a notion is untenable, of course, as any capable historical work on that period will demonstrate. But if those same skeptics need further evidence of the falsity of that view, they may find it in "The Age of Confidence." These personal essays, which recapture in full tone and rich color life in upper-class Wilmington society in the nineties, through the boyhood and youth of Mr. Canby, confer the feeling that life in those days had an almost spiritual significance.

The closing decade of the nineteenth century in America was an age of confidence, writes Dr. Canby, because "for the last time in living memory, everyone knew exactly what it meant to be an American." Security and confidence were the two dominant chords of those years and were centered in the family and business institutions. All the forces of life—in society, education, religion, politics, even on the more intimate plane of sex and marriage—were derived from that stable, unifying nucleus.

... a tradition of decorum, responsibility, and friendliness blended with a stuffy respectability to make society. . . . [But] our society was dying, or rather it was rapidly changing from one consciousness to another. Tradition was fading with dignity, soon our little world was to become more promiscuous, more amusing, and less friendly, much more expensive . . . in a community growing year by year more commercialized, more cutthroat in competition, speculation was beginning to dominate industry.

Breakdown was imminent. Scientific method began to give new color to life. Mothers and fathers no longer feared the hell fire which their parents had instilled into them, and it was only logical that their children, the new generation, should reflect the transformation.

Quakerism was dead. . . . The fire had gone out of Episcopalianism and Presbyterianism, but they made up in respectability what they had lost in fervor. . . . As for the Baptists and Methodists, they belonged to the plain people, lesser breeds without the law we would have said if Kipling had written the verse in time for us.

The business empire, too, of Wilmington, Delaware, was firmly established. But it had always been a local business community. Thanks to its Quaker background, no predatory captain went forth to conquer America. Even such opposing forces as the blue-coated army of propagandists of Henry George and the notorious Addicks, a captain of industry, were prevented by the populace from using the disproportionate representation of Delaware for their own ends in Congress. Addicks failed "chiefly because he did not know how to buy votes like a gentleman." Big business, however, was not to be stopped. Rockefeller, Gould, Hill, and Carnegie, individualists of unparalleled energy, "were killing individualism for the benefit of their private purses, reducing anarchy to order and chaos to form, in unwitting preparation for a new social order." And almost overnight, when the need for explosives for the World War became more urgent, Delaware, the home of the du Ponts, experienced a tremendous boom and permitted itself to go wild in a mad orgy of speculation "which when it ended had swept away the whole fabric of society as I had known it."

Two factors distinguish Dr. Canby's exceedingly valuable work from the staid, sterile volumes of memoirs which constantly make their way to the reading public. First, he does not employ the narrow, moralistic Quaker vocabulary of the nineteenth century to decipher class differences but uses a modern, full-blown, economic lexicon. Second, he has not written "The Age of Confidence" with a nostalgia for the past. It is dedicated to his sons and is written as though for the whole younger generation today.

ERIC ESTORICK

Shorter Notices

Aleck Maury, Sportsman. By Caroline Gordon. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

This novel about a Southerner who loved fishing quite as much as he did the Greek and Latin languages, or his wife, is more than a technical achievement to be admired for the manner in which it makes use of a thousand details pertaining to the angler's art. It is also, and even more interestingly, an account of one man's wise and quiet way of life. The author cannot be unaware, though she nowhere insists upon the point, that her hero is possessed of a secret which to most modern persons is unknown—a secret which makes it possible to live with dignity, serenity, and form. The sense of this is communicated by Caroline Gordon through the moderation with which Aleck

Maury always speaks, for the book is written in the first person; and if at times this moderation disappoints a reader who has decided to expect spleen or petulance, or the tattered passions which flap in the pages of many a contemporary Georgia or Mississippi fable, such a reader is compensated by the whole vision which he learns to share with Aleck Maury. This is clearly one of the most distinguished and beautiful novels to come out of the South in recent years, and as a document supporting the Southern Idea—if it is that at all—it is worth tons of polemic literature, agrarian, libertarian, unreconstructivist, or what not.

The Yellow Bell: Brief Sketch of the History of Chinese Music.

By Chao Mei Pa. Published by the Author at Barberry Hill, Baldwin, Maryland. $1.25.

Authentic data on Chinese music is so hard to find in America that this little book by a Western-trained Chinese musician should be well received. Chao Mei Pa is a recent graduate and laureate of the Royal Conservatory of Music in Brussels. Before that he taught at the University of Shanghai and conducted native choruses in China. He is therefore well equipped to review the story of Chinese music. He has done a fairly good job within prescribed limits, and his brief book is a trustworthy introduction to the subject if not an adequate discussion of it. The yellow bell is the first note of the Chinese musical system, fixed about five thousand years ago. Even at that early date every musical sound bore a poetic and symbolic meaning. The author points out the many misconceptions of the West regarding Chinese music, among them the false appellation of the pentatonic scale as applied to all Chinese music. A well-illustrated chapter deals with Chinese instruments, classical and popular, and points out Japan's instrumental debt to China. Other chapters contain expositions of Chinese music in the theater, folklore, and religion. The author sees a resurgence of a new national school in China, fortified by but not subservient to Western theories of music.

An Introduction to Sex Education. By Winifred V. Richmond. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

This is a simple and satisfactory book meant for use as a text for students in colleges and nursing schools. It treats the subject in both its biological and social aspects, and the presentation is reserved but thorough. In addition there are excellent bibliographical references indicating to teachers and general readers a wide range of fuller studies.

Drama

A Brilliant Comedy

SOME fifteen theatrical offerings descended upon New York during Christmas week. At the present writing I have been able to do my duty by only a few, but so far at least I give first place to the new piece by S. N. Behrman which the Theater Guild has produced at the Golden Theater under the title "Rain from Heaven." It is not exactly a comedy, if by that term one means necessarily a play whose sole purpose is to be amusing or even one in which all the conflicts are resolved through the benign offices of rationality, but Mr. Behrman is still our best comic writer in the sense that no one else can write with quite his combination of intelligence and suavity. No one else so persistently avoids the cliché or so consistently mints his gold anew. The curse of comedy is the tendency of its wit and its "sophistication" to become mere convention, of its "wisdom" to seem something merely borrowed instead of achieved.

But Mr. Behrman's plays are fresh because even when the point of view is the point of view of all comedy it seems to have been arrived at by the genuine processes of a fresh and active intelligence.

In retrospect one realizes that the theme of the new play—even, indeed, the situation—is surprisingly similar to that of "Biography." Again we have a wise and clever woman brought into conflict with two men each of whom is capable of a certain fanaticism incomprehensible to her, and again it is her perception of a basic incompatibility which separates her from both. Yet "Rain from Heaven" is by no means the same play as "Biography," and it is different not merely because the concrete embodiments of the situation are entirely different but, more importantly, because the problem has become more acute and the issue more pressing. In the earlier play neither the Communist nor the "practical" politician can be taken too seriously, for the simple reason that both are operating in what is nearly a vacuum, and the discords between them are discords of temperament and ideology alone. But in "Rain from Heaven" another sort of crisis is nearer. The scene has been moved to England and to an atmosphere charged with the possibility of proximate conflict. One of the chief male characters is a popular American hero being exploited by his brother in the interests of a vague fascist scheme; the other is a German refugee. Thus one comes face to face with tangible results brought about by the two opposing temperaments; and if the heroine elects again to remain to some degree "above the battle," there is here, as there was not in "Biography," a very real battle to remain above. For this reason the action which begins on the level of pure comedy grows steadily more tense, and the last act, while still managing not to violate comedy's necessary allegiance to common sense, achieves real power in the drunken confession of the financier and the determination of the refugee to return to participate in the conflict he had once thought no business of his.

As in "Biography" there can be no doubt where Mr. Behrman's own sympathies lie. It is safe, I think, to assume that here also the lady speaks for him. But the situation is no longer quite so clear, and the refugee makes out a much better case for himself than either of the men in the earlier play was able to do. While you are trying to understand your enemy, he says, that enemy will kill you—unless you kill him first. And to this the lady can only reply sadly that it may be so but that her kind will, nevertheless, not perish utterly; they will somehow survive the storm, and when the storm has passed they will be there ready to play the only part they are fit to play—that of helping to reestablish the only kind of world really worth having.

"Rain from Heaven" is produced and acted with the intelligent skill it merits. Philip Moeller's direction is extraordinarily sensitive, and all the parts are beautifully played. Jane Cowl, especially, has not been seen to such good advantage in years, and John Halliday gives an extremely ingratiating performance in the role of the refugee.

Another notable opening of the week was Katharine Cornell's production of "Romeo and Juliet," which, to begin with, answers successfully the two simple questions which I always ask first of any Shakespearean production: Does it escape the curse of "elocution," and is it or is it not predicated upon the odd Victorian assumption that all except the mightiest of the tragedies are pretty almost to the point of cuteness? Fortunately Miss Cornell has proceeded upon the correct assumption that the persons in "Romeo and Juliet" are Renaissance Italians when they are not Elizabethan men or women, and that the poetry of the play is the poetry of hot impulses amazed at their own almost unbearable intensity. The action proceeds with a headlong swiftness which carries the audience along with it, and pictorially the production is beyond criticism with its characters swaggering in gorgeous raiment against a background sufficiently stylized to suggest how, in this youthful play, the burning reality of Shakespeare's emotion manages to assert itself in a tale not wholly detached from the artificiality of the conte upon which it is based. As for Miss Cornell's own very striking performance, I think that it owes its great effectiveness more to the eloquence of her movements and gestures than to her delivery of the lines, which is clear and intelligent without being in itself noteworthy. Brian Aherne is admirable as Mercutio until he comes to his most famous speech, "A plague o' both your houses," when he proceeds to succumb so rapidly to his wounds as to be well-nigh inarticulate. A dying actor should never be so far spent that he cannot recite his lines.

Miss Ina Claire's vehicle, "Ode to Liberty" (Lyceum Theater), is entertaining enough in a mild way without showing her off to the best advantage. Ostensibly a political satire on the revolutionist tamed by luxury and love, it turns out to be only a rather conventional version of the old story of the romantic woman who takes the fugitive under her wing, and the fact that the hero is a Communist instead of (as is more usual) a burglar does not greatly affect the nature of the comedy.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

P. S. Since the above was written, "Accent on Youth" (Plymouth Theater) has revealed itself as a romantic comedy distinguished by its remarkable verve. It will be reviewed next week.

"Kykunkor," the extraordinarily colorful African "opera" which first appeared in New York City last spring, has returned for another engagement at the auditorium on top of the Chanin Building. It was reviewed at length by Lincoln Kirstein in our issue of June 13. It has some remarkable dancing in which Harlem and Africa merge with rather startling ease. As Mr. Kirstein remarked, no one who has a genuine interest in "sudden, occasionally very intense, and never very perfect demonstrations" should fail to see it. The fact that this African demonstration takes place on the fiftieth floor of a skyscraper somehow heightens its effects.

M. M.

Contributors to This Issue

GERHARD COLM is a member of the graduate faculty of political and social science of the New School for Social Research of New York.

EDITH ABBOTT is dean of the School of Social Service Administration at the University of Chicago.

M. B. SCHNAPPER is associated with the Committee on Economic Security.

LOUIS ADAMIC, who came to America from Yugoslavia and began life here as a steel worker, is the author of "Dynamite, the Story of Class Violence in America," and "The Native's Return."

H. K. is a Milwaukee free-lance writer.

ERNEST GRUENING, chief of the Division of Territories and Island Possessions of the Department of the Interior, has long had a special interest in Latin America. He is the author of "Mexico and Its Heritage."

DAVID SAVILLE MUZZEY is graduate professor of American history at Columbia University.

SIDNEY B. FAY, professor of history at Harvard University, is the author of "Origins of the World War."

PAUL H. DOUGLAS, professor of industrial relations at the University of Chicago, is the author of "Standards of Unemployment Insurance," "The Theory of Wages," and other authoritative works in the field of economics.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXL

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 16, 1935

No. 3628

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	57
EDITORIALS:
The New Deal of Lower Wages	60
A Year of LaGuardia	61
The Rome Agreement	62
The New Crusade	62
ISSUES AND MEN. SOME VESTED INTERESTS. By Oswald Garrison Villard	63
OUR UNREAL BUDGET. By R. G. S.	64
THE POWER CRISIS. By Frank P. Walsh	65
SECURITY VERSUS MATHEMATICS. By Maxwell S. Stewart	67
THE MENACE OF HUEY LONG. II. A MONARCH IN PAJAMAS. By Raymond Gram Swing	69
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	72
CORRESPONDENCE	72
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	74
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
Not Fit to Print. By Norman Alexander	75
Labor Notes	77
BOOKS AND DRAMA:
Tugwell Explains the New Deal. By Stuart Chase	78
Germany's Psychosis. By Ludwig Lore	79
Report on the Universe. By Harlow Shapley	79
The Old South and the New. By Benjamin B. Kendrick	80
Study of a Family. By Leonard Amster	81
Shorter Notices	82
Drama: Life Keeps Going After Fifty. By Joseph Wood Krutch	83

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RAYMOND GRAM SWING

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

PURISTS in the use of the word "inflation" will agree that the real news of the President's budget message is that we are embarked on a fairly long experiment with inflation by the unbalanced budget. We have tried to inflate by the expansion of bank credit without success. We now are trying the less orthodox method of the government spending more money than it receives in revenue. If this does not stimulate business and raise prices, the direct method of increasing currency alone remains. The President's optimistic forecast of last year that the budget would balance in 1936 is not only incorrect; it is so incorrect that one must wonder that minds in Washington can change so completely in such a fundamental matter in a brief year. The deficit in 1936, by the President's admission, will be about four and a half billions, an improvement on the estimate for 1935 of less than half a billion, and the best to be hoped for the future is a slow decline in deficits over a long number of years. The increase to the national debt will be correspondingly large, but this appears to us less serious than it does to professional calamity howlers. With interest rates low, and probably destined to remain low for a long time, the larger debt can be carried without great hardship. We do not, however, look with complacency on the President's delay in tackling a social tax reform. A deficit for inflationary purposes may be advisable, but it ought to be accompanied by stiff taxes on all who can bear them, lest the easy-going idea become part of our nature that a nation can spend and spend without in the end having to foot the bill. The last resort of the financially lax is to go in for currency inflation. Social taxation will make many enemies for the Administration, but it is a far better expedient and should not be delayed.

JUST AS THE PRESIDENT was over-optimistic about balancing the budget in 1936, we believe he is unrealistic in expecting to have 3,500,000 employables at work by the fall of the year. A final $880,000,000 for relief is being asked; henceforth the workers on relief projects are to be financed out of the $4,000,000,000 which Congress is expected to authorize for this work. The President has closely defined the kinds of projects on which this money is to be spent. Most of them have a familiar ring, and we see no reason to expect records to be broken in getting them under way. The action of state and local authorities will be needed on many if not most undertakings, and there will be long preliminaries in acquiring land rights and even in moving vast numbers of the unemployed to the scene of work. The country is so accustomed to large figures that it does not dream of the difficulties in the way of transferring a million or two adults to new centers, or appreciate the hardship to family life that this will entail. Nor does it appraise the obstacles in the way of spending four billion dollars. The sum is about three times as great as was estimated for the present fiscal year for all public works and emergency conservation work. Obviously the President does not intend to intrust the expenditure to that personification of slow motion, Secretary Ickes, but according to Washington accounts will promote the dashing and able Harry Hopkins to the new office of spender-in-chief. Mr. Hopkins can move swiftly, but even his celerity, we believe, will not succeed in "abolishing the dole" this year. If he has two million employables at work by next spring he will have reason to be satisfied.

HASTY PRECAUTIONS were felt called for by Democratic leaders in the new Congress to keep its unwieldy majority in line. The once "liberalized" House rule, which gave 145 members the power to force a debate and vote on any measure, has been restored to its feudal form, and now only a majority can call a bill out of committee. This shuts off the little Republican minority, but it shuts off as well the groups believed to be entranced by such panaceas as the Townsend Plan. While Washington political experts agree that the President will have no trouble in dominating Congress, they allow themselves the inconsistency of predicting the passage of the bonus, possibly even over the President's veto. Obviously it is still too early to make any logical forecast about Congress. We are comforted by its independence in asserting itself about the bonus, though we could supply a long list of measures which would make a more creditable demonstration of defiant democracy than this piece of class legislation. The session has hardly begun, and intimations already are heard of the President's impatience to have it end. April is the month he appears to have in mind. But there is no need for haste except in passing the security legislation, which must get out to the state legislatures in a month if there is to be any insurance paid out by 1936. All the other major legislation—and no more formidable program ever confronted a modern Congress—deserves the most conscientious debate, and we should consider it a sign of maturity if Congress decided to devote the rest of the year to its work.

LEFT-WING OPPOSITION to the President's program for social security was effectively dramatized by the National Congress for Unemployment and Social Insurance, held in Washington, January 5-7, immediately following Mr. Roosevelt's message. Sponsored by a broad united-front group, the congress was attended by approximately 2,250 delegates, drawn from 40 states, and representing 867 trade-union locals and 202 professional groups, together with more than 400 organizations for the unemployed, and a scattering of church and fraternal groups. Certain sessions drew an attendance of close to 5,000, among whom were a fair number of Administration officials. The congress went on record as favoring a federal scheme of social insurance, supported by a tax on incomes over $5,000 and on inheritances, which would give benefits to all unemployed workers over sixteen years of age regardless of the cause of unemployment or of race, sex, citizenship, or political belief, and would provide compensation equal to the average wages which workers could earn if permitted to work in their normal occupations. To this end it indorsed the Workers' Unemployment and Social Insurance bill recently introduced by Congressman Lundeen, subject to certain revisions to broaden its scope. While the Lundeen bill stands little chance of coming up for a vote at the present session of Congress, pressure for its adoption on the part of labor and professional groups should materially strengthen the hands of those seeking to liberalize the Administration's program.

WHEN the Secretary of the Interior goes to the trouble of passing a special general order refusing PWA funds to any municipal PWA administrator who holds any public office in his municipality—an order designed for the sole and particular reason of getting Robert Moses out of his job as chairman of the New York Triborough Bridge Authority—the spectacle is plain embarrassing. Before this, Mr. Ickes had been venting his dislike for Mr. Moses, and for Mr. Moses's recent campaign for Governor of New York on the Republican ticket, and for Mr. Moses's unkind remarks about the NRA, merely by withholding funds required by Mr. Moses in the administration of his Triborough Bridge job. Now the Secretary has gone farther, and lèse majesté—as was the case recently when Donald Richberg cracked down on the Saturday Evening Post—has become a cardinal sin in the United States; you'd better not call our boys bad names, because if you do, you'll be sorry. It does not seem to matter to Mr. Ickes that Robert Moses has admirably reorganized and is efficiently administering the Triborough Bridge Authority, which is so closely related to his other work as Park Commissioner that to associate the two has saved the City of New York a considerable amount of money. Nothing matters except "our boys," and the most competent Park Commissioner New York ever had has put himself on the wrong side of the fence. It seems impossible to believe that after the proper kind of protest, which Mr. Moses can be expected to make with the hearty backing of Mr. LaGuardia, President Roosevelt will not wish to intervene. General Order 129 might have been considered as Postmaster Farley's kind of politics. It is now Secretary Ickes's kind. We hope it will go no higher.

FURTHER TENSENESS has developed in employer-employee relations in the steel industry and is likely to result in a serious flare-up within the next few months. On December 31 the Steel Labor Relations Board ordered government-supervised elections in the Carnegie Steel Company plants at Duquesne, Pennsylvania, and McDonald, Ohio, which together have approximately 6,000 employees. In order to establish the eligibility of voters at such an election, the board asked the company for its payroll records. This the powerful United States Steel subsidiary refused, contending, as it has maintained all through the hearings and negotiations, that it questions the constitutionality of the Congressional resolution which created the board, and therefore the board's jurisdiction in this matter. The immediate result of this refusal will probably be two sets of litigation. It is expected that the board will ask Pennsylvania and Ohio federal district courts to subpoena the payrolls. Meanwhile on the basis of the fiction that the contest is between the inside and outside unions, the company union has already filed a petition in the Circuit Court for an order restraining the board from holding an election, on the ground that legal elections were held last June, when company-union representatives were duly chosen. In either case, a long-drawn-out legal battle, familiar to steel workers through the Weirton case, will begin all over again.

RANK-AND-FILE LEADERS are determined not to wait upon the courts but to take matters into their own hands. To this end they have outlined a series of tentative plans. The American Federation of Labor will be asked to send organizers into the field immediately. This request is scheduled to be acted on by the A. F. of L. executive committee at a meeting in Washington on January 29. A call has been issued to coal, automobile, glass, and aluminum workers to meet with steel workers in a joint conference in Pittsburgh on February 3 to plan a program of concerted action. Early in March the Amalgamated itself will hold its international conference, and according to the more militant element, "no one will talk us out of action this time, unless the Steel Institute comes to its senses in the meantime." This program will undoubtedly encounter almost as much resistance from the old-line leaders as from industry itself. The usual cry will be raised that the few existing contracts cannot be broken and that "reds" are behind the whole move.

THE CARL MACKLEY HOUSES, the first self-liquidating, labor housing project in the country financed by PWA funds, were opened and dedicated in Philadelphia early in January by the American Federation of Hosiery Workers. This apartment block of 284 units has justifiably attracted great attention. In the first place, it is sponsored entirely by organized labor, with no realtor-agent-broker complications. Secondly, it is based on an exhaustive study of housing and wages in the city, and provides modern apartments, cross-ventilated, well-lighted, and fully equipped, for about $10 per room per month, including heat, light, and refrigeration. Thirdly, it is a notable step in the Administration's slum-clearance program, the first of eight low-rent housing projects to reach completion. And, finally, it is not merely an apartment house but a model community, with playgrounds and nurseries, swimming pool, auditorium, solarium, tennis courts, and meeting and rest rooms. The government holds a first mortgage on the property, and the $1,039,999 PWA loan is to be liquidated in thirty years. Named after a youthful hosiery worker killed in a strike and representing all that is best and most progressive in organized labor, the Mackley Houses are a tribute to the hosiery workers' union, and a challenge to labor the country over to seek improved living conditions.

THAT EXCELLENT NEWSPAPER the New York Times, with its correspondents and connections in all parts of the world, merits especial credit for having unearthed a new authority on the Soviet Union. For the past few weeks readers of the Times have been given their Soviet news via the London Daily Express and its energetic Warsaw correspondent, who appears to be better posted on developments in Russia than any of the regular correspondents in Moscow or Leningrad. From this source we learn, for example, of the outbreak of anti-Jewish riots carried on "in the spirit that animated pre-revolutionary pogroms," of the arrest of eight professors from the Marx-Engels Institute, and of the exile of Zinoviev and Kamenev to the frozen regions of the Far North. The Express correspondent also seems to have obtained a copy of a personal letter which Zinoviev addressed to Stalin, protesting his innocence. Not to be outdone by its sensational rival, the London Times, through its Riga correspondent, dug up a story that six Soviet radio officials had been dismissed on the ground that they had permitted Paul Robeson to sing "Steal Away to Jesus"—and this also was reprinted by the New York Times. True, most of these reports were duly denied on the following day; but who cares about denials? Meanwhile, dispatches from the regular American correspondents in Russia continue to report that Soviet heavy industry more than fulfilled its plan in 1934, that the Soviet Union has recently attained first position in the world in iron smelting, and that the grain crop of the past year, despite the drought, exceeded the record made in 1933. Dull though these reports may be to those who have been predicting the early collapse of the Soviet system, we trust the Times, in its enthusiasm for its recently discovered source of news, will not dispense altogether with its Moscow correspondent.

THE CRIMINAL-SYNDICALISM trials in Sacramento are getting under way in true California fashion. On December 15 headlines appeared in the Sacramento papers to the effect that the Communists had threatened death to jurors and to the District Attorney. The story revealed that eighteen men had appeared at the home of a prospective juror and told his wife that they represented the International Labor Defense, which is defending the case, and that they would kill her husband if he accepted jury service and voted guilty. They added that they had already killed eleven people and would kill many more with machine-guns. That morning in court Judge Lemmon conducted an investigation of the fantastic story. Mrs. Nick, the woman involved, was called to the stand. Under the examination of Leo Gallagher for the defense, she told a convincing story of the visit of the eighteen men, but certain significant details seemed to cast doubt on their claim to represent the I. L. D. They were, she said, well-dressed, drove good cars, and were middle-aged, a description which seems to fit vigilantes, or even gangsters, more snugly than Communists. The doubt grew when Mr. Gallagher put the District Attorney himself on the stand, and brought out through sharp questioning the fact that Mrs. Nick had telephoned the District Attorney immediately after the visit; that instead of bringing the matter up in court he had asked her to come to his office, and without so much as an attempt to investigate, had her tell the story to newspaper reporters. In the course of the examination, in which the judge also asked questions, the District Attorney admitted that he was having jurors "shadowed," and in explaining his actions contradicted himself and became much confused. The liberal and radical press should keep the full light of publicity upon the Sacramento trial, in which the Communist Party and the agricultural overlords of California are the real contenders.

HOLLYWOOD, which deals only in superlatives, has nailed up another record. According to the report of five actors appointed to formulate under the NRA a program of fair practices between producers and players, the movie industry has the lowest ethics of all. The following brisk paragraph is the theme of the report which has been submitted to the administrator for the moving-picture code:

The actors have exhausted every effort to agree with the producers on working conditions. They have been tricked, hamstrung, and lied to. Every dishonest practice known to an industry the code of ethics of which is the lowest of all industries has been resorted to by the producers against the actors.

The all-star committee headed by Robert Montgomery then presents a review of the Horrors of Hollywood. Some 80 per cent of Hollywood's population is barely able to keep alive on the scraps they get from the industry's table; excluding extras, 71 per cent of the actors who worked in 1933 earned from less than $1,000 to $5,000, and only 12 per cent earned from $5,000 to $10,000; by contrast six producers and studio executives earned $1,546,342; actors get only 1½ cents out of the movie-goer's dollar; and the committee's report of the hours and conditions of work might well dampen the great American ambition to become a movie star. We are sorry we cannot report either the triumph of virtue or a happy ending in this latest production from Hollywood. In fact, the review ends on a line that might have been inspired by Karl Marx, who has always got a very bad press. Having pointed out that the actor is paid only on the basis of results, the committee states:

There is apparently no penalty for failure for a motion-picture executive. The same group of men who have taken millions of dollars out of the American public through their manipulation of the motion-picture business are still in control. With few exceptions they have never contributed anything . . . to the advance of the art. Yet these same men arrogate to themselves a despotic feudalism over the working conditions of those who actually make pictures, creating talent.

The New Deal of Lower Wages

WE neither share nor understand the approval which has greeted the President's falsely described intention to abolish relief in America. The approval is what we should have expected and joined in had the intention been carried out. A gigantic works program which would give every unemployed man and woman work at standard wages would have been an undertaking worthy of the mandate bestowed on the Administration in the November election. The President, for reasons beyond our conjecture, has not been stimulated by that tremendous challenge to his courage, and the program he offers is not the abolition of relief, but the creation of a new form of relief, work at low wages. This is bad enough for those who to save their families must now donate part of their services to the state. It is still worse for labor in private employment, for the strongest impetus is now given to reduce wages in private industry. The government will be setting up a scale of low wages for work that is done for higher wages in private employment. Where there are two scales of wages for similar work the lower rate in the end prevails. Organized labor, even with the strongest defensive forces of collective bargaining, cannot long withstand such an economic fact. Since under the New Deal collective bargaining is yet to be realized, labor can offer no resistance. The skilled trades will not be affected at first, but common labor will suffer almost from the outset, and ultimately the entire nation is doomed to drift to a lower standard of life. Under capitalism, with the government frightened of replacing a paralyzed private initiative, this may be the inevitable evolution. We believe the country wanted to be done with relief for the obvious reason that work is infinitely better than charity. But we do not believe it wanted the government to pay depressed wages. It even looks to us as though the White House had in preparation the kind of plan which had been awaited, a great and worthy national project, and this had been scuttled at the last minute by influences hostile to the further expansion of the government in business. Omit the lower wages, increase the appropriation to a realistic figure, and the President's message would be an epoch-making pronouncement. Inject the issue of lower wages and we are perilously near to the pre-New Deal inhumanity of the Hoover days.

What in effect is it the President now says to the unemployed? "If we give you cash or market baskets without requiring you to work full time it undermines your morale. Henceforth you shall work full time on a government job at less than standard wages for the good of your character." We know many in comfortable circumstances who will welcome such a puritanical punishment of misfortune, since they need the excuse that the poor are being penalized for their own good. Nor do we deny that the unemployed in most cases will be thankful for a larger annual income for their families whatever the price. They would be just as thankful for larger cash payments. They do not see that the country is being pushed toward lower living standards under the pretext that their souls will be saved. Sooner or later it will dawn on these people that while they are not permitted to get something for nothing, the government, in taking their full time at less than standard wages, is not above such immorality. We have heard only one argument against these objections which is not confined to the muddled thinking about morale and character building. (We do not deny that unemployment destroys morale, and undermines character, but it is unemployment, not relief, which does so.) It is argued in Washington that the worker on relief is getting a kind of insurance policy, an insured income, from the government, so that his position is safer than that of the private worker, and for this he ought to pay a premium in lower wages. This is a poor contention, but at least something can be said for it. The President, however, has given no public indication that the reduction in wages on relief work is to be anything so small as an insurance premium. If this is what he has in mind, the quicker he says so the better. But we warn him that the argument is superficial and dangerous and would set an unhappy precedent. Private employers, particularly those in steadier branches, would quickly seize upon the theme, and the safer a man's job the greater the "insurance premium" that would be deducted from his wages. The President needs no justification for paying government employees whatever their services are worth. It is the simple and honorable course, and if the President is imbued with ideas of insurance, let him look at the types in his own social program and realize that low wages does not belong among them.

Furthermore, we do not understand the President's unemployment figures. We believe he will find that considerably more than 3,500,000 of those on relief are genuinely employable. But even if his estimate is accurate, and assuming that he does provide work, indirectly, for another 3,500,000, this does not take care of all the employables in America. According to the Department of Labor, the unemployed number around 9,750,000. Deduct 1,500,000 as unemployable and 7,000,000 for whom work is to be found, and 1,250,000 are left. The A. F. of L. statistics make this number 2,250,000. Who are they? They are the unemployed whose resources or relations have kept them from reaching the relief rolls. Is it the President's philosophy that this great host, since it is not utterly penniless, does not deserve work? Is it his doctrine not only that government work is a new form of relief, but that the recipient must pass a means test? We should have expected the President to agree that unemployment and the inability to find work were the only qualifications needed to entitle a person to work for the government at this time. We trust that unemployment insurance is not to be administered with a means test, and we see no possible excuse for the government, if it is providing work until unemployment insurance gets under way, to refuse its services to those who have managed to stay off relief rolls. For the sake of this group, for the sake of honorable wages on government work, most of all for the sake of the American standard of living, we urge the President to enlarge his scheme, ask enough money to make it succeed, pay standard wages, and thus save the country and himself from the most serious mistake he has yet made.

A Year of LaGuardia

FOR a little more than a year New Yorkers, and interested persons in the rest of the country, have had an opportunity to observe a reform mayor in action. They have seen Mr. LaGuardia's vigorous temperament at its best and at its worst—he has been courageous, choleric, threatening, dilatory, rash, and always interesting. His sincerity and honesty have never once been seriously questioned.

Surrounding himself as he did at the beginning with a group of men far above the average of city administrators in public spirit and intelligence, the Mayor has seen as a result an admirable overhauling of most of the city departments, the elimination of large chunks of graft, the substitution of the fit for the unfit in important and unimportant positions. His most unfortunate appointment was surely that of General O'Ryan as Police Commissioner. The General bullied and blustered his way out of office, and in his place Mr. LaGuardia chose a man who had had years of experience in the department, who will undoubtedly administer it in an orderly, firm, and effective manner, but whose public tributes to the third degree in his orders to policemen to "muss-up" suspected criminals make him a lamentable choice for his position. While the Mayor has never publicly championed the third degree, it is reasonable to suppose that Commissioner Valentine would not have issued his order in the first place, or surely would not have refrained from modifying it after sober second thought, if any objections had been raised by his chief. Mr. LaGuardia has given plenty of assurance that his own methods of carrying on his office can be autocratic enough, even to the point of violence, and, indeed, one of the chief temperamental counts against him is that he has managed to subdue all but the bravest of his subordinates and colleagues—for example, the intrepid Mr. Moses, who is fully able to talk back to His Honor—so that around his office and outside his door there is an air of almost frightened expectancy; the lightning may strike at any time! His bawling out—there is no other word for it—of protesting emergency relief workers cannot be justified on any grounds whatsoever.

This vigorous and outspoken temper, however, has had its good moments also: for example, when the Mayor—quite unlawfully, one suspects—promised to turn off the water supplied to laundries in the laundry strike; or when he sent health inspectors into hotel kitchens during the hotel workers' strike, in an unsuccessful effort to bring the managers to terms; or when, during the taxi strike, he threatened to put receivers into taxi companies to hold tax funds if an adjustment could not be reached. His present campaign against the utility companies is direct action of the same sort. Whether or not it would be possible for the city to build, finance, and maintain its own power plant is a highly debatable question; but there is no doubt that by his promise to do just that, Mr. LaGuardia has put the fear of God into the breasts of utilities officials.

After all, however, the most important aspect of the city administration is the budget. How much money does Mr. LaGuardia propose to spend, and where will he get it? He got off to a bad start with his economy bill last spring.

This measure, which he justified on the ground of the necessity of getting money at once for an emergency, took toll of inadequately paid city employees, whose salaries had been already reduced in the interests of economy. The Nation at that time refused to join the chorus of blame for the Mayor because it had confidence that his subsequent financial program would not only repeal the salary cuts but provide a more commendable method of raising funds. Neither of these expectations has been realized. The salary cuts are still in effect, and the sales tax, that most indefensible and inequitable levy on those least able to bear it, has been imposed on the citizens of New York. In defending his acceptance of the sales tax—of which he heartily disapproves—Mr. LaGuardia again advances expediency. It had to be done. It was necessary to raise fifty million dollars for relief in 1935; the sales tax was the only way of raising funds which seemed to the bankers sound enough to lend money on. This brings us to the crux of the situation. The bankers hold the city in an iron grip, have first lien on city revenues; no matter who suffers, the bankers must get their pound of flesh. This bankers' agreement, of course, was inherited by Mr. LaGuardia from his Tammany predecessors; yet one of his most prideful accomplishments, in his account of his stewardship, is that he has lived up to it, that he has restored the city's credit, almost completely destroyed in the mad days of Jimmy Walker and the O'Brien inanities which followed. Out of a city budget of $600,000,000, $179,000,000, or approximately 30 per cent, is allocated to debt service. What if Mr. LaGuardia had announced that a fourth of this, or some $45,000,000, would not be paid; and that, rather than break its moral contract with teachers and policemen, rather than impose a tax which the poor must largely pay, the city would prefer to default on its agreement to the bankers? At the word "default" the Mayor shudders. And it is clear that to consider such a possibility is to choose between two very real evils. The credit of the city is the property of its citizens and should not be lightly threatened. In defaulting on part of his bankers' obligations the Mayor would have been obliged to establish an alternative line of credit to insure future borrowings. To this end Mr. LaGuardia himself is already proposing a municipal bank to handle refunding, at a low rate of interest, of city indebtedness as it comes due. The establishment of such a bank, bound by statute to invest, let us say, only in municipal, state, or federal government bonds—the banks which now hold the city's credit in their grip have more than 60 per cent of their investments in real estate, a third of which is in some kind of default—would offer competition to the existing banks and provide an alternative banker on whom the Mayor could call for future loans.

The question, therefore, is whether or not the Mayor took the course which was most fair and just to the majority of the citizens of New York when he adhered to the bankers' agreement at the expense of the lower-income groups in the population. He thinks he did, and plenty of estimable citizens will firmly support him in his stand. But the issue is surely debatable, not only for the present, but in the future.

The Rome Agreement

THE bargain driving between France and Italy has come to an end, and the fact, though not the details, of an agreement has been proclaimed with all the pomp this momentous event merits. The accord is certain to enhance the chances of peace in Europe. The independence of Austria is to be guaranteed by France and Italy, with the prospect that Britain and even Germany will support the guaranty. The competition between France and Italy in the Danubian countries will cease, which makes it possible at last to take common-sense measures to restore the economic vitality of Eastern Europe. The League of Nations will gain in value, since the agreement brings Italy into the Franco-British system, and the League is an integral part of that system. The unofficial résumé of the agreement speaks of Italy's accepting the French thesis that German rearmament is illegal until a general disarmament treaty is reached. This, if true, would mean an early resumption of disarmament negotiations. Also it would explain why Hitler has taken strange methods to confirm the dominance of the Reichswehr in the defense of the Reich, a possible prelude to the disarming of the Storm Troops. Thus for Europe the agreement opens far-reaching possibilities and should relax the terrible tension which has made a war in the near future seem inevitable.

What is not yet clear is whether this benefit has been bought at the expense of Abyssinia. Italy must henceforth abandon the dream of reestablishing the Roman Empire in Europe, or of setting up a great political confederation equal in importance to that of the French. This is a real setback for Fascismo, and Mussolini certainly demanded and may have obtained compensation in Africa. The agreement deals at length with the known causes of friction in Libya, Tunis, and Somaliland, and though preliminary accounts asserted that France would support Italy in the dispute with Abyssinia before the League, this is omitted in the later reports. It is the familiar technique of peace-making to strike bargains at the expense of defenseless third parties. Germany before the war was to have the gift of Portuguese colonies to satisfy its need for expansion. Italy, stimulating the increase of its population in reckless disregard of the resources of the small Italian peninsula, creates the dire need for colonial outlets. But Abyssinia cannot be disposed of by a French Premier, and Britain, with its preponderant African interests, will hardly permit it to be given away for the sake of European appeasement. Italy will probably have to be content with minor advantages there, as she must in Tunisia, where Italians are to lose their special privileges by 1965, and in the frontier rectifications of Libya and Somaliland. Mussolini, in discussing the agreement, did not hide his sense that he had not done as well as he had hoped, and the Abyssinians may find they can rescue their independence through a strengthened League. A chapter of the agreement of which hardly any mention is made is that dealing with a naval understanding, though such an agreement must have been reached. Britain will be the country primarily interested in its nature. It affects our destiny, too, since Britain will be able to reduce its navy if assured of reductions by France and Italy.

The New Crusade

AS every schoolboy knows and as most adults forget to remember, "gymnasium" means "place of nakedness." It seems, however, that a certain New York establishment recently took the name seriously, and that its proprietors, after having been convicted by a magistrate under the law concerning indecent exposure, were later acquitted by the Appellate Court on the sound legal ground that the exposure was not public within the meaning of the law. Immediately thereupon the Legion of Decency took the matter under consideration, and last week its advisory committee, meeting in the offices of its chairman, the Honorable Alfred E. Smith, drafted a proposed amendment to the law which would make it a misdemeanor for any person in any place "wilfully to expose his person . . . in the presence of two or more persons of the opposite sex whose persons are similarly exposed."

Now The Nation has never taken a firm stand on the question of nudism. It has accepted the general belief that exposure to sunshine has a therapeutic value, and it has seen no objection to the practice of certain well-disposed persons who prefer to seek health in cheerful mixed company. On the other hand, it has never been able to take much interest in general nakedness for its own sake, nor has it had much faith in the doctrine that great spiritual benefits accrue to the members of those groups who solemnly take off their clothes just for the sake of taking them off. It has believed, at least, that persons who are benefited by this ritual belong to a special class, and that the class is hardly numerous enough to make it worth while to conduct any very extended propaganda in favor of extending the practice. But neither has it ever been able to feel that nudism was a major sin of our society, or that its suppression constituted one of the chief problems of recovery. And what surprises us is that Al Smith, once a realistic statesman, should have got around to thinking that it is.

We waive the fact that Al used to be considered a liberal. Perhaps liberals do not have to be liberal where convention is concerned, and there have been, besides, a sufficient number of indications that Al is less liberal than he used to be in certain matters more directly affecting the social order. But we do wish to emphasize the fact that he used to know what was important and what was not. We seem to remember that when he was Governor of New York State he confounded his opponents by his intimate knowledge of its business and by the resoluteness with which he swept trivialities aside in order to come to the root of any matter. Is it possible that today he can think of nothing more important to do than to meet solemnly with the members of a committee which includes that great statesman ex-Mayor John P. O'Brien and then to draft a law directed at persons who like to exercise with their clothes off. Mr. Smith is among the outs. His influence has waned and he has no direct power in the affairs of the state he once governed so well. But does he really take much satisfaction in this sort of thing, and does he really believe that his great talents could find no better employment? Just how happy is the Happy Warrior fighting such battles as these? On request we shall be pleased to suggest others.

Issues and Men

Some Vested Interests

IN a recent address before the Association for the Advancement of Science, Professor Edward S. Mason of Harvard made the point that if we did not find a way of doing away with or limiting the NRA we should soon be face to face with a new vested interest which would insist on being perpetuated in its present form. He did not, he said, have in mind the Washington office force so much as those persons connected with the more than 700 codes, who would naturally resent any effort to muster them out. I took it that he was not opposed to the retention of the good features of the NRA; he was merely referring to what has long been known as the danger in such an organization—if you create a temporary government machine you must be on your guard lest it make itself a permanent part of the government and undertake to mold government policies.

His warning impressed me the more when I read that the President is awarding nearly $450,000,000 more to the army and navy in the next two years. The actual increase for the navy is less than appears, since $150,000,000 was spent by the PWA last year on ships and did not show in the budget. Surely there are no more securely entrenched vested interests in Washington today than the army and the navy. Every time more men and more officers are added to either service the vested interest in those branches of the government is strengthened and the power of their lobby is increased—a lobby which I often think is the strongest within sight of the Capitol. Of course they are always much surprised if you speak of them as a dangerous vested interest. They believe themselves to be the most unselfish and the most patriotic of all our public servants. They are convinced that when they ask for more men or more ships or weapons they are actuated solely by their expert knowledge of the country's defenses and its immediate needs. They insist that they have not the least idea of being a vested interest, that they exist only to safeguard the state; they are not the least bit concerned to build up a lobby or a machine except as they wish to arouse the country to the terrible danger it is in for lack of adequate defenses.

You can point out to them, if you please, that they have been enormously strengthening their machine for years past. "Why not?" they ask. You remind them that no army or navy officers the world over believe that they have large enough forces, and they reply that every man and woman should be in the defense organization; some even point to Mussolini's mustering of all boys at the age of eight as an example for us to emulate. If you dare to go to Congress to urge that we either do not strengthen the fighting services or actually reduce them, their anger knows no bounds. You are deliberately trying to weaken your country's defenses and to lay it open to successful attack by that dreadful enemy which is always lying in wait around the corner. If it were not Japan today it would be England, and if not England, some group of powers plotting to cross the ocean to rob us of our wealth, even if they demonstrably are without the merchant ships to move as many as 300,000 men with the huge equipment of a modern army. You cannot get these officers to see that their own advancement is so inextricably bound up with an enlargement of the service to which they belong that they cannot possibly be unbiased advocates of the policies they urge. They are part and parcel of a vast vested interest which, consciously or unconsciously, never stops seeking its own enlargement.

Thus it has always seemed to me the height of stupidity, if not insincerity, for our Presidents to send navy officers to naval disarmament conferences. They can no more be zealous for the decrease of the navy than I could be unbiased if I were told that the government had decided there were too many weekly newspapers in the country and I must sit in a conference to decide whether The Nation should be one of those to be mustered out. I might think that I was just as public-spirited as the army and navy men profess to believe themselves to be, but subconsciously I should be convinced that the New Republic and Today and the New Outlook were the ones to go. That is human nature; when our own fate or that of our profession is at stake we act pretty much alike and are not to be trusted without due allowance for our bias. I would not have any soldier or sailor sit in at any disarmament conference. It is all humbug to assert that they can tell you down to a fraction how many men can be cut, and exactly how many of each type of ship. I had far rather have inexperienced minds at work. They are not befogged by professional fads and fancies, or tied up with one of several schools of thought—navy officers are always split into cliques each advocating its own particular brand of strategy or tactics, each separately devoted to battleships, or airplanes, or dirigibles, or submarines. After all, the way to disarm is to disarm; we have had fruitless years of conferences between experts and conventional statesmen. If we are going to get anywhere, someone else must take a hand.

Instead, we go on building up what are already two of our greatest vested interests, so powerful that even our independent Senators rarely attack them. They are supported by more veteran, or semi-military, organizations than the average citizen has any idea of. Take the reserve officers' societies, for example. They have grown so fast and exercise so much influence that I am told the regulars are becoming worried about them. Behind them stands the dull-witted American Legion with its plaintive insistence upon a huge army. How surprised some of these self-appointed defenders of the Republic and the Constitution would be if they read what the founders of this government thought about a regular army! If there was anything those founders hated and feared more I should like to know what it was. But again we fling away their precepts and build up a steadily increasing militarism, backed by all the rich and privileged, by every opponent of a new and better world.

Bruce Garrison Villard

Our Unreal Budget

Washington, January 7

TODAY is budget day in Congress and I ask forbearance in making comparison with the similar occasion in Great Britain. Americans, I must say, do not know the excitement and importance that can attend a budget. Here it is not one of the prime events of the year. In England it is nearly on a par with the Derby, the Grand National, and the boat race. For two whole hours the nation is as engrossed by a matter of government as it is by a major sporting event, and for somewhat the same reason—to watch an uncertainty being converted into a certainty. The uncertainty has to do with taxation, and since anyone can be affected by a new tax or the remission of an old one, everyone is bound to be interested. Will there be something off the income tax, something on it? The taxpayer snatches a newspaper and quickly calculates whether after all he will have money enough for his vacation, or whether his car will cost more because of a change in the gasoline tax. The man who likes his little nip wants to know if the Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken a penny off the pint of beer, or added one. The business man wants more than details; is it a “good” or a “bad” budget? Will it encourage or discourage business? Because the budget contains the answer to these questions, the secret is as closely guarded as are the Crown jewels. I do not mean it is merely kept out of print until the speech is released. Not more than three men may know what it contains until its delivery—the Chancellor, the Financial Secretary of the Treasury, and the Prime Minister. When the Chancellor rises to address the House of Commons he is the personification of mystery, and he continues to keep his secret till well on to the end of his speech. Beginning with a review of the past year he talks drearily of past expenditures and receipts while the crowded House fidgets and strains after every clue. He then drags on to the estimates for the new year, still concealing whether he has a surplus or must make up a deficit. At last he reaches his summary and the secrets are doled out, one at a time, while messengers fly in and out of the tiny press gallery, and news tickers click in every newspaper office and club. The speech finished, he might walk to the nearest street corner without arriving too soon to buy an extra containing the terse summary of the secrets which he may not have shared with more than two men a quarter of an hour before. All over England these extras are being bought. For the Chancellor has his hand in every man’s purse in that hour, and everyone wants to know if it is there to give back or to receive.

No excitement like this starts the American pulse throbbing today. The American budget did not produce a single newspaper extra. People will not have asked passers in the street what is in it, or discussed it with strangers in their commuters’ trains in the evening. They will not, because the American budget is not a true budget; it is not a final financial plan affecting every citizen, rich or poor. It is a half-story, the annual statement of national accounts, and about as exciting as the bulletins on the condition of reserve banks.

Sir Willmott Lewis, Washington correspondent of the London Times, a tactful but profound critic of American institutions, loves to hold forth on the obstructions to American nationality. He does it with a gleam in his eye, like the Mariner’s when he detains the wedding guest, and makes his points with penetrating and polished rhetoric. None is more convincing than the unreality of the American budget. He tells of the day when the British House, overwhelmed by the money bills brought in on behalf of the Crown and favorites of the Crown, adopted a self-denying ordinance that no money bills should be introduced which did not have the approval of the Treasury. And he suggests what a mercy to Congress itself it would be if such a self-denying ordinance could be adopted, for then Congress would be freed of the home demand for appropriations, the need of trades, and the details of log-rolling, and could devote itself to the study of legislation. The system would not be complete without the Treasury becoming responsible to Congress, so that the Secretary, at least, would have to resign if faced with an adverse vote in Congress, with the right of appeal to the country. As it is, the American budget will never be genuine until it represents a complete financial plan, so much raised, so much spent, such and such taxes—and only these—to produce the revenue. The President can now only hope that Congress will not meddle with his financial outline. And he can only say that if it makes appropriations of its initiating it must find the revenue to pay for them. We have a Presidential budget which we know today; the Congressional budget will not be finally known until Congress adjourns.

But the argument is not all on the side of the British system. In America the President’s veto can and has obstructed the payment of the bonus, and the President is hoping it can do it again this year. Under the British system the Cabinet would resign if a majority in Parliament took the bit in its teeth and ran away with some issue like the bonus. That issue then would be submitted to the country at a general election. Thus under the British system an inflationary majority in the country and the House could have its way within a matter of weeks, and heaven and earth could not prevent it. The only reason this does not occur in England is that British radicalism does not happen to express itself in financial proposals as it does here.

In another respect American methods are superior, and though it is a minor one it is not as unimportant as it may seem. I refer to the help given by the President to the newspaper correspondents in explaining his budget. Last year and again this, he found the time to receive the correspondents and give them ample opportunity to ask every conceivable question about it. Now in England this would be regarded as stark madness. The British government always tells its news first to Parliament, and the press is somehow considered an intruder trying to cheat Parliament as the proprietor of news. I wish Neville Chamberlain, the personification of chill aloofness, might have looked in on the scene as the President talked over the budget with the correspondents Saturday. The British need to discover that the Fourth Estate can be an essential mechanism in democracy.

R. G. S.

The Power Crisis

By FRANK P. WALSH

TWO facts stand out clearly in any unprejudiced consideration of the power issue. The first is the failure of regulation to secure the low rates which make possible an abundant use of electricity in the home. The second is the effectiveness of public competition, either actual or potential, as a means of accomplishing that result. The only important question which remains is whether public opinion is going to hesitate in choosing between these two alternatives. There is today no question that the power trust favors regulation.

Five years ago, under the governorship of Franklin D. Roosevelt, the alternative was first clearly offered to the people of New York State. Widespread feeling that regulation of public utilities had broken down had led to the creation of a Commission on Revision of the Public Service Law, with three of the nine members appointed by Governor Roosevelt. From that moment the sequence is unbroken to the present day, when, under Roosevelt as President of the United States, it has become a definite national policy that the force of public competition shall be available to consumers of electricity as a protection against extortionate rates. The present Administration sees in the completely electrified home the appropriate culmination of the electrical revolution. To make this possible, rates must be reduced to the point where people can use electric power almost as freely as they now use water.

An abundance of testimony before the Revision Commission made it clear that regulation had, in fact, broken down because the utility companies had developed a procedure which rendered control of rates by the Public Service Commission impossible. Prolonged hearings before the commission were followed by even more protracted litigation, based on fantastic valuation claims, designed to sustain the right to charge excessive rates as a basis for speculation in utility securities. The cost to the people of a single such case ran to $6,000,000. And with what result? The answer is found in the testimony of an important utility executive to the effect that the companies could justify in the courts rates higher than their business judgment would allow them to charge. In spite of regulation, the companies were charging what the traffic would bear. A wide survey of existing rate schedules bore out this conclusion. Regulatory control of rates was little more than a farce, serving to delude the people.

The majority of the investigating commission, composed entirely of the members selected by the dominant faction in the state legislature, recommended that regulation be given another chance to make good, with additional powers and resources granted to the Public Service Commission. The minority, comprising the three members appointed by Governor Roosevelt, found the only assurance of low rates in the force of actual or potential public competition. Its report recommended public development of St. Lawrence power and enactment of legislation giving municipalities the widest latitude in the supplying of electric and other utility services to their citizens on a public basis.

The years since these two reports were issued have vindicated the conclusions of the minority. Regulation, though strengthened by a series of amendments to the law and by new appointments to the Public Service Commission, is no more effective than it was five years ago. Its decisions, when unsatisfactory to the companies, are still being held up by court stays, while the cost of this futile procedure is still being borne by the people either in rates or in taxes. The companies, curbed only by their fear of the growing sentiment in favor of public ownership, are continuing to charge what the traffic will bear.

Many who read this article will undoubtedly recall the opinion of Chairman Maltbie of the New York Public Service Commission in the temporary rate-reduction case affecting the electric companies serving New York City and the Westchester suburban area. Under date of August 9, 1933, he showed that during the depression years 1931 and 1932, when wages, salaries, and incomes from other sources were severely curtailed, these Consolidated Gas Company subsidiaries were paying dividends in excess of those paid at the height of prosperity in 1929, and that for the several companies dividend disbursements during the three depression years maintained an annual average ranging from 8 per cent in the case of Brooklyn Edison to 16 per cent in the case of Bronx Gas and Electric. He showed further that during these same years this group of companies earned a total of $47,982,000 in excess of a 6 per cent return on a rate base calculated to include a fair allowance for working capital. Although the commission's decision, based on this showing, called for a reduction of only 6 per cent in New York City rates, the companies promptly secured a court stay, and the familiar process of litigation to sustain extortionate rates was again under way. More recently the same companies have threatened to meet the city's attempt to force them through taxes to carry their fair share of the depression, either by litigation or by raising rates to cover the additional tax burden. Fortunately for the people, however, the Roosevelt program of supplementing regulation with the force of public competition has been advancing, and within the last week its effectiveness in forcing these same companies to modify their reactionary attitude has become apparent. But that is anticipating my story.

In 1930 Governor Roosevelt fought his campaign for reelection on this issue and was returned to office with an overwhelming majority by an electorate which had begun to understand what an abundant use of electricity at low rates would mean to homes and farms. In 1931 he secured the creation of the Power Authority of the State of New York to assure the public development of 1,100,000 horsepower of cheap hydroelectric energy from the St. Lawrence River, with the primary purpose of securing the lowest possible electric rates for residential and farm customers throughout the state. The law directed the Power Authority to make a fair share of the power available to municipalities "now or hereafter authorized by law to engage in the distribution of electrical current."

Throughout his second term Governor Roosevelt continued to press for the enactment of legislation authorizing municipalities to go into the power business and to form power districts for the purpose of joint operation. Thus his public yardstick program was taking form, ready for broader application when in 1932 he was elected to the Presidency. In that year Governor Lehman vigorously took up the legislative program in New York State, and in the 1934 legislative session the first municipal-utility bill became law. Meanwhile the Power Authority was laying the foundation for an attempt to negotiate contracts for the distribution of St. Lawrence power, which, in accordance with the law, should fix rates to the ultimate consumers on the basis of the cost of transmission and distribution. A very vital feature of the law directed the Power Authority to determine these costs in accordance with accounting procedure of its own devising.

The limitations of this article do not permit discussion of the Power Authority's three-year study of distribution costs, participated in by more than twenty engineers. It meant an official invasion into a new field of cost analysis which the companies had preferred to leave in the dark in order to maintain a semblance of justification for high residential electric rates. It will be sufficient here to point to the general conclusion—based on analysis of the distribution systems serving typical municipalities throughout the state, checked against similar data from cities served by municipally owned systems—that for an average residential consumption of 50 kilowatt hours a month the rate schedule should make current available at not to exceed an average of 3.5 cents a kilowatt hour. The corresponding average rates for higher average usage should not exceed 2.7 cents at an average of 100 kilowatt hours, 2.1 cents at an average of 200 kilowatt hours, and 1.7 cents at an average of 400 kilowatt hours a month.

With proper cost accounting, such as has eliminated wasteful investment and expenditure in competitive industries, rates based on these costs would unquestionably prove of financial advantage to the companies themselves. In fact, there is much evidence to support the belief that eventually residential electric rates will be appreciably lower than these figures would indicate. The full possibility of lower rates has yet to be given a thorough test.

The effectiveness of public competition in reducing the rates charged by private companies has been demonstrated in too many cities to be longer open to question. In Washington, Cleveland, St. Louis, and more recently in Cincinnati, under this influence, residential rates have come down to levels far below those prevailing where regulation is the only means of public control. Canada offers even more striking evidence, especially in the story of Montreal. There, as the result of a small municipally owned distribution system in a separately incorporated residential section of the city, the great Montreal Light, Heat, and Power Company has steadily reduced its rates throughout the entire city until a residential use of 50 kilowatt hours a month costs only 3.2 cents per kilowatt hour. With larger residential usage the average rates correspond closely to those suggested in the Power Authority distribution-cost survey. On the basis of these rates the company has been exceedingly prosperous.

The effect of President Roosevelt's public yardstick program, which he has designated as a new national policy, is increasingly apparent in the revision of rate schedules in this country. The Tennessee Valley Authority is already a potent influence. Private utilities are being forced to change their reactionary attitude. Perhaps the most interesting instance of the effect of this pressure on the private power interests is to be found in the very recent indication that the great power combine which provides more than 75 per cent of all the electricity sold in New York State is anxious to compromise on the basis of the contract plan which has resulted in rate reductions in Washington, D. C. The immediate cause of this change of attitude has been the decision of the LaGuardia administration in New York City to go swiftly forward with plans for a municipal plant to serve a section of the city.

Behind the present move, however, there is a coordination of federal, state, and city governments which is the result of a remarkable concatenation of political circumstance. If pressed with the support of public opinion this may prove to be a political revolution which will free government forever from the menace of monopolistic control of the necessities of modern living. Popular understanding of its significance is of the highest importance if the power interests are not to obtain a mere truce in which to reform their lines against the time when political reaction in one or more branches of government may relieve them of this pressure. The essential matter is that no professed readiness of the companies to compromise shall be allowed to weaken the development of machinery for public competition. Such competition will remain the only assurance that small consumers of electricity may always get their current at the lowest possible rates. It will be their guaranty against political shifts which might again give the private utility monopoly free rein in establishing rates adaptable to a new period of speculation in utility securities. As such it may well be considered a protection to the honest investor as well.

New York City, at the moment, seems to be the focal point in the fight to curb the exploitation of the power combine. As I write, another center of conflict is about to develop in the national capital, where the United States Senate will again be asked to decide whether the State of New York is to be allowed to go forward with its great public power project on the St. Lawrence River. Meanwhile, in the Southeast, President Roosevelt's Tennessee Valley Authority is powerfully advancing against stubborn resistance.

If the people can be assured a permanent foothold in these two great publicly owned hydroelectric power developments, operated by authorities empowered to make public competition effective, the possibility of political reaction causing a setback to the public power program will be greatly diminished. Every great forward step in the direction of public ownership of electric power definitely renders reaction less likely by weakening the forces responsible for selfish political manipulation.

In an Early Issue Social Security in Great Britain

by RAYMOND GRAM SWING

Second in a series of articles, of which Mr. Stewart's on the opposite page is the first, analyzing the various programs for social insurance suggested for this country, and comparing them with established systems abroad.

Security Versus Mathematics

By MAXWELL S. STEWART

Washington, January 8

IN a bold and vigorous message President Roosevelt has asked Congress to provide security for the American people. Five years of unprecedented depression have not only dramatized the need for such action, but have virtually destroyed such haphazard means of security as previously existed. Not only have we uncared millions of men and women who may never again find employment in private industry, but a large part of these have exhausted or lost the savings of a lifetime. Meanwhile, year by year an increasing number and proportion of our population are to be found in the older age groups, at a time when the opportunities of self-support for such individuals are steadily diminishing. Health protection has been notoriously inadequate. Relief at best has proved an unsatisfactory stop-gap measure; at worst it has added to the graft and corruption of present-day political life.

To meet this intolerable situation it has become evident that something far more audacious and comprehensive than unemployment insurance is needed. President Roosevelt has recognized this in presenting what he terms the "American" plan for security. His program, largely the product of the Committee on Economic Security appointed last June, envisages security of three types: (1) the guaranty of a livelihood through the better use of our national resources; (2) protection against the burden of such hazards as can be borne by society as a whole; (3) adequate housing. While the details behind these broad generalizations are not yet available, the President apparently has in mind a closely integrated plan which would include unemployment insurance for those now employed in industry, a permanent government-works program for the employables, old-age pensions, health and maternity protection, a housing program, and probably some form of old-age insurance. Unemployables who do not fall into one of the above categories are to be cared for, as previously, by the local communities.

In some respects the program is an inspiring one. The basic assumptions of Mr. Roosevelt's "American" way of doing things are a far cry from the anachronistic "American plan" of local self-help which President Hoover defended to the bitter end. For the first time we have a definite acceptance of the view that the rights of individual citizens should take precedence over profits. This does not mean that the President has adopted a program in any sense inimical to the profit system. An increasing number of business leaders have become convinced not only that some form of social insurance is necessary to appease popular unrest, but that it represents the most economical means of dealing with unemployment and destitution, and of stabilizing the economic mechanism. Particularly influential in effecting this change of viewpoint have been the statistics prepared by Abraham Epstein, showing that after allowance is made for the difference in population, the United States expended approximately 20 per cent more than Great Britain in caring for its unemployed in 1933, although the aid given by the British was from two to three times as adequate. Moreover, largely as a result of its system of social insurance, Britain's level of business activity has been maintained at a higher point than that of any other important industrial country.

This is not to say, however, that business leaders are agreed on a plan for carrying out their new views. In general they seem to favor national as against state legislation on the ground that it would be more efficient, and in the hope of thereby avoiding what they consider the evil of pooled reserves. They envision a federal scheme based on the principles of the Wisconsin Plan, which sets up for each company segregated reserves available only for the employees of that firm. It is argued that if each concern is forced to bear the cost of its own unemployment—and only its own—it will have a special incentive to avoid needless shutdowns and to lessen unemployment. The weakness of this plan lies in its failure to provide for the inequality of risks inherent in different types of business; strictly speaking it is not an insurance but a system of unemployment reserves.

Despite the preference of business, the Administration appears to look with slight favor on any form of unemployment insurance to be administered at Washington. It is asserted that a federal-state scheme, in which a federal levy on payrolls is used to induce the states to pass unemployment acts, not only would be more likely to stand up in the courts but would probably give more adequate security than any national legislation that could be passed at the present time. As a guiding principle in the framing of such state laws, the Administration appears to favor a system of pooled reserves such as is found in both the so-called Ohio Plan and in the bill recently introduced into the New York Legislature. While this scheme is open to the objection that in effect it subsidizes the weaker firms, and fails to give the workers in the stronger establishments a full return on the money which they pay in, it unquestionably gives a higher standard of protection than the Wisconsin Plan. And it is a genuine insurance measure, if insurance be conceived of as a scheme based on actuarial principles.

Far-reaching though the President's program undoubtedly is, it falls short of full security for any of the groups involved. Under an actuarial form of insurance no provision can be made in the unemployment scheme for the ten to twelve million who are at present without jobs. The President indicated that three and a half million of these may be taken care of by a government-works program which is soon to be established. To qualify for this, however, a worker must be face to face with actual destitution and must overcome the hurdle of some sort of means test. Moreover, state-enacted insurance legislation is bound to be very uneven in quality. Advanced industrial states such as New York may be expected to adopt relatively satisfactory schemes based on the principle of pooled reserves, while others, particularly in the South, if they adopt insurance laws at all, are almost certain to pass inferior and discriminatory legislation. Even the best of the proposed state acts would be ineffective in an emergency like that of the past five years. In a major crisis reserves would soon become exhausted, benefits would be suspended or drastically curtailed, leaving the situation much as it is at present. Under the most advanced of the suggested state laws benefits would be available only for from sixteen to twenty-six weeks and would equal approximately 50 per cent of the regular wages, with a maximum of $15 a week. To speak of security at $7 to $12 a week is to indulge in brazen deception at the expense of the millions of underprivileged who have borne the brunt of the present crisis.

Dissatisfaction with the Administration's program crystallized in the National Congress for Unemployment and Social Insurance held in Washington on the week-end of January 5-7. This conference also stressed security, but in terms radically different from those used by the President. As a standard of security the congress indorsed the Workers' Unemployment and Social Insurance bill introduced in the Seventy-fourth Congress by Representative Lundeen of Minnesota. The terms of this bill are so drastically opposed to all other social-insurance measures that comparison is difficult. The actuarial principle of insurance is definitely discarded. Security for the individual is held paramount to all other values. From this it follows that the hazards incident to modern life, whether owing to seasonal or cyclic fluctuations in trade, inefficient business management, accidents, sickness, maternity, or old age, should, so far as possible, be borne by society as a whole rather than by individuals or special economic groups. Since wages, in general, are definitely below a security level, the Lundeen bill provides that the cost of protection shall be met exclusively out of levies on incomes of over $5000, gifts, and inheritances.

The Lundeen proposal defines security in terms of adequate living standards rather than as mere subsistence. On the assumption that men and women unemployed for reasons beyond their control have needs that are at least the equivalent of those of employed persons, the bill provides that benefits "shall be equal to the average local wages" in the workers' normal employment, but in no case shall they be less than $10 a week plus $3 for each dependent. Workers in part-time employment shall be allowed enough to bring their total compensation up to the specified minimum, which shall be increased in conformity with any rise in the cost of living. Payment is to be made to all workers over eighteen years of age without discrimination because of occupation, race, sex, citizenship, political affiliation, past participation in industrial disputes, or refusal to work at less than average local wages. A third feature of the bill is a somewhat unusual provision for administration by workers' representatives under rules prescribed by the Secretary of Labor.

Needless to say, the Lundeen bill, though indorsed by 6 state federations of labor, 2,400 A. F. of L. locals, and 65 city councils, is vigorously opposed not only by business leaders but by the vast majority of experts in the social-insurance field. Objections to it center chiefly around the looseness with which it is drawn, its doubtful constitutionality, its denial of actuarial principles, and its cost. Some critics even go so far as to assert that the bill "is not a serious legislative proposal, but a soap-box for propaganda directed against the present economic order and against its reform." That the bill is loosely drafted is admitted even by its most enthusiastic proponents, the excuse being that simplicity is necessary for rallying mass support. Correction of this defect would be relatively easy, but would not, one surmises, lessen the opposition. The charge of unconstitutionality is perhaps more serious, but invites the obvious reply that the Constitution, after all, is man made.

While the cost of the bill is necessarily problematical, it would admittedly be much greater, at the outset at least, than any other of the proposed schemes. At its inception the plan would cost, as Miss Van Kleeck pointed out at the congress, "exactly what is now being paid by the working class" as a result of the depression and other social hazards. To say that this cost is more than the nation can bear is saying in effect that the United States does not possess the human and physical resources necessary to give every individual the equivalent of the prevailing wage, an assertion disproved by the fact that we practically achieved this between 1917 and 1919 despite the huge wastes of war and profiteering. I. M. Rubinow, author of the Ohio Plan, estimates that the annual cost of the Lundeen bill, based on the present volume of unemployment, would be between twelve and twenty billion dollars. This would necessitate, he declares, the virtual confiscation of all income over $5,000 a year. Assuming the higher figure to be correct, what would be the effect of this huge expenditure on business conditions? Obviously not all of it would represent new purchasing power; at least a billion is now distributed in the form of relief, which could be dispensed with, while a considerable proportion of the remainder would otherwise have been spent by the well-to-do for luxury goods. But we know that at least a third of the income of families receiving over $5,000 a year is not expended for consumers' goods, and but a fraction is invested in capital goods at present. We may assume, therefore, an immediate increase in effective consumer purchasing power. This third, accepting Keynes's estimate that each dollar is utilized at least twice, would suffice to put ten million persons back at work at prevailing wages, thus saving over eight billion dollars on insurance and yielding that much increase in total purchasing power, which by this time might conceivably be required for capital investment. A distinction must therefore be made between economic and political practicability. That the bill will pass the present session of Congress is expected by no one. That it incorporates desirable standards for social insurance and would aid recovery is at least worthy of debate.

The differences between the two approaches cannot be too strongly stated. The Administration plan is frankly based on the assumption that the hazards of life can be adequately distributed by the application of actuarial principles. No mathematically-minded person who has dipped into the study of actuarial theory will deny its fascination. Nevertheless there are strong grounds for questioning whether such risks as industrial unemployment can in fact be reduced to mathematical formulas. A further weakness of the actuarial approach, moreover, lies in the fact that it treats money as an end in itself, and conceives of it as being stored up to meet future contingencies, whereas real wealth obviously is derived almost exclusively from current production. This would seem to imply that the problem is one of equalizing today's burdens rather than of saving for future hazards.

Among the other issues which must be settled prior to the formulation of a comprehensive program for social security are the following: (1) Should the cost of such protection be assumed by individuals directly, by industry, or by society as a whole through the taxing power of the federal government? (2) Should protection against unemployment and old age be extended to all persons, or merely to those whose personal resources, for one reason or another, have become exhausted? (3) All groups agree that work is preferable to a dole, but should anyone—employed in a public project or unemployed through no fault of his own—be granted less than a full living wage? (4) Should the agency which administers security measures be the industry, state, or federal government, or, as in the Lundeen bill, should the task be intrusted to the workers themselves? Each of these issues merits the fullest discussion, and must be settled before a permanent scheme of social insurance can profitably be established. For upon the nature of that decision rests the future of our country.

The Menace of Huey Long

II. A Monarch in Pajamas

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

Baton Rouge, December, 1934

HUEY LONG in his well-tailored brown suit, ruling over his legislature, is one manifestation, but Huey in his green pajamas, holding court in his bedroom, is the natural man. He received the commander of the German cruiser Emden in pajamas, and created an international incident, since the visitor mistook a routine wardrobe for a deliberate insult. But everyone here understands that the green pajamas are Huey's ordinary apparel for political duties at certain hours of the routine day. He has been known to don them in the middle of the afternoon, climb into bed, and receive a stream of callers till late into the night. But the rule is to confine these pajama audiences to the evening. Thus he confers with, or rather declaims at, his henchmen. He does not stay in bed, but as the excitement wells up in him, he leaps out barefooted, and giving his pajama pants a yank, parades and rants like an orator before a vast audience. Hitler (not in pajamas) also cannot converse; he must orate. But Hitler looks through a solitary listener and goes into a near-trance, forgetting everything except the flow of ideas which pours from him. Huey does not ignore his listener; he stands over him shouting, prods him with a gesticulating finger, thumps him with an articulate fist. If the normal thing is to speak quietly and persuasively with a few men in a small room, then Huey either is abnormal or is acting. But his manner is not put on; this perpetual stump speaker is the real man.

At these sessions he is not imperious, for he lets the other fellow talk, too. His subordinates speak right up to him; they call him "Kingfish" (from Amos and Andy), and argue and disagree. But quickly he prevails, and he alone decides. A session with his workers may last for hours and cover a wide field. I sat in a corner of Huey's bedroom during a "conference" with a group of local leaders from an important parish. The topics discussed ranged from a decision to build a fence around a pasture at a state institution and the most insignificant details of patronage to important strategy for the next campaign. Huey knew the parish as well as any of his workers; the man's memory for a world of detail is almost mythical. There was no order of business, but in the course of two hours some twenty decisions were made. No matter how trite the issue, Huey burned and declaimed, now in bed, now parading the room in his pajamas and bare feet, hitching up the pajama pants, and waving his long windmill arms, striking all the attitudes familiar from his photographs.

Such a conference is a distressingly noisy business. One point settled, Huey climbs back into bed. He lies down flat—his bed is without a pillow—until the next point is mooted. An idea ignites in his mind; he sits up suddenly. Then as the fire develops, he leaps from bed. His men interrupt him, even differ from him, but he overwhelms them with the stentorian passion of his shouted arguments. At the end of the session, just as his henchmen are leaving, Huey recapitulates every decision reached. "I will do this; you will do that; this man is to be fired; that contract is to be pushed through." Twenty-odd decisions, rattled off verbatim.

Thus he carries the state's business in his head to the most trivial item. He knows every district, an incredible number of citizens by name and history and how they stand, and precisely what vote turned out for him in each district in the last elections. He knows what he will do in each parish, how he will finance this or that little matter, and so on to the woven whole of the commonwealth, which is there in his mind as though fully conceived in the abstract and being transformed into reality by his unquenchable passion. Everything springs from his brain, is molded by his will alone. When Huey leaves the state, his machine develops defects, his supporters slip away, his plans are clogged. No wonder, for he is functionally not a leader, he compels. And when he is not there no one else can subjugate for him. A man is not great, it has been said, who does not know how to delegate power. Huey, the embodiment of the appetite for power, probably will never have enough to be willing to yield any of it to another.

The scene in the bedroom is noisy; it also is profane. Anything Huey says in pajamas is likely to be punctuated with swear-words. Whether profanity is ordinarily a signal of contempt for manners or merely a substitute for better-expressed emphasis, it is both for Huey. His profanity is not imaginative or colorful; it is just ordinary vulgar cussing. Certainly he has no breeding, and no respect for it. Because his oysters were not fried to suit him he threw them on the floor at the restaurant of the Heidelberg Hotel the other day. He is one of those twisted spirits who must snarl or bawl at waiters. In this he differs from Hitler, who is a meek fellow to meet, and sees that you have an easy chair, and makes you feel that he is thinking of your comfort. Huey is rude as though impoliteness somehow were a necessary kind of self-expression. Those around him are used to it; for them the Kingfish is only having his little joke.

The leit-motif in Huey's nature seems to be vindictiveness. "Once disappointed over a political undertaking I could never cast it from my mind," he confesses in his autobiography, "Every Man a King." His history is a long recital of how he downed his enemies, and few of his victories for the people of Louisiana are free from the stigma of personal vengeance. Early in his career he was, or thinks he was, kept from being named assistant United States attorney through corporation influence. He has been a foe of the corporations ever since. He was just a plain small-town lawyer practicing in Shreveport, acquiring stock in small oil companies, when Standard Oil one day refused to carry competition oil in its pipelines. It kept him from becoming a millionaire. He says so in his autobiography. From that day began his life-long fight against Standard Oil, the state's greatest single industry. It was at a special session of the legislature called to pass a special tax on oil refining that Huey was nearly impeached. His autobiography makes no attempt to conceal his revenges, which are an organic part of the story. Characteristic of the man is that when he laid out his concrete highways for the state, he failed to link them up, so that the parishes which voted against him could be kept without benefit. Thus the vast system, one of his chief claims to service, was allowed for some time to remain a patchwork while Huey's opponents were duly punished, and only now is it to be joined into a unity. Most of his measures can be explained not only as reforms but as devices to bring pressure on his opposition or as heavy blows of retribution. He passes an income-tax law; at the time he is feeling the weight of the federal inquiry into the incomes of his leading supporters. Washington gives him a lesson on how to make an inquisition hurt. Huey at once amends his law so that he shall have the same power over recalcitrants in Louisiana. The Long machine takes over the assessment of property, and he can both raise assessments on his enemies and reduce those of his supporters. The other day his assessors reduced by $300,000 the evaluation of the New Orleans fair grounds recently bought by one of Long's chief lieutenants and his friends.

Huey seldom forgets a slight or forgives an injury. I was told that he carries with him a little book (a "son-of-a-bitch book") of those he is going to "get," with a note of their offenses. Whether or not he goes to the trouble of writing them down, he gets his man, as all Louisiana will testify. The newspapers can speak as eloquently as anyone, for they are now fighting in the courts his tax levy of 2 per cent on the gross receipts from advertising. This was a spite tax to punish the larger newspapers for having fought him, though most of them have been with him at some time or other, thanks to the factional seesaw of Southern politics. "The lyin' newspapers" are a by-word in Huey's vocabulary. "This tax," he states in one of his circulars, "should be called a tax on lying, 2 cents per lie." The papers are fighting the measure as a revival of the old British practice of licensing and taxing the press to restrain its freedom, and the brief now before the federal court is an important contribution to the history of the free press in America.

Implacable resentment underlying his terrific ambition for power marks Huey as the product of a humiliating and harsh childhood. One of nine children in a poor village family, son of a farmer who forced him to work long hours on the farm, he records in his autobiography: "Rising before the sun we toiled until dark, after which we did nothing except eat supper, listen to the whippoorwills, and go to bed." He adds: "My every sympathy has gone out to those who toil." Every Sunday he had to go to Sunday school, church, young peoples' meeting, and church again, and at midweek to prayer meeting. He learned his Bible thoroughly, and recently said publicly that science had not succeeded in refuting a statement in it. He knows much of it by heart, and held a contest recently with the junior Senator from Louisiana. Overman undertook to recite more from Shakespeare than Huey could recite from the Scriptures. After three hours neither had exhausted his memory, and Huey remarked that everything worth remembering from Shakespeare had already been said in the Bible. (For political purposes Huey is still openly a Baptist in the northern Protestant parishes, and was even slyly sympathetic with the Klan when it enjoyed a brief revival a few years ago. In the southern Catholic parishes he is a paragon of religious tolerance.)

His enforced churchgoing during his hard regimented childhood may explain his present exuberantly impious vocabulary. Certainly he was a rebellious boy. Twice he tried to run away from home. By sixteen, when it was clear he could not be sent to college, he got a job as salesman and traveled through the district tacking up signs on trees and holding baking contests to advertise a lard substitute. Once he dropped out of salesmanship for four months' schooling in Shreveport. He was given a better job, and admits he lost it because he did not work regularly or "worry about his expense account." A year later he had five months' law study between jobs at the University of Oklahoma. At nineteen he married a Shreveport girl who had won one of his baking contests. In another year of salesmanship over a large territory he accumulated a small nest egg, borrowed a few hundred dollars from his brother, and entered Tulane law school, determined to finish the course in a year. He studied day and night, till he became as thin as a skeleton, but he passed his bar examination at twenty-one. That was the education of Huey Long. Poverty, the want of privileges, the ambition to push ahead, all these are familiar factors in many American lives. But in Huey Long they burned his soul. Those who possessed while he suffered privation are now the ones he is determined to penalize. And at the same time he will make it simpler for poor young people to obtain the education he could not have.

He is uneducated and devoid of culture today, but let there be no mistake, he is a precociously intelligent man. His chief, perhaps his only intellectual interest is the law. America has more polished lawyers but it knows few today with greater talent. He has been praised by Chief Justice Taft and Justice Brandeis for briefs before the Supreme Court. Almost fabulous tales are told of how he will sit up all night preparing a brief that has been too much for his colleagues, and win his case in court the next morning. He is not a trial lawyer; it is the abstractions of the law which absorb him. And he has the strength to work year in and year out with little sleep, ceaselessly at it. The mind which grasps swiftly the abstruse points of law seizes as swiftly on the essentials of knowledge. He knows the smallest details of the business of the port of New Orleans (second largest in America), of banks, of industries he has had to study. His is a mastering as well as a masterful mind, which goes far to explain the unstinting admiration of his followers. They are used to his bad manners, they forgive the ruthlessness of his political methods, they condone the corruption of his regime, they overlook his innumerable impetuous blunders, because the man has the gift of an amazing, almost baffling mental ability. He towers over them, he out-smarts them, he knows. He is the hill-billy come into power, with the crudity of the hill-billy and his native shrewdness multiplied tenfold. Hill-billies have been the under-dogs of the South; now through Huey Long they are supreme in Louisiana.

I recall hearing soon after the Hitler revolution a speech of Goebbels's which was devoted to a long disquisition on how the Nazi government derived its power from the people. In its language it was curiously reminiscent of American speeches in the early days, when so much had to be said of political power deriving from the people. It dawned on me that for the lower middle class in Germany the Hitler regime represented, or seemed to represent, their being in power, and that it was their first real experience of power in the long history of Germany. Similarly, for his supporting public Long is the under-dog Southern farmer and villager, the suppressed, ignored, unprivileged person. He is the personification of their aspirations and their prejudices. And his appeal will be the same wherever he can display himself to unprivileged people. Resentment lies in the hearts of many because of the hardship they bore as children, the dreary hours of work they endured, the advantages they saw given to others but were not fated to enjoy. Hitler tapped that resentment in building up his great German host. Huey Long has tapped it in Louisiana and he is confident that he can tap it in forty-seven other states.

I have described Huey Long in the legislature, in the committee room, and in the green pajamas. I want to add a picture of action, of Huey Long during the banking crisis. While he was Governor few banks failed in Louisiana, not by reason of their inherent strength, but simply because he would not let them. He worked tirelessly behind the scenes, driving larger banks to give aid to weaker ones, persuading and even cudgeling them whenever he had the weapons. An important bank was in difficulties in Lafayette. The news reached Governor Long, and he succeeded in stopping the return for lack of funds of clearances from the Federal Reserve Bank. He called an immediate conference and hastily improvised a reorganization. Word of the trouble spread in Lafayette, and a run on the bank in the morning was inevitable. Huey motored through the night to Lafayette and was the first to enter the bank when it opened. He took up his place in the directors' office and commanded that every depositor who came to withdraw funds should be shown in to him. The next arrival was a lumberman with a check for $17,000. He was startled to be shown into the presence of the Governor.

"I'm trying to save this bank," Huey explained.

"I don't like this reorganization," grumbled the lumberman. "I'd feel safer if I had my money." Huey explained that the reorganization was essential and would be a success, but that the bank had only $190,000 on hand to meet demands. "You want your money and I want mine. The state has $200,000 in this bank. If you present your check I'll present mine, and mine comes first because I was here ahead of you."

"You mean I'll get nothing?" asked the lumberman.

"No, I mean that if you leave your money in the bank, we'll both get what's coming to us." Huey won, and he won similarly with every large depositor who showed up that day. The bank succeeded in staying open until the national closing of all banks.

A still graver crisis arose when one of the large banks of the state was about to liquidate for want of $5,000,000, a sum too large to be found locally. If the bank had been liquidated, the financial structure would have toppled over throughout the state. Five leading bankers in New Orleans met and decided that a state-wide moratorium was the only possible solution. They trailed off to Huey's hotel suite and told him so.

"Do you mean to tell me that you blankety-blank so-and-so's want a moratorium?" shouted Huey. "Well, you're not going to get it." The bankers insisted. They simply couldn't raise $5,000,000. Huey let loose a further volley of abuse. Then he called in Joe Messina, his bodyguard. His eyes were bulging, as they do when he is excited.

"Joe, have you got your revolver?"

"Yes."

"Is it loaded?"

"Yes."

"Then you stay guard on these blankety-blanks, and if one of them tries to leave this room before I come back, you shoot the blankety-blank and shoot to kill."

Huey rushed to his office and began telephoning to New York. A nationally known New York banker thereupon hurried to Washington, and in two days the $5,000,000 had been found. The five leaders of New Orleans finance were not kept under cover of Joe Messina's gun for the whole two days. That evening Huey paroled them under pledge not to mention the word moratorium to anyone.

This incident reveals the kind of courage which is a disregard of consequences in getting something done, and is innate in the man. But his enemies will not concede him the other type of courage, fearlessness of bodily injury. He is kept closely guarded, day and night. No doubt about it, he is afraid of being attacked, and a man who is the personification of vindictiveness may well be. Politics in Louisiana are at that high pitch of emotion where one either detests or worships, where no balance of judgment is possible, and where life is lived on the fringe of violence. Huey's friends will tell you that time and again hostile crowds have been incited to assassinate him. His enemies say he is a physical coward. What neither faction appears to realize is that of all human beings a dictator most needs protection. Huey rules by the dictator's twin forces of fear and approval. The fear he engenders in others in the end rules him. The stronger he is, the more he will have to be shielded. During the vice inquiry in New Orleans he did not leave the committee room except between armed militiamen in military formation, while the city snickered. But New Orleans was mistaken and Huey knew. He already is consigned to the dictator's special domain of fearfulness. His bodyguard is the final proof that democracy in Louisiana is no more.

[The third and concluding article in Mr. Swing's series on Huey Long will appear next week.]

In the Driftway

WHAT is probably the finest piece of prose in the English language lies before the Drifter as he writes. Although he has a point to make about it, he enjoys quoting it merely for its own sake. It is, of course, from Hamlet's speech to Rosencrantz and Guildenstern:

What a piece of work is a man! how noble in reason! how infinite in faculty! in form and moving how express and admirable! in action how like an angel! in apprehension how like a god! the beauty of the world! the paragon of animals! And yet, to me, what is this quintessence of dust? Man delights not me: no, nor woman neither, though by your smiling you seem to say so.

These sentences, "like the morning star . . . bright and musical," have been thoroughly well known to English readers for a couple of centuries anyway. Their cadences are as familiar as nursery rhymes or certain portions of Holy Writ, and as with those other well-worn adjuncts of common speech—or at least common quotation!—they are familiar less for their sense than for their sound. It is the tune that we know so well.

* * * *

THE Drifter was surprised and respectfully indignant, therefore (for he is respectful of scholarship even when it injures his most cherished possessions), to note, in the new Cambridge University Press "Hamlet," edited by J. Dover Wilson, a wholly unfamiliar rendering of these famous words. Mr. Wilson, using as his source the Second Quarto "Hamlet," published in 1605—eleven years before Shakespeare's death—punctuates the passage as follows:

What a piece of work is a man, how noble in reason, how infinite in faculties, in form and moving, how express and admirable in action, how like an angel in apprehension, how like a god . . .

and so on. The punctuation which makes the familiar tune to us is taken from the First Folio, published in 1623. And Mr. Wilson has many scholarly comments which seem to indicate cogently that the quotation as he points it makes more sense than it does with the Folio pointing. The Drifter would not presume to argue with so eminent an authority, and if the dates are correct—there is not the slightest reason to doubt them—Mr. Wilson has everything on his side. Nor is his rendering by any means unpleasing. Its climax is as powerful, its words are the same. But it is not the same song.

* * * *

IF the Drifter were minded to be pedagogical, he would offer this whole matter to the young as a lesson in the rhythms of prose. A mere shifting of commas (in our familiar version the exclamation marks could be replaced with commas easily enough) entirely changes the sound of a passage. But school does not keep today, and the children may file out quietly. Before they go, however, those of them who are literarily minded might like one more quotation. "Hamlet," in its earliest published form, appeared two years before Mr. Wilson's Second Quarto, in 1603. This is a garbled and incomplete version of the play which nobody understands very well. Perhaps it was played thus, and its author improved it later; perhaps it was taken down incorrectly by an incompetent scribe from the spoken lines. At any rate, the famous passage is quite unrecognizable. Hamlet says:

Yes faith, this great world you see contents me not,
No nor the spangled heavens, nor earth nor sea,
No nor Man that is so glorious a creature,
Contents not me, no nor woman too, though you laugh.

Yet this is exactly the same sense, the same idea that is being conveyed. Nothing is lacking except the rich language, the high imagination, the bold strong music. The two quotations are just alike in idea; they differ merely in that one could be written by any hack prosodist and one is incomparable. There is a very complicated lesson in this, but the Drifter, having dismissed the class, is not obliged to point it out.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Mr. Mencken Has the Last (to Date) Word

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Mr. Villard, I fear, is simply suffering once more his old experience of seeing a Utopia blow up. First prohibition was to cure the drink evil, and then, when prohibition only made it worse, it was to be cured by repeal. It will actually survive until the end of time. The most we can ever hope to do is to keep it within reasonable bounds. My belief is that the licensing system, which has obvious defects but is at least frank and honest, is working to that end much better than prohibition, which was only a silly begging of the question.

Mr. Villard's statistics will hardly bear analysis. Let us turn, for example, to those he cites from Nassau County, New York. They show that there were 114 automobile accidents in the county during the first five months of 1934, as against 41 during the same months of 1933, an increase of 73, or nearly 180 per cent. But in the next line they show that "the increase of drunken drivers who have come into contact with the police" was but 25 per cent for New York as a whole.

What are we to make of this? Has Nassau gone on a gigantic communal jag, confined to the county limits, or do we simply confront a general increase in automobile accidents? The latter theory, it seems to me, is by far the more plausible. For some reason undetermined—but it probably has to do with recent changes in the speed laws—there has been an increase in such accidents all over the country. But that there has been an even greater increase in accidents due to drink is certainly not proved.

As an old journalist Mr. Villard should know how such statistics as he relies upon come into being. The newspapers discover that there is an increase in automobile accidents, and demand violently that the cops do something about it. The cops, loath to admit that their own clumsy regulation of traffic may be responsible, or perhaps honestly unable to determine the cause, put the blame on the nearest whipping-boy, which now happens to be John Barleycorn. So thousands of persons are charged with drunken driving who would have been passed over politely a year ago, and there is a new set of horrible statistics to entertain the innocent. This benign process, as every newspaperman knows, is now going on from end to end of the United States.

But such dubious statistics cannot cover up the plain fact that the American people, with endless supplies of alcohol available almost everywhere, are drinking more soberly than under prohibition. There was naturally some orgiastic boozing immediately after repeal, and it is still going on among the anthropoids earmarked by God to die of the jimjams, but the great majority of Americans are using their new-won liberty in a discreet and civilized way, and if reformers only let them alone they will probably do even better hereafter.

Baltimore, December 31

H. L. MENCKEN

A Retraction from Mr. Sinclair

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

On November 28, 1934, there appeared in your magazine an article by myself called The Future of Epic. In a portion of this article I stated that "on the Sunday before election day every Negro preacher in Los Angeles received $50 to preach a sermon against me."

I have made an investigation of this matter and I find that this statement was ill-advised, and I desire to withdraw it. I also desire that all newspapers and magazines which copied this portion of my article be good enough to print this letter. The statement is true concerning a number, but is not true concerning all preachers, and I apologize to those preachers who have suffered because of this article and who are not involved in any way.

I have had the pleasure of meeting the Reverend William A. Johnson, who is the pastor of Trinity Baptist Church of Los Angeles, and I have found him to be a man who does not indulge in politics in his church; he did not preach any sermon against me nor did he receive any compensation from any political group, nor has he preached any political matters in his church at any time.

Los Angeles, December 28

UPTON SINCLAIR

Who Was This Euripedes, Anyway?

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

It is the end of a long day, a day spent reading freshman themes. The freshmen have been reading Greek dramas, and their papers are conscientious if somewhat bewildered summaries of such masterpieces as the "Agamemon" of someone called Aechylus, or the "Edepus" of someone named Sophocleis. Some possibly have preferred the "Lisistrata" of one Aristophanes; others the "Media" of Euripedes.

I pick up The Nation of December 19 and turn to the Drifter's column to learn of the course of reading pursued by poor John Stuart Mill. He too, I learn, read Euripedes, no doubt with more profit than that derived therefrom by Iowa freshmen.

The point is: Was the Drifter's "Euripedes" a printer's error? (I know he is a man of honor, and I shall believe it if he says yes.) Or does he, like the Iowa freshman, have occasional lapses from orthographical grace—less frequent no doubt—but none the less lapses?

Grinnell, Iowa, December 21

CARL NIEMEYER

[The Drifter, being a man of honor, deposes and says that he differs from Professor Niemeyer's freshmen in that he does

Victor Announces a glorious new recording of the BEETHOVEN FIFTH

Played by the London Philharmonic Orchestra under direction of Serge Koussevitzky

Surpassing any previous recording of Beethoven's masterpiece

SOME would call Beethoven's Fifth the greatest of his symphonies. No one can doubt that it is the best loved. Naturally, it was one of the very first symphonies to be recorded by Victor when electrical recording was first introduced, some ten years ago.

Why, then, a new recording at this time? Because another great advance has been made by RCA Victor in the art of recording. All previous recordings of the "Fifth" are far surpassed by this one in glorious realism of orchestral tone.

Ask your Victor dealer to let you hear this new Beethoven Fifth played by the London Philharmonic Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Ask also to hear the new Bach 250th Anniversary Album, a new group of the celebrated Bach-Stokowski transcriptions.

* * *

Just off the press! THE VICTOR BOOK OF THE SYMPHONY! Companion to the famous Book of the Opera. Fascinating, brilliant, non-technical. Profusely illustrated. Foreword by Leopold Stokowski. Over 600 pages. The perfect gift for anyone who has a radio or a phonograph.

THE VICTOR BOOK OF THE SYMPHONY, by Charles O'Connell. $3.50. At all RCA Victor dealers, and bookstores everywhere.

VICTOR RECORDS

RCA Victor Company, Inc.
A Radio Corporation of America Subsidiary know how to spell Euripides and they do not. Nevertheless, he wrote on his copy "Euripedes," and read it in proof, after which it was read by The Nation's proofreader, who also knows how to spell it, and a number of other editors ditto. What this means about their intellectual caliber, not to mention their orthographical competence, he leaves to Professor Niemeyer to decide.—EDITORS THE NATION.]
Camden, N. J.

The Robins-Gras Case

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In a unanimous decision which may be an important precedent in labor cases, the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of New York has granted a new trial to Harold Robins and André Gras, railroaded to prison for their militant activity in last winter's hotel strike. Last April they were convicted on the charge of assaulting a non-union chef.

The reversal of their conviction came after Robins and Gras had served eight months of their sentences. The decision severely castigates the trial judge, Joseph E. Corrigan, for "sarcastic characterization of the defendants," the suspicions he cast on the defendants' alibis, his failure to discuss discrepancies in the testimony of hostile witnesses, and the "plain import" of Corrigan's attempt to "indicate to the jury the court's opinion that Robins had been employed as a strong-arm man by the union."

Formed at the request of the defendants after their conviction, the Robins-Gras Defense Committee was constituted by the Provisional Committee for Non-Partisan Labor Defense, the Socialist Party, the Communist Party Opposition, the Workers' Party of the United States, the General Defense Committee of the I. W. W., and other organizations. It is a matter of record that the International Labor Defense and other Communist organizations refused to participate in the defense. Almost every progressive union in New York gave moral and material support to the case. The volunteer lawyers who prepared the very able brief were Abraham Abramowitz, of the Socialist Lawyers' Association, and Louis Glickhouse. The Law Journal considered the decision sufficiently important to devote to it three columns on the front page of the December 20 issue.

In almost any other case the unanimous decision on appeal would assure that there would be no further attempt to convict the defendants. We have no doubt, however, in view of the hostile attitude of the Hotel Men's Association, that there will be a new trial.

The heavy costs of the appeal have not yet been met, and money is also needed for the new trial.

New York, December 28

FELIX MORROW

Free Press in Cleveland

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

For nearly six months the Cleveland Newspaper Guild has been negotiating a contract with the Cleveland News. At one time it appeared that there would be a strike before any contract could be signed. But without going into the details, which you will find in the next issue of the Guild Reporter, I may say that an agreement was finally reached and the contract was signed on December 20 of this year.

There had been a good deal of bitterness during the negotiations, caused largely by one Joseph C. Hostetler, a law partner of Newton (TVA) Baker and the attorney for the publisher. After the strike threat Mr. Hostetler, who, incidentally, represents all three of Cleveland's newspapers, disappeared from the negotiations and with him went a great portion of the disagreement between the two sides.

The Cleveland Newspaper Guild was prepared to praise the publisher to the various labor organizations in the city for signing the first guild contract in the city. But he wanted no story in his paper or in any of the other papers. This is the day after the signing of the contract and there has been no story in any Cleveland paper with one exception. The Cleveland Press (Scripps-Howard) printed a brief story in its first edition. This was quickly killed. The United Press was given a story and a kill was sent out a few hours later from Cleveland. I do not know that it was put on the national wire. The Associated Press sent out a story today after the Press published its first-edition story. The guild furnished the Associated Press with a story a few minutes after the contract had been signed. No story was given to the A. P. by the publisher of the News.

And so you can understand our pardonable disgust when Elisha Hanson raises that cry of the "freedom of the press" at Washington.

Cleveland, December 21

A CLEVELANDER

George Moore

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I am preparing the Life and Letters of the late George Moore for publication in 1935. As many individuals in America have been in correspondence with Mr. Moore in the past, I am anxious to obtain from them either the use of the originals or copies of his correspondence with them. If the originals are sent to me, care of the Kildare Street Club, they will be carefully protected and returned to the owners when I have finished with them.

Dublin, Ireland, January 4

J. M. HONE

Contributors to This Issue

FRANK P. WALSH is chairman of the Power Authority of New York State.

NORMAN ALEXANDER is the pseudonym of a former newspaperman who in recent years has been teaching journalism and contributing to magazines. He is not at present a member of the Newspaper Guild.

STUART CHASE, a director of the Labor Bureau and a frequent contributor to The Nation, is the author of "The Economy of Abundance" and of other provocative books on current economic problems.

LUDWIG LORE, formerly editor of the New York Volkszeitung, now conducts a column headed "Behind the Cables," in the New York Post.

HARLOW SHAPLEY, a distinguished astronomer, is director of the Harvard Observatory.

BENJAMIN B. KENDRICK, professor of history at the North Carolina College for Women, collaborated with Louis M. Hacker in writing "The United States Since 1865." From 1930 to 1934 he was chairman of the Southern Regional Committee of the Social Science Research Council.

Labor and Industry

Not Fit to Print

By NORMAN ALEXANDER

THE American Newspaper Guild celebrated its first birthday last month by trying out its lungs and muscles with such vigor that 1,200 publishers felt called upon to defy the government, in effect, and perhaps to repudiate the New Deal in an effort to arrest the lusty infant's precocity. With 8,000 editorial-department employees enrolled in more than a hundred units throughout the country, the guild in the first month of its second year can claim credit for wage and hour concessions in many cities, contracts in Philadelphia and Cleveland, and a closed-shop agreement in Madison, Wisconsin. It has taken several charges of collective-bargaining obstruction before federal and regional labor boards, winning decisive support in one. Reporters have discarded their traditional aloofness to walk the picket lines and have taken boycott measures against unfair employers. They have furnished money and manpower to aid a sturdy strike of editorial staff workers. The American Federation of Labor and independent unions have officially recognized an ally. Guild leaders have dramatically challenged the impartiality of the National Recovery Administration.

While romantics among them wept into their beer, youngsters in unionism moved rapidly toward labor leadership. Working newspapermen had at last recognized their kinship with the printers who converted their copy into type and the miners who read what they wrote. Unwittingly, publishers themselves had routed many a beleaguered individualist from his last stand, directed the legendary cynicism of the Fourth Estate into new channels, and by their bungling resistance fortified the guild. A review of the organization's first year shows how it was done.

When the codes for fair competition were first being drafted, and the government specifically notified employees that they were to be heard, there was no organization from the editorial rooms qualified to offer facts and figures to balance those of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association. On December 15, 1933, representatives of organized groups in four cities formed the American Newspaper Guild in Washington. The movement quietly gathered momentum until February, when the first show of strength came in opposition to the appointment of Ralph Pulitzer as NRA administrator for the newspaper code. Printers and editorial workers recalled that a few years earlier Mr. Pulitzer had dealt the death blow to their old friend the New York World, and that Heywood Broun, now the national president of the guild, had told them then that the paper and their jobs might have been saved if the news staff had been organized. In the face of their protests Mr. Pulitzer withdrew.

Among the first to oppose the guild openly was, as might be expected, William Randolph Hearst. R. L. Burgess, who had left the San Francisco Examiner to free lance after seven years of apparently satisfactory service, returned as an editorial writer in 1933. The Examiner chapter elected him as its first chairman, and a few days later a telephone call came from San Simeon ordering his dismissal. First economy and then inefficiency were given as the reasons, although there were no signs of general economy measures and little proof that the quality of Mr. Burgess's work had changed. When the guild asked the regional labor board to order Mr. Burgess reinstated in any capacity, John Francis Neylan, Hearst general counsel, refused to recognize that board's jurisdiction, protested that nobody could tell a publisher who was to write his editorials, and sneered at the Guilders that they were "barking up the wrong tree." "No, you are," Mr. Burgess retorted. "We're going the direction history is taking." The case went from San Francisco to Washington and back, to be dismissed for lack of evidence, but the outcome of the next Hearst-guild encounter gave meaning to Mr. Burgess's prophecy.

When the other Hearst paper in San Francisco, the Call-Bulletin, learned how Dean Jennings, rewrite man, intended to use his June vacation, dates were switched and he was forced to resign in order to attend the St. Paul convention of the guild. The National Labor Relations Board considered itself qualified to act, even though Elisha Hanson, counsel for the A. N. P. A. did not, and it ordered Mr. Jennings reinstated, adhering to that decision even after the NRA had been bullied into ordering the case reopened. When the board on December 27 asked the Compliance Division to remove the Call-Bulletin's Blue Eagle for ignoring the order, Howard Davis, chairman of the national code committee, sounded a five-alarm call to all publishers subscribing to the code to attend an undated meeting to combat this "usurpation of power."

With the test still to come in the Jennings case, Redfern Mason resigned from the San Francisco Examiner after he had been demoted from the post of music critic, where he had won the respect and admiration of readers in twenty-one years of service, to the hotel beat. As chairman of the Examiner guild chapter, he had just sent a letter to its members urging continuation of the fight against Joseph Knowland's Oakland Tribune across the bay. Three established Tribune men had lost their jobs when their guild activity apparently made Mr. Knowland suddenly aware of the need for "readjustment" and "economy." The guild went into action against the paper with sound trucks and handbills after radio stations had barred the controversy from the air.

There have been scattered guerrilla warfare against unionization of newspapermen and refusals to negotiate in New Jersey, Massachusetts, Minnesota, New York, and other sections. Only isolated injustices were clear-cut enough to get before boards set up to deal with them. Picketing began when S. I. Newhouse was accused of showing a prejudice against organization among employees of his Staten Island Advance and Long Island Press. An agreement was effected on the Press and the Staten Island case was then referred to the Newspaper Industrial Board.

Newark became the first real battleground in November after L. T. Russell, in a series of notices on the Ledger bulletin board, had displayed his bitter antagonism toward the guild. After threatening to weed out half the staff, Russell dismissed eight members of the Newark chapter. Forty-five editorial employees out of fifty-six promptly walked out, all but one resolving to stay on strike until the eight had been reinstated and the guild recognized. In the second month of the strike, when the guild agreed to accept the good offices of the regional labor board, Mr. Russell said it was too late, since he had completed a permanent working staff meanwhile. How well that skeleton staff was working was questionable in view of the quantity of "canned" matter which the Ledger printed. Circulation fell off heavily and some advertisers withdrew as the strikers put their case before the city in their own paper and by house-to-house visits.

Russell's erratic hiring and firing and the low wage scale, which he admitted when he discounted the dismissal of eight men as involving only $210 a week, are the subject of fantastic stories. The fight against him won the backing of even professional journalists. Some believed they had disposed of the guild argument when they pointed out that Russell is the exceptional publisher and that the majority who were friendly and fair toward their men should not be held liable. The answer to this was that it is precisely for dealing with the "exceptional publisher" in a solid front recruited from the more favored employees that a guild is necessary. An analysis of the guild's first year, however, seems to show that publishers like J. David Stern, who unhesitatingly signed a contract with employees of the Philadelphia Record and indicated that he would do the same on the New York Post as soon as income justified setting wage minimums, are more the exception than are the Russells.

The New York World-Telegram, which along with other Scripps-Howard interests has been jettisoning its reputation for liberalism in more ways than one, gagged at applying its editorial policy in its own shops. Remembering that the A. N. P. A., of which he is a member, had warned that contracts are "very dangerous," Roy Howard offered important concessions in extension of the five-day week, a severance-notice schedule, and a 5 per cent restoration of pay, but he refused to make written agreements with anyone but his own staff. The suggestion of the company-union principle was overwhelmingly rejected. "At a time when the urge for greater social justice is sweeping the world, no employer and least of all newspaper employers, whose efforts play so important a part in shaping national thought, can turn a deaf ear to any suggestions for bettering working conditions of any group of their employees," Mr. Howard told his staff.

Meanwhile lieutenants of Mr. Howard and other less avowedly liberal publishers resorted to backstairs methods of discouraging and thwarting organization. Readers who were told on a certain day that Heywood Broun's column had been eliminated because of its "triviality" were not deceived. Before his tireless efforts helped make the guild what it is today, it had been Broun's privilege to be trivial when he chose. Occasional friction within the guild has showed some publishers which of their employees they may depend upon for the kind of cooperation they demand, and in the words of Newark's Mr. Russell, they have proceeded to make it "very nervous" for the others.

The present problem of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association and the Newspaper Guild is to establish workable precedents for the solution of labor troubles. The varied interpretations of Section 7-a, the uncertain status and meaning of the "consent" clause in the newspaper code, and the weakness of machinery for jurisdiction and compliance make the task difficult. When publishers persuaded Donald Richberg to order Blackwell Smith to ask the Labor Relations Board to reopen the Jennings case, they made much of what they considered the unwarranted assumption of authority by the N. L. R. B. Smith must have discomfited them when his request recognized the N. L. R. B. as the "higher tribunal," implying the right of appeal. For they have insisted that all cases within their industry must end in the Newspaper Industrial Board. As constituted under the code, that board has four employer representatives, and four employee representatives selected by the government Labor Advisory Board. On even minor points of procedure the board has almost invariably been deadlocked along those lines. Provision is made for an impartial chairman who may cast the deciding vote, but labor recognizes this as compulsory arbitration, if there is no appeal.

Stalemate seemed inevitable in the recent hearing before this board of Alphonse Tonietti's charges that Generoso Pope had dropped him from Il Progresso-Italo-Americano because of his guild interests. From the publishers' previous behavior it is a foregone conclusion that any decision that penalizes member publishers will evoke renewed incantations to the "freedom of the press." Before then the public may have learned that this wolf cry can mean, as one newspaperman has remarked, "freedom to oppress."

The use that has been made of the phrase has robbed it of much of its holy ring. Perhaps it is significant that reporters in San Francisco have been so anxious to defend their right to organize. Most of them were required to participate last summer in an unprincipled strike-breaking campaign. Months later in New York Elisha Hanson mentioned the longshoremen's strike in connection with the Jennings case, adding that it would be unthinkable for a paper to take back a "disloyal" reporter at such a time. Some reporters who had been told to describe what they didn't see and to tell as fact what they knew to be lies acquired a different interpretation of disloyalty. Particularly did those who had in mind the resolution passed at the St. Paul convention pledging guild members to "strive tirelessly for integrity of news columns and opportunity to discharge their social responsibility; not stopping until the men and women who write, graphically portray, or edit news have achieved freedom of conscience to report faithfully, when they occur, and refuse by distortion and suppression to create, political, economic, industrial, and military wars."

Reporters who saw their colleagues called out on lawless vigilante raids began to wonder if trade unionism could be any more destructive of their "objectivity." Those who saw their superiors scorn the truth for which they had professed such a burning ardor, when it became necessary to defeat Upton Sinclair, began to doubt if the "regimentation" involved in organization could be any more harmful to creative talents.

Little wonder that the phrases uttered at the first hearing on editorial wages and hours in Washington, uncontradicted because the Newspaper Guild representatives had walked out in protest against NRA interference, sounded hollow to working newspapermen who sat alongside and conscientiously recorded them. In contrast to remarks about the happy employment of all competent men in Pennsylvania, about workers "so proud of their jobs that they spend most of their time off loafing around the shop," about "a zest for their calling that leaps over artificial barriers of time and schedule," the articulate dignity and realism of the newspapermen's withdrawal was refreshing and inspiring to some of us who witnessed it.

If newspapermen are decreasingly susceptible to blandishments about their professionalism, if the incense of printer's ink has lost some of its stupefying influence, the publishers have themselves to thank. Their tactics against the guild when they discovered that it was not just another social club were markedly lacking in finesse. Whatever justification there was for their fear, voiced for them by Marlen Pew in Editor and Publisher, that the "lefties" were in control was not primarily due to a careful study of Karl Marx and of labor movements. Until publishers blundered into teaching them what "class consciousness" meant, most newspapermen were as ready to scoff at the phrase as they were at "rugged individualism." If lines have been drawn, it is because publishers themselves, with notable exceptions, have revealed so completely how they intend to intrench established power that they have pushed to the left all but those who wilt before the benevolent smile, who regard recognitions of merit as favors, or who are calloused with indifference or despair.

A considerable element within the guild honestly believes that the aims of the guild and of the publishers are not incompatible, but there is a difference as to the means of reconciliation. The president of the St. Louis chapter resigned recently because he felt that strikes were unprofessional. A New York Guild member suggested in open meeting that the organization might well take a cue from recent events in Washington and seek "gentlemen's agreements" behind closed doors. "We're not that cynical yet," was the reply of Carl Randau, chapter president.

The present position of the guild leadership seems to be the only tenable one so long as the New York Herald Tribune prints editorials congratulating the San Francisco Call-Bulletin on its "courageous and successful stand" in defense of freedom of the press, and so long as Marlen Pew advocates a "professional guild whose power of moral suasion" would "establish, through fact-finding and the processes of conscience, good-will, and dignity, standards of working conditions, pay, and also competency and ethics that no publisher would dare to flout."

While publishers dare to flout the expressed wish of the President and of governmental agencies, the guild, without truculence but with determination, must continue to ask the Donald Richbergs how they propose to "convince the working newspapermen of the country that you are not their active enemy, militant enough to be willing, even, to set yourself in opposition to the President and violate one of his executive orders, in order to serve the publishers."

[Next week: The Newspapers and Child Labor, by Dorothy Dunbar Bromley.]

Labor Notes

Decision in Oil

FOR the first time in the history of the NRA, a labor board, the Petroleum Labor Policy Board, has ordered an employer, the Texas Company, to dissolve a company union. Like many other employers, the Texas Company reacted to Section 7-a by establishing a company union at its refinery at West Tulsa, Oklahoma. The Labor Policy Board, called in to determine a representation dispute, conducted an election and ascertained that a "heavy majority" of the workers were opposed to the company union and in favor of being represented by the International Association of Oil Field, Gas Well, and Refinery Workers (A. F. of L.). The board thereupon issued an appropriate certification to the effect that 74 per cent of the production employees of the West Tulsa Refinery "had duly chosen as their accredited representatives for collective bargaining" the international president and secretary of the trade union. Blandly disregarding both the referendum result and the board's certification based thereon, the employer proceeded to call for an election of representatives under the employee-representation plan. The excuse offered was that the plan would serve the needs of the minority group which stood opposed to representation by the trade union, but a close analysis of the plan reveals that it creates, in effect, a situation in which the minority can overrule the will of the majority in collective bargaining and in which the employer can impose a closed non-union shop upon the workers. The Labor Policy Board's decision states the issue in simple language: "Has the Texas Company the right to impose upon its employees, after they have freely expressed by secret ballot their choice as to representation for collective bargaining, an organization of the company's choosing? The answer is clear: the company has no such right." Having laid the theoretical groundwork, the board reaches this practical conclusion: "The employee-representation plan, having been rejected by the employees and having thereafter been imposed upon them by the company, therefore should be discontinued. . . . Its continued existence makes impossible the realization by the employees of the rights which are guaranteed to them under the NIRA and the petroleum code." Unfortunately, there is little reason to suppose that the Texas Company will comply with the decision and destroy the creature of its own making.

Toledo Carries On

SEVEN months after the Battle of Toledo, word comes that the working force of the Electric Auto-Lite Company is organized 100 per cent. Every worker in that plant carries a card in the Automobile Workers' federal union, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. Progressives, under the inspiration of the American Workers' Party (now the Workers' Party of the United States), are in control of the local. The reactionary local leaders, who sought to sabotage the struggle of last May, have been discarded. When production fell some time ago, the company discharged 100 militants, in violation of the seniority clause of the contract. The union promptly sent the entire group as a committee to interview the management. When the committee of 100 stated in no uncertain terms that any breach of the contract would mean "a large-scale repetition of the battle of last May," the company capitulated. The group was reemployed in toto. The intelligent militancy used in Toledo gives some indication of what the A. F. of L. might have accomplished in the automobile industry had it not chosen to rely on the government.

Books and Drama

Tugwell Explains the New Deal

The Battle for Democracy. By Rexford Guy Tugwell. Columbia University Press. $3.

REXFORD TUGWELL refers to himself in this book as the New Deal's goat. Fortunately he seems to be a pet goat. By a well-known operation for avoiding the agonies of thought, a personality has been substituted for a complex of ideas and policies, and our author has become the symbol for all that is held to be sinister and dangerous in the Administration. For a year and more Mark Sullivan has been pounding his jungle drum and weaving anti-Tugwell spells. Conservative editorial writers have counted that day lost when the nexus between Moscow and Tugwell was not viewed and reviewed with alarm. When he went abroad last fall, they felt that their charms and exorcisms were beginning to work, that Mephisto was on his way out. Imagine the consternation of the shamans to discover him on his return wallowing like a porpoise in the President's swimming bath at Warm Springs. A year of myth-making gone for naught.

In this book of essays the literate may find soon enough what Tugwell really does stand for. Here is his philosophy, his goal, his method, sharp as the nose on one's face, consistent and emphatic. There is no trace of sedition, sinister plotting, revolution, dogmatic radicalism, to be found in this man's mind at all. If anything, he is too tolerant and reasonable.

His central thesis is that free competition has failed as an economic provider, owing to technological progress. The abortive compound of monopoly and limited competition, plus ruinous free competition for farmers and little men, which usurped the old free market was rapidly becoming unworkable during the 1920's, and broke down altogether in 1929. In place of a flexible price structure, with prices tending to follow costs downward as technical efficiency gained, dams, barriers, rigidities have formed a monstrous structure of unbalanced prices. The railroads, power companies, steel manufacturers, and others have held their rates and prices, while farmers, unorganized for price maintenance, have watched the commercial values of their wheat and cotton go rushing over Niagara. When the farmer's prices fall, he tends to produce as much or more, in an attempt to keep his cash income from declining. This operates of course to pile up agricultural surpluses and drive prices even farther down. When the large industrialist, on the other hand, is faced with falling prices due to a threatened surplus, he begins instantly to produce less. He cuts down his force, flings canvas over batteries of machines, and gets ready to ride out the storm on his accumulated surplus. He seeks to hold the price level by creating an artificial scarcity, and only too often he succeeds. His competitors, if any, seem frequently to be governed by the same impulse.

The simplest explanation of the AAA is that it is an attempt to give to farmers that ability to hold prices which large sections of industry already possess, and thus to steam out one great gummy kink in the price fabric. Permanently, of course, it does not solve the problem.

All that has gone before March, 1933, Tugwell characterizes as the Old Order. He does not like it because of its perversion of human values, but that he discounts as the personal and perhaps sentimental judgment of one who was brought up amid the simple virtues of a pre-machine rural community. The real objection is that the Old Order finally flunked its pragmatic test, and will no longer work. If "natural forces" had had their way as in earlier depressions, the downward spiral would have dropped us into heaven knows what abyss. The closing of every bank was no more than a foretaste.

A new deal, in one form or another, was mandatory. It brought us out of the tailspin. Here and there it gave us a little boost. We come now to our author's theme song: the New Deal, in the form that it has taken under Roosevelt, is not a flight into regimentation and bureaucracy, but only a re-discovery of that democracy on which the Republic was founded. The Constitution of 1787 "was, in effect, a coup d'etat; it was adopted in contravention of the Articles of Confederation because the government set up by those articles was too weak, too decentralized, to meet contemporary economic necessities." Gradually, in the zest of conquering a continent, citizens came more and more to interpret the Constitution as defining a government which was "negative and arresting, not positive and stimulating. Its role was minor and peripheral. It was to prevent interferences with the competitive system. Behind that system was an invisible hand which beneficently guided warring business men to the promotion of the general welfare. . . . The jig is up. The cat is out of the bag. There is no invisible hand. There never was. If the depression has not taught us that, we are incapable of education." Competitive anarchy led to the regimentation of nine citizens out of ten—utter dependence on industry, with no economic security whatever—and finally to a resounding crash. The New Deal, in picking up the debris, is leading us back to the first interpretation of the Constitution—a weapon against economic disintegration. Democracy has been betrayed by industrial anarchy. Democracy and competition are not brothers but enemies. The New Deal is far from a perfect instrument, but it offers the mass of the people the closest approach to democracy they have had since the frontier closed.

I submit that this is a reasonable and logical doctrine. Personally I do not bother much about high-order abstractions like "democracy," "liberty," and "regimentation." What interests me is the specific effect of a given policy on the tangible behavior of individuals or groups. This is the only way I can make "democracy" or "freedom" come alive. But many people seem to feel the need of getting their large generalizations in order, and if Tugwell cannot convince them that the New Deal is not an assault on democracy and on the best in the American tradition, nobody can.

The various attempts of the New Deal to revive this conception of democracy are described in some detail. We find essays and speeches on the TVA, public works, the AAA, the NRA, conservation, land planning, the scientific method in politics, banking, gold, constitutional law, and, quite charmingly, a stirring plea for native wines. On the whole the Administration's goat seems to be thriving on his daily shower of tin cans. One observes that Mr. Tugwell is now actively out on the battle front instead of in the study.

Reading this book, and particularly the challenge to the future which rings from three or four of the essays, a challenge which stirs both the intelligence and the heart, we catch a glimpse of what the "thin red line" in Washington has accomplished since March, 1933. It has put integrity, courage, and intelligence back into a government sapped by a century of deference to the voracious exploiters and despoilers of a continent. To that new spirit at least one honest old gentleman in Washington has uncovered and bowed. "I'm a Tory. I don't believe in these new ideas. But never in my life have I seen a more gallant performance."

Tugwell is a radical in the sense that he has no faith in the workability of the Old Order. He is not a radical in the sense that he wants to socialize everything overnight. He is without dogmas and without prejudices, except a general and wholesome prejudice in favor of "human beings, as against the things human beings use." He calls himself an experimentalist and really believes in the scientific method as applied to economics. Therefore he has no plan to save the world—one of the few citizens of the Republic so empty-handed. But he is keen for facts, research, administrative technique, knowledge, to handle this situation and that, as slices of the Old Order fall into the sea. He is not primarily interested in attacking the profit system. He is interested in driving foundations for a new system as capitalism relinquishes its responsibility. (Already it has relinquished responsibility for the provisioning of a fifth of the American population, and has failed to produce, in the last five years, $300,000,000,000 worth of goods for which the physical plant was fully equipped.)

Probably, within the next decade, at least a third to a half of all economic activity must become a collective enterprise, not because Tugwell wants it or the President wants it or the Communist Party wants it, but because the power age demands it. To sweat and work and plan for that gigantic transfer is more useful and more realistic than calling portly gentlemen hard names. Perhaps Tugwell, like many of the Brain Trust, does not fit into the classification of radical versus conservative at all. He is an engineer of transition from automatic capitalism to some new system.

STUART CHASE

Germany's Psychosis

The Tragedy of a Nation. 1918-1934. By Prince Hubertus Loewenstein. The Macmillan Company. $2.25.

OF the numerous books on Germany which have come to my attention during the last year this is one that is interesting because it is different. As the descendant of one of the oldest families of Germany's wealthy Catholic nobility, Prince Loewenstein lived in close personal contact with the process of disintegration he describes. He was eight years old when the World War broke out, and was just unfolding to political consciousness when Weimar decided the way that the Reich was to go. A non-partisan student organization of which he was the leader developed in the young aristocrat a strong sense of social responsibility which led him gradually away from the Centrist Party to which every bond of family allegiance had bound him toward a catholicism of the spirit rather than of the church, a social philosophy which centered in the maintenance of republican institutions against National Socialist terrorism. His young idealism met with the first serious setback when he discovered that the semi-military Reichsbanner in which bourgeois democrats and Centrists stood shoulder to shoulder with the young Social Democrats and trade unionists who were the large majority of its members was not to become the avenging sword of the republic. Hitler's appointment to the Chancellorship convinced the farseeing young intellectual that there was no longer room in the Reich for a man who took his republicanism seriously. He turned his steps to Great Britain and there placed his gifted pen and his ability as a public speaker in the service of the fight against a system which was to him the antithesis of all that life had ever meant.

It is the tragedy of the German nation, says Prince Loewenstein, that "a man with so little personality and so few creative possibilities" could obtain absolute control over the German people; that this man dominates not only physical Germany but the German mind; that it was not only terror, not fear of punishment or other consequences, that turned the Reich into an authoritarian state, but the fact that a large majority of the German people is acting under the spell of a mass psychosis, following a pied piper under a blind compulsion.

Wickham Steed expresses the sense of the book in a single sentence when he says: "The story shows, perhaps more clearly than its author realizes, how feckless had been and were the men who established the German Republic at Weimar in 1918 without laying the foundation deep and sure or troubling earnestly to defend it against the myriad foes whom they left in almost undisturbed possession of the citadel." All that, it is true, has been said before, but always by radicals, left-Socialists, and Communists who fight the moral, social, and political aspects of fascism as incidental by-products of a deeper economic despotism. Prince Loewenstein sees the problem of National Socialism with other eyes, though he arrives, for the moment, at the same conclusion. Impelled by a deeply religious consciousness, he objects to National Socialism for its forcible suppression of the individual, for its fundamental irreligion, for its cruelty to those whose only crime is that they are of a different race—though he is unwilling to absolve the Jews in Germany from all blame for the misfortune which has overtaken them. He is as much opposed to the "so-called associations of irreligious people whose organizations were allied and supported by the Social Democratic Party" as to the "German Christians" of the Third Reich. He condemns the Communists for their negation of political democracy as much as he condemns Hitler for his philosophy of dictatorship.

With Italian fascism he has no serious quarrel. "Of fascism," he says, "it may be said that it at least tries to bring about a certain agreement in the interests of the classes. . . . I felt as certain then as I do today that fascism in Italy could endure without endangering the life of the nation. . . . There is in Italy the furthering and the beginning of historic tasks. . . . a movement to which even its opponents cannot refuse an acknowledgment of success." The chances are that Prince Loewenstein has few objections to the fascism of Dollfuss and Schuschnigg, though he makes no reference to it in the pages of the book.

LUDWIG LORE

Report on the Universe

Through Space and Time. By Sir James Jeans. The Macmillan Company. $3.

THE hopelessness of keeping up with the contributions in science in this nervous age could not be more gloomily shown than by the details in this newest book by Sir James Jeans. But there is nothing that can be done about it. Discovery and analysis will not stop for the psychological convenience of those defeatists who, in their vanity, are worried that they cannot keep up. Books cannot be written that revise themselves automatically. Perhaps the best compromise is not to attempt to be on time; the popularizer should tread cautiously in active regions.

Sir James Jeans looks "through space and time" from a planet whose antiquity is depicted in a clear diagram (page 46) showing the succession of geological and life periods. He indicates vaguely that a billion years ago we had a solid crust to the earth, but that all is unknown, as the planet cooled out of chaos, a billion and a half years ago. Yet within the past year or so Miss Slouka and others have measured the ages of common rocks from western Canada and found them to be 1,750 million years old.

Again, Sir James tells of oil borings that go only "about eight thousand feet down," but several recent explorations have gone beyond ten thousand, even attaining the two-mile mark. The author, describing the upper atmosphere of the earth, tells of the Kennelly-Heaviside layer, which controls radio transmission, and the Appleton layer above it; but the two additional ionospheric layers found by Harvard investigators are apparently too recent for inclusion.

Delays of this sort between the factory and the salesman can be pointed out in abundance. Some are not quite negligible—for instance, the statement that Eros is the asteroid that comes nearest to the earth. But the readers of "Through Space and Time" will lose little in comparison with their gain in knowledge of the universe, for the volume, like its predecessors, is creditably illustrated with photographs and brilliantly illustrated with word pictures.

The book is obviously tuned to its "juvenile auditory," ■■ was the Royal Institution Christmastide lecture on which it is largely based. The mature readers of the earlier volumes by Jeans will gain little from this new volume, except in those chapters on sections of the universe not heretofore treated in detail—The Earth, The Air, The Sky. And for these subjects the general scientific reader can better turn to Stetson's more thorough and not difficult treatment in "Earth, Radio, and the Stars."

HARLOW SHAPLEY

The Old South and the New

America's Tragedy. By James Truslow Adams. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

THE long series of events which began in 1619 when, as John Rolfe quaintly recorded, "Came in a Dutch man of warre that sold us twenty Negars," and which culminated in the American Civil War constitute the subject matter of "America's Tragedy." It is an old story so often told that upon picking up the book the reader will wonder what Mr. Adams can tell that is new. And, indeed, so far as historical data are concerned, he gives us nothing new. But Mr. Adams always brings a fresh point of view and a charming literary style to any subject he touches. A lover of all the arts, he is perhaps most devoted to the art of living. This devotion gives him sympathy for those planters of the Old South whose lives approached the Greek ideal more nearly than those of any other group in American history. True, this is more a traditional than a historical fact, but the wise historian while discounting tradition never ignores it.

In its most bland form tradition had it that there were just three well-defined classes in ante bellum society in the South—the rich planters, the Negro slaves, and the "poor whites." Research during the past two or three decades by such Southern scholars as Bassett, Philipps, Craven, and Dodd, and by the Dutch scholar Den Hollander has pretty well exploded the myth. In 1860 there were only 347,525 slaveholders in the entire South and less than one-half of these owned more than four slaves. If each owner is assumed to be the head of a family of five, then only about one-fourth of the entire population had a direct interest in slaveholding.

The truth is that Southern society was composed of the normal imperceptible gradations which have always characterized American society in general. There were "poor whites" of an abnormally shiftless sort, poor in spirit, unambitious, woefully ignorant, sick with malaria and perhaps hookworm. Mr. Adams estimates this group as about 5 per cent of the total white population. This is a low estimate, but the number certainly did not exceed 10 per cent or about six hundred thousand people out of approximately six million. A million and a half of the Southern whites had a direct interest in slavery, but only a tenth of these belonged to "planter" families, if we take the ownership of twenty slaves as the minimum requirement for eligibility to that favored classification. However, if we deduct the million and a half members of slave-owning families and the six hundred thousand "poor whites" from the total white population, we have about four million people who were neither slave-owners nor "poor whites." To be sure very few of these were rich and all were white, but they were not "poor whites" in quotations unless we are ready to designate by this opprobrious term about 75 per cent of the American population of any period in our history. These four million differed in only one respect from similarly situated small farmers and mechanics in the North, and that was in the depth of their racial antagonism toward the Negro. It was fundamentally on that account and not because of adherence to any school of constitutional interpretation that many of the young men from this group "bared their breasts to Yankee bullets" in 1861-65 and gave substance to the taunt that on the Southern side at least the fratricidal struggle was a "rich man's war and a poor man's fight." That was their tragedy then, as it is the tragedy of their descendants now who permit the dividing racial issue to carry more weight than the unifying force of similar economic status.

But these "rich men" whose war it was, what of them? A little rapid calculation shows that only 37,662 men (we might say families) owned twenty or more slaves each; of these, 7,929 owned over fifty, and of the latter only 1,733 owned over a hundred each. It was these men, their wives and older children, particularly in the eleven States which formed the Confederacy, who dominated politics and gave tone to Southern society. They were more group or class conscious than farmers in general, but except for "touchiness" with respect to their "peculiar institution" they were not nearly so like-minded as bankers or manufacturers are today or perhaps were at that time. Only a very few were of cavalier or even English gentry origin, although nearly all pretended or sincerely believed themselves to be. Many, particularly in the lower South, were new-rich plutocrats, "cotton snobs," as they were called, who possessed all the blatant and grotesque characteristics of that fraternity in all times and places.

Nevertheless [says Mr. Adams], the old planter aristocracy had an assured position and influence such as no other class in America had. . . .

With the formation of this stable society had come the formation, conscious or unconscious, of the Southern philosophy of life which led directly to an art of life. It was only in the South that the belief in the fully rounded life took root and flourished. Perhaps no people have cared less for mere worldly success than the leaders of the old plantation South. The owner of a big plantation, as also its mistress, had ample responsibility, but there was also leisure; and leisure and what to do with it were as important as work, because the Southerner's main preoccupation was how to live a full life.

If the destruction of this class was a tragedy, more tragic still was the subsequent cultural conquest of the South by the North. Beginning in the eighties there arose the "New South" school which believed salvation lay in imitation of the conquerors. The South was, so to speak, Americanized. Instead of the old noblesse oblige of the best of the Southern gentlemen, imitating sometimes a bit too consciously and a little ridiculously Sir Walter's knightly heroes, there arose business men of the Northern type who resembled the old planters only in that their minds were conditioned toward labor in general as the masters' had been toward slaves—a lower order of people to be treated humanely so long as they remained properly docile and grateful for small favors but to be strictly disciplined when obstreperous or insurrectionary.

In protest against the glorification of the "New South" idea there has recently arisen a group of Southerners—the authors of "I'll Take My Stand," for example—who would put the South back upon its historic agrarian path. With these talented and altogether charming gentlemen Mr. Adams, in common with many unhappy Americans, South and North, has much sympathy. However, from the fulness of his wisdom and understanding he advises them that while they, like himself, may dislike the machine age, nevertheless:

... it is impossible to turn the hands of the clock of history backward. . . . To insist today upon an agrarian civilization as our sole salvation is to attempt to lead not only an impossible but a parasitic life. . . . What those of us who are born into this confused age of machines, advertising, new wants, and universal suffrage have to do is to try to bring some order out of the chaos of moral values, and in an irretrievably altered world to reassert the philosophy of the Old South, to bring the new democracies to see that the values of the good life are other than material.

BENJAMIN B. KENDRICK

Study of a Family

Papa Pasquier. By Georges Duhamel. Harper and Brothers. $2.

GEORGES DUHAMEL enjoys a considerable reputation in France and has been the winner of many of its various literary prizes. Perhaps he is best known to Americans for his "Scènes de la Vie Future," which is a bitter indictment of this country and of its increasing influence upon the rest of the world. However, "Papa Pasquier," the first of what promises to be a series of many volumes, is as wise and tolerant a study of the petit-bourgeois as one is likely to find. It is written in the first person, and that person, in the prologue, explains himself and his purpose in writing his mémoires with admirable lucidity. He is a biologist of international fame, and this story of his childhood and of his family gives one the impression that M. Duhamel evidently strives for. One feels that this understanding person, who learned through the study of science not to be surprised by any manifestation of life, and who is consequently both gentle in his cynicism and vital in his sympathies, is addressing his readers as he would a company of friends at his club. A reader will not find here the refinements, the elaborate finesse, of Proust, the snobbishness or purple passages of Galsworthy, or any suggestion of the metaphysical concerns of Mann. The story is simple and straightforward, and told in a like manner. No character is obscure and none is related to preconceptions of the author or presented as a symbol. In short, a scientific mind deals with the members of the Pasquier family and a warm heart judges them.

The autobiography begins when Laurent Pasquier is nine years old. The preceding years are vague in the mind of the scrupulous scientist; but in the winter of 1888 the family learned of a possible inheritance, and the boy was made conscious of a world outside his own by the notary in Havre (for whom the book is better named in French) whose letters are expected daily. It is two years before a letter and half the money comes to them, before the death of one aunt in Peru (another has yet to be heard from) can be established. In that time the theme of the notary repeats itself in the family's life like a leit-motif, and a counterpoint of vicissitudes, of debts and illnesses, optimisms and pessimisms, is sometimes harshly, sometimes delicately played. Meanwhile, the anticipated money is almost entirely dissipated in advance. Through it all, the brave spirit of the mother holds the members of the family together, while the quick, illogical, highly picturesque explosions of the father threaten to send them adrift. With homely wisdom and considerable wit the author tells the story of this family, placing proper emphasis upon the parents who lived at a time when they could importantly influence their children, and lesser emphasis upon the children themselves, and their neighbors who lived in the same building and whose lives were bound to impinge on their own. Above all, the family appears as an inviolate entity, a microcosm; and because of the skilful writing of Duhamel, whose volume is

BARGAINS IN BOOKS

Up to 75% Off Former Prices

OFFERED BY AMERICA'S OLDEST MAIL ORDER BOOK HOUSE

To clear out the small quantities which remain on hand, the following titles have been marked-down as much as 75% off original prices. Each is brand-new, perfect in every way, a permanent addition to your library. Orders accepted subject to prior sale.

Limited Quantities of Each Title

1. DON QUIXOTE, by Cervantes. Profusely illustrated with 400 drawings by the famous Gustave Doré. Boxed. (12.50) 1.98
2. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL'S WORKS. (Centenary Edition) in 7 handsome maroon linen vols., stamped in gold. (21.00) 5.95

3. The Most Amazing Price Reduction in the History of Publishing

Memoirs of Jacques Casanova

The brilliant autobiography of "history's most thrilling character,"—the world's greatest lover, one of the keenest intellects of the Eighteenth Century. Translated by Arthur Machen. Introduction by Arthur Symons.

2300 pages—Formerly in 11 vols., at $125.00
Now . . . Complete in 2 vols., at only..... 3.98

ILLUSTRATED BY ROCKWELL KENT

4. THE GREATEST ARCHITECT OF THE RENAISSANCE—PERUZZI OF SIENA. By W. W. Kent, Member of American Institute of Architects. Illustrated with 89 full-page plates. ($7.50). Only..... 89c
5. KIPLING'S COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS (1885-1926). 862 pages. Boxed $7.50 1.98
6. PICTURESQUE AMERICA, by John Francis Kane. Contains over 250 fascinating photographs. America's amazing scenic marvels. Originally called a bargain at $15; now brought up to date and handsomely bound at special reduced price 2.98
7. THE WORK, WEALTH AND HAPPINESS OF MANKIND, by H. G. Wells. First edition. 2 vols. illus. ($7.50). The set 1.98
8. ARCHITECTURE TODAY, by Hitchcock and Johnson. 133 pages of illustrations, 80 being of contemporary buildings throughout the world. ($5.00) 1.98
9. GENUINE ANTIQUE FURNITURE. 200 illustrations. A fascinating book about a fascinating art. ($6.00) 2.75
10. TWELVE-INCH GLOBE. Measures 17 inches from top to base. Up to the minute in detail. Printed in 10 colors. Late 1934 edition ($11.75) 3.98
11. BI-SEXUAL LOVE, by Dr. William Stekel. Authorized translation by Dr. James S. Van Teslaar. ($5.00) 1.69
12. THE HOMOSEXUAL NEUROSIS, by Dr. William Stekel. Authorized translation by Dr. James S. Van Teslaar. ($5.00) 1.69

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION

Established 1884

367-373 Fourth Ave., New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $..... for which please send me the books I have circled below:

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12

(Mark circles around books desired)

☐ Please send me FREE Catalogue No. 257-N.

Name

Address

City..... State.....

□ PLAYS □ DANCE □

Joseph Wood Krutch includes The Group Theatre in his Nation Honor Role "for its consistent and successful effort to take seriously all the arts of the theater, and, specifically, for its current production, 'Gold Eagle Guy'."

Belasco Theatre, 44th St., E. of B'way, Mats. Thurs. & Sat.

THEATRE UNION'S NEW PLAY

SAILORS of CATTARO

"The third and much the best offering by the Theatre Union."

—Joseph Wood Krutch, The Nation.

CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE, 14th Street and 6th Avenue

Prices 30c ■ $1.50. Eves. 8:45; Matinees Tues. and Sat. 2:45

For information on reduced rates for Benefit Theatre Parties call Watkins 9-2050.

"A genuine contribution to the American theater."—Gabriel, American,
HERMAN SHUMLIN presents

The Children's Hour

By LILLIAN HELLMAN

MAXINE ELLIOTT'S THEATRE WEST 39th STREET
Evenings 8:30—50c to $3. Matinees Wed. and Sat.—2:40—50c to $2.

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

MAXWELL ANDERSON'S play

VALLEY FORGE

with PHILIP MERIVALE

GUILD THEATRE, 52nd Street, West of Broadway.
Evenings 8:40. Matinees, Thurs. and Sat. 2:40.

S. N. BEHRMAN'S play

RAIN FROM HEAVEN

with JANE COWL
and JOHN HALLIDAY

GOLDEN THEATRE, 45th Street, West of Broadway.
Evenings 8:30. Matinees Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

Stars of Stage and Screen will appear and perform ■ ■

GALA ENTERTAINMENT and DANCE

Friday Evening, January 18th

Savoy Ballroom, Lenox Ave. and 140th St.

HEYWOOD BROWN, Master of Ceremonies

TWO ORCHESTRAS — DANCING UNTIL 3

Tickets 75c at Columbia Bookstore,
N. Y. U. Bookstore, New Masses,
31 E. 27th St.

Auspices: Comm. Support League of Struggle for Negro Rights and Marine Workers' Comm.

□ BOOKS □

The SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE ■ By I. E. Hutton, M. D.

"Dr. Ira Wile describes the book as a clear, succinct, non-emotional, authoritative and conservative exposition of the practical factors involved in making marriage successful on the sexual level. That describes the book exactly. . . . It is primarily concerned with the conduct of the honeymoon and with the technique of the sexual performance."—Dr. Morris Fishbein.
Price $2.00 (postage 15c extra) Recommended by Physicians

EMERSON BOOKS, Inc., 333 Sixth Ave., New York City

See JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says column on page 84

ably translated by Samuel Putnam, it is a family in whose lives the reader is able to participate and will want to participate further.
LEONARD AMSTER

Shorter Notices

The Art of the Novel. By Henry James. With an Introduction by Richard P. Blackmur. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

R. P. Blackmur, one of the younger American critics who have been attempting to restore Henry James to the position denied him by the sociological criticism of the last generation, has performed a useful service in bringing together, within the compass of a single volume, the eighteen prefaces written by James for the rare and expensive New York Edition of his works. The advantage of having these prefaces collected in this way, however, is not only one of convenience. It helps one better to realize the completeness and general nature of James's aesthetic of fiction. Comparing James with Proust and Joyce, Mr. Blackmur makes this penetrating distinction: "The difference is that writers who follow Joyce or Proust tend to absorb their subjects, their social attitudes, and their personal styles and accomplish competent derivative work in so doing, while the followers of James absorb something of a technical mastery good for any subject, any attitude, any style." Taken as a whole, this collection of James's prefaces constitutes the most profound manual of the art of fiction in the language.

Modern Things. Edited by Parker Tyler. The Galleon Press. $2.

The editor of this anthology seems unaware that neither the tendencies described in his introduction nor the poets illustrating these tendencies are quite so "modern" as they were fifteen or even ten years ago. Modern values are still undoubtedly in flux, as we are once again reminded, but it is not so certain that the response to this situation in poetry is any longer the "tentacular resiliency" manifested in H. R. Hays, "the effect of soundlessness" in Charles Ford, or the Rimbaudian hallucination cultivated by the editor himself. Poetry is "a realm of terrible decisiveness," as Mr. Tyler says, and the chief trouble with most of these young poets is that they are too little decided about anything. Of course they are decided about their literary influences, and half of the book is devoted to contributions by T. S. Eliot, Ezra Pound, E. E. Cummings, and other poets of the generation which capitalized the "flux." But literary values are not the same as philosophical values; and a poet of today cannot appropriate the literary values of the last generation without subscribing to the philosophical values—or the lack of them—on which that generation operated. The two exceptions that must be made are Harold Rosenberg and Lionel Abel, in both of whom the effort to decide produces a tension which gives a passionate intensity to their work. And it is interesting to note that Mr. Abel's poetry, which is freshest in reflective feeling, is also the least derivative in form and style.

You Can't Sleep Here. By Edward Newhouse. The Macaulay Company. $2.

Despite the fact that Mr. Newhouse has not rid himself of certain outmoded technical and stylistic influences and not yet altogether assimilated his materials, he has written one of the more readable novels of the season. Beginning as one of those first-person narratives cast in the Hemingway mood of romantic frustration, the book shifts rather abruptly to the depiction of the kind of life which we find in Jack Conroy, Meridel LeSueur, and other more recent chroniclers of the depression. The rather too smart-aleck narrator, discouraged at not finding a job, takes up lodgings in one of New York's Hoovervilles and joins in a demonstration against the police. Although the elements of the violent and the sensational inherent in the subject are unnecessarily stressed toward the end, Mr. Newhouse has many of the gifts of the good story-teller. The greatest defect of the book is in the style, which reflects a sensibility not yet completely liberated from the inverted self-pity of the hard-boiled attitude. But Mr. Newhouse, who is a very young writer, has had the wisdom to choose that direction which is likely to lead to the most profitable results for the novel in the immediate future.

Modern Thought and Literature in France. By Régis Michaud. Funk and Wagnalls Company. $2.

Written for American readers and with an American point of view, this survey by a professor of French literature at the University of Illinois is chiefly remarkable as a feat of order and condensation. It manages to catalogue the more important movements and figures in French cultural history of the last thirty years and to make a few remarks about each within a minimum of space. For the reader wholly unfamiliar with the field the book will have a certain usefulness, but for others its treatment of the separate movements and men will undoubtedly seem superficial. As is usually the case in books of this sort, there is insufficient discrimination between writers belonging to the same movement, and a truly remarkable poet like Pierre-Jean Jouve is hardly distinguished from a poet like Pierre Reverdy.

Morning Shows the Day. By Helen Hull. Coward-McCann. $2.50.

Helen Hull knows how to write. She builds a novel with economy and dramatic skill. She has written here another book about Main Street as it exists and determines the lives of high-school boys and girls. She understands these young people and sees with swift irony just what their possibilities are. But her book has the limitations that any such realistic study of youth is likely to have: it rises to no heights either of passion or of anguish. The result of this dead-level quality is a little dull.

Drama

Life Keeps Going After Fifty

SOME years ago Samson Raphaelson sprang into fame and fortune with a sentimental melodrama entitled "The Jazz Singer." After a long run on Broadway it reappeared as the first "one hundred per cent talking picture," and since then Mr. Raphaelson has spent most of his time in Hollywood except for brief periods during which new dramatic works from his pen were opened and closed in the East. One of them, called "Young Love," had admirers, among whom I numbered myself, but its life was almost as brief as the life of the others and its author might have been pardoned a certain discouragement. Unless, however, all signs fail, persistence is about to reap its reward, and "Accent on Youth" (Plymouth Theater) will be a very comfortable success—thanks to a gratifying thesis, an admirable production, and some extremely amusing writing.

The first thing one notices in Mr. Raphaelson is an almost dangerously sure sense of the theater. That, of course, was evident in "The Jazz Singer," where it operated upon the level of popular sentiment, but it is even more conspicuous when it appears in the new play as an uncanny gift for manipulating a sophisticated story in the manner best calculated to bring to

Just Published

Social Organization and Disorganization

By

STUART ALFRED QUEEN

Washington University

WALTER BLAINE BODENHAFFER

Washington University

AND

ERNEST BOULDIN HARPER

Vanderbilt University

This notable book is already attracting the attention of teachers, students, social workers and community leaders. It is probably the outstanding book in its field.

672 PAGES $3.50

THOMAS Y. CROWELL COMPANY

393 FOURTH AVENUE

NEW YORK

Curious Twists of the Libido

IS THE TITLE OF THE FEATURE ARTICLE IN THE MODERN PSYCHOLOGIST

The author, a well-known psychiatrist, presents to the student of psychology and the intelligent layman actual case studies from the perverse and twisted lives of those whom society considers abnormal. The author feels that throwing open the hidden lives of these "decadents" will make for better understanding.

AMONG OTHER ARTICLES IN

THE MODERN PSYCHOLOGIST

What Makes Personality.....Edward Podolsky, M.D.
Is Psychology a Science?.....Grace Adams, Ph.D.
Do You Believe in Hunches?.....Robert Kingman, M.D.
A Plea for Mental Hygiene.....Leon Reznikoff, M.D.
The Psychology of the Gigolo.....W. Beran Wolfe, M.D.
Enclose ONE DOLLAR with this ad for a five-month trial subscription.

Address THE MODERN PSYCHOLOGIST
325 WEST 103rd STREET NEW YORK CITY

The Washington Maelstrom

Raymond Gram Swing in next week's Nation continues his shrewdly observant weekly analysis of politics and personalities in Washington.

□ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says □

ACCENT ON YOUTH. Plymouth Theater. Reviewed in this issue.

ANYTHING GOES. Alvin Theater. Victor Moore ■ Public Enemy No. 13 in a No. 1 musical revue, with Ethel Merman at her best.

GOLD EAGLE GUY. Morosco Theater. How ■ ruthless superman built ■ shipping empire on the West Coast. Excellent production by the Group Theater of ■ forceful and picturesque drama, with ■ fine performance by J. Edward Bromberg. One of the best dramas of the season.

LIFE BEGINS AT 8:40. Winter Garden. Disputes with "Anything Goes" for first place among the revues.

MERRILY WE ROLL ALONG. Music Box Theater. One of the outstanding hits and very good indeed if you don't mind having your serious plays use a little staycomb in their hair. By George Kaufman and Moss Hart, who excoriate cheap success without forgetting to put in ■ few wisecracks where they will do most good.

ODE TO LIBERTY. Lyceum Theater. Gilbert Miller's characteristically suave production of ■ rather trifling French play in which Ina Claire tames ■ fugitive Communist through love—of the profane variety.

PAGE MISS GLORY. Mansfield Theater. Dorothy Hall in ■ rough and ready satire on beauty contests which isn't too particular how it gets its laughs, but gets them anyway.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE. Henry Miller's Theater. Much like the above but about ■ movie star this time and perhaps a trifle less mechanical.

POST ROAD. Masque Theater. Novel and exciting crook melodrama which begins as ■ quiet domestic comedy but has lots of surprises up its sleeve.

RAIN FROM HEAVEN. Golden Theater. Perhaps the best—and certainly the most substantial—of S. N. Behrman's excellent comedies. With Jane Cowl as ■ charming embodiment of urbanity and tolerance in a world seemingly about to lose both.

REVENGE WITH MUSIC. New Amsterdam Theater. Charles Winninger, Rex O'Malley, and Libby Holman in a lavish and generally entertaining operetta with lots of comedy and some good dancing in ■ more or less Spanish manner.

ROMEO AND JULIET. Martin Beck Theater. Swift and beautiful production with Katharine Cornell ■ Juliet, Basil Rathbone ■ Romeo, Edith Evans as the Nurse, and Brian Aherne ■ Mercutio.

SAILORS OF CATTARO. Civic Repertory Theater. The third and much the best offering by the Theater Union, which goes in for plays with ■ revolutionary purpose. This one is all about ■ mutiny on board an Austrian man-of-war, and it is first rate as ■ play, quite aside from the red-flag waving.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR. Maxine Elliott's Theater. Tense but grim drama about ■ fiendishly perverse child, who is played with extraordinary force by Florence McGee. One of the most-discussed plays of the year.

THE DISTAFF SIDE. Booth Theater. A sizable hit by John Van Druten, but one which seemed unnecessarily tame to me. With Sybil Thorndike.

THE FARMER TAKES A WIFE. Forty-sixth Street Theater. Picturesque and remarkably engaging comedy by Frank Elser and Marc Connelly about the great days of the Erie Canal. To me one of the most enjoyable evenings of the season.

VALLEY FORGE. Guild Theater. Maxwell Anderson's entertaining drama about George Washington, with Philip Merivale as the Father of His Country. The whole thing seemed very pleasantly theatrical to me, but there are many who take it more seriously without liking it any the less.

WITHIN THE GATES. National Theater. Sean O'Casey's poetic and symbolic morality play about the Dreamer, the Bishop, and the Young Whore in Hyde Park. According to many good critics it is the great modern play, but I found it ■ bit pretentious.

the eye as well as to the ear everything it is capable of yielding. Once one of the characters mentions Molnar, and the reference is inevitable, for Mr. Raphaelson has Molnar's delight in manipulating his puppets and in giving an additional fillip to his effects by calling attention to their artificiality just at the moment when his audience has been betrayed into taking them with entire seriousness. Nor is the comparison altogether in the older dramatist's favor. His talents sometimes offend; he is too complacently slick, too condescendingly superior. But Mr. Raphaelson has a youthful enthusiasm and a humorous zest which effectively dispose of any suggestion of condescension. He is not showing off but doing something a great deal more ingratiating than that can be. He is inviting us to have a good time along with him, and the fact makes all the difference in the world. When the lady who was de trop marched off with the flowers which a more welcome rival had just put in the wastebasket, I had a vague sense that I had seen that done before, but when the heroine asked innocently, "Were those her flowers?" and the lover replied ruefully, "Yes, but that's my wastebasket," the effect was pure fun.

As to the gratifying thesis which I referred to above, it is simply that ■ middle-aged man, in this case past fifty, can sometimes be more attractive to ■ young girl than green and muscular youth. The young members of the audience will hardly resent the suggestion because they will know in their hearts that they have not ■ great deal to fear, but dramatic critics, as well as the majority of paying customers, are commonly approaching an uncertain age, and it is no small comfort to be assured that even if one has no intention of marrying one's beautiful secretary, at least the thing might be done with some fair chance of success. There was no burst of applause at the end of the big scene, in which the secretary here in question expatiated with eloquence upon the dulness of youth and described the tedium involved in following an athlete from tennis court, to golf links, to swimming pool, only to find when night came that he had to exercise in his bedchamber ■ couple of muscles somehow overlooked during the day. There was, I say, no burst of applause, since we of forty and more have learned to hide our feelings. But unless I am very much mistaken, the baldish gentleman next to me gripped the arms of his chair and there was ■ muffled "Ah!" somewhere in the darkness behind. In the lobby a bit later I heard one young thing remark to ■ youth whose charms were not obvious to me, "I don't see how she could have fallen for that old bird," but fortunately her words can have reached few ears, and Mr. Raphaelson had been most convincing. Thanks to him, to Constance Cummings as the girl, to Nicholas Hannen as the well-preserved man, and to the direction of Ben Levy, who once wrote "Springtime for Henry," there is a very pleasant evening in the theater awaiting almost anybody at the Plymouth. And when I say "in the theater" I am not using ■ conventional phrase. "Accent on Youth" is theater spelled with a capital, set in italics, and inclosed in quotation marks.

Any musical revue which includes Bobby Clark and his friend McCullough gets off on the right foot so far as I am concerned. "Thumbs Up" (St. James Theater) has the good judgment to do just this, besides supplying such other pleasant persons as Eddie Dowling, Ray Dooley, and Hal LeRoy. It's a bit old-fashioned—as when, for example, a tenor dreaming of the past before ■ genuine oil painting of his beloved is visited in ■ dream by a succession of beautiful female memories; it is also a bit vaudevillistic and distinctly not in the smartest tradition. But it is not bad entertainment. The Pickens sisters are also there to sing in their usual confidential manner and to remind me again how God in His providence seems always to see to it that theatrically inclined sisters have voices appropriate to ■ trio or quartet.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXL

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 23, 1935

No. 3629

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	85
EDITORIALS:
What Does the Supreme Court Mean?	87
Our Navy Madness	88
France, Italy, and Abyssinia	89
Who Reads What—and Why	90
ISSUES AND MEN. THE RUSSIAN MURDERS AGAIN. By Oswald Garrison Villard	91
CARTOON: HUEY. By Eva Herrmann	92
THE BIGGEST SHOW ON EARTH. By Margaret Marshall	93
JUSTICE IN THE VIRGIN ISLANDS. By R. G. S.	95
ELECTION IN THE SAAR. By Jack Fischer	96
THE MENACE OF HUEY LONG. III. HIS BID FOR NATIONAL POWER. By Raymond Gram Swing	98
A MERGER FOR MUSIC. By B. H. Haggin	100
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	101
CORRESPONDENCE	102
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
How Radical Are the Farmers? By James Rorty	104
A Cross-Section of Insecurity. By Evelyn Seeley	106
Labor Notes	107
BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS:
Values and Manners for Radicals. By Harry Elmer Barnes	108
Unemployment Insurance in Great Britain. By Raymond Gram Swing	109
New Lyrics for Old. By Florence Codman	109
The Power Theory of Politics. By George E. G. Catlin	110
The Career of Alfred Stieglitz. By Eric Estorick	110
Drama: Heartbreak House. By Joseph Wood Krutch	111
Films: Too Good to Be True. By William Troy	112
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	112

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher.
Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

THE RESULTS of the Saar plebiscite come as a severe shock to those who had hoped for a heavy vote of protest against Nazi rule in the Reich. While a decisive German victory had been expected, no one except the Nazis themselves had predicted such an overwhelming triumph. To what extent the poll represents a direct indorsement of Hitler and to what extent it merely reflects the fact that Saarlanders are Germans—and proud of it—is impossible to ascertain from this distance. Fear, intimidation, and subterranean pressure doubtless affected many voters, while others may have simply desired to be on the band-wagon. Nevertheless, the fact remains that in an election which was as free as it could possibly have been made, with able neutral supervision and with every material advantage favoring a status quo vote, the inhabitants of the Saar indicated a desire to pass under Nazi rule by a majority almost identical with that which Hitler obtained in the German plebiscite last summer. The brunt of the defeat will naturally fall on the 9 per cent who had the courage and integrity to vote against return to Germany. As indicated in the dispatch from our special correspondent, which appears on another page, tens of thousands of these will choose the rigors of exile rather than risk the terror of Nazi concentration camps, or will continue the opposition underground. If it were not for the plight of this minority, we should derive at least a measure of satisfaction from the prospect of a speedy and permanent settlement of the whole problem of the Saar. In the face of such an overwhelming expression of opinion it is inconceivable that the League should act otherwise than to restore the territory to Germany at an early date. Certainly no other action would be consistent with the peace of Europe.

WHATEVER the Supreme Court decides in the gold-clause case, it has pushed the judiciary into the forefront as an equal third in the American scheme of government. In doing so it is giving Washington a fright comparable only to the dark days in London before England abandoned the gold standard. The questions asked by some justices indicated, as much as such questions can, that they were not being convinced of the constitutionality of the government's gold policy. If the court sustains the gold clause, the effects will be far-reaching indeed. Washington, of course, is alarmed, and its estimate of the consequences may be exaggerated. The national debt, it is stated, would rise by seventeen billions, and give a direct stimulus to inflation. Corporations with gold bonds would have to pay $1.69 for every $1 now owing, affecting obligations estimated by Attorney General Cummings at a hundred billions. And corporations unable to raise the additional 69 cents would be thrown into bankruptcy, their property would fall to first-mortgage holders, and all second mortgages would be wiped out. Many people cannot believe the court will stand by the Constitution if it throws the country into such chaos, and yet if that is not the intention they cannot understand why such questions were asked. They were anything but reassured by the oil decision, which we discuss on another page, and can only conclude that the court has an idea that the Constitution is in even greater danger from future Presidents than from the present one, and that timely precautions must be taken.

IN THEORY the Administration would not be utterly paralyzed by an unfavorable decision. The President could declare an emergency under the remaining vestiges of the war-time powers of his office. (The thought of the Supreme Court precipitating a national emergency is a novelty in American life.) This would give him a breathing spell, during which Congress might rush through an amendment of the Constitution to be hurried for immediate action to the state legislatures, most of them now in session. Or the President could ask Congress to increase the number of justices on the court, and appoint enough men ready to give his Administration legal standing, though this strikes us as a repugnant idea. Or legislation might be drafted to meet the precise objections of the court if its decision is worded with a helpful eye to redrafting. A further possibility is to restore the gold content of the dollar, for which there is now gold enough, though this would initiate a new era of deflation, which, however brief, would certainly give the country an undesirable sense of defeat. An adverse decision would appear to seal the fate of all the rest of the New Deal legislation, and the country would be rubbing its nose in the fact that the Constitution is not suited to modern needs. If this could be done without a panic it might be a tremendous boon. We must confess that we cannot believe the Supreme Court will assert itself to this extent. But we also did not believe the justices would ask questions in public in a way to bring the capital to the brink of panic.

ONCE MORE rumors are afloat of impending negotiations for currency stabilization. This time it is suggested that France is seeking a slight devaluation of the franc as part of a general stabilization pact. From the standpoint of the gold bloc some action is imperative. In the face of relentless competition from the countries which have depreciated their currencies, economic conditions in France, Belgium, Holland, and Italy have grown worse in the past year. For these countries it is a choice between international stabilization and a unilateral devaluation of their own currencies that would accentuate the existing chaos. No solution can be worked out without the whole-hearted cooperation of the United States. Great Britain would unquestionably assent to stabilization of the pound if assured that the basis of stabilization would be the true purchasing-power parity of the respective currencies and not an artificial figure arrived at through a prolonged currency war. But it cannot be expected to sanction an arrangement which will crystallize the present competitive advantage held by the United States. Stabilization in itself, moreover, would be practically meaningless unless accompanied by an agreement to lower trade barriers, settle war debts, and resume international lending. In each case the United States, as the chief creditor, alone is in a position to take the initiative for the restoration of sanity.

THE EXTENT of the Administration's rightward trend is evident from such advance information as is available regarding its security program. While details have not yet been made public, we know from Secretary Perkins's announcement that no federal funds will be used either for unemployment or old-age insurance. Both projects are to be financed and administered by the individual states, guided by standards drafted by Congress. Not only will this lead to a considerable discrepancy in the actual protection given by the different states, but it will place an inequitable burden on the poorer states, particularly those in the South. Moreover, if Speaker Byrns is correct in stating that the total federal expenditures for old-age pensions, child and maternity care, and the expansion of public-health activities will not exceed $100,000,000 in the coming year, the protection afforded will be but a drop in the bucket in comparison with immediate needs. Fortunately there is hope that Congress will go farther than the Administration toward the formulation of adequate security legislation. Representative Connery, chairman of the House Labor Committee, which is to consider the security bills, has declared himself in favor of the Lundeen bill, thus making it possible that the Administration will be unable to get its own measure reported out of committee unless it agrees to more satisfactory provision for the eleven million persons now unemployed.

HUEY LONG can congratulate himself on the ease with which he has become a national figure. Congress had just convened when he served notice that he would attack the Administration for withholding federal expenditure in Louisiana, and the Administration withdrew from its stand. He attacked it instead for being allied with interests profiting from prostitution in New Orleans, which sounded more extravagant in Washington than in Louisiana, where the patronage policy of Washington has made for a strange fellowship between a liberal President and unworthy political henchmen. Meanwhile Long has won an 18 per cent decrease in residential electricity rates in his state and made a spectacular settlement with Standard Oil, remitting most of the occupational tax passed in December in return for a correspondingly larger use of Louisiana oil in Standard's local refineries. N.B.C. gave him an uncensored session over one of its networks to bedevil the President for not keeping his word and for playing about with the Astors and partners of John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and let him make promises and poetry about his "Share Our Wealth" program. The Associated Press then carried an interview in which Huey at last refers to his candidacy for President. "I would rather see my laws passed than be President," he declared, "but passage of the laws is the only way they can keep me from being President if I want to be, unless I die." The extra pressure for publicity looks like a bid for advance sympathy if new indictments are brought in for income-tax evasion in Louisiana, but Huey's race for the Presidency has clearly begun.

BY TRACING the location of Chiang Kai-shek's alleged victories over the "Communist-bandits," it is evident that the main body of the Chinese Red Army has virtually completed its dramatic march from the province of Kiangsi to that of Szechuan. Cut off from necessary supplies by a blockade imposed by Nanking and faced with the prospect of severe losses from bombardment by Chiang's American-built airplanes, the Communists apparently decided in midsummer to withdraw entirely from Kiangsi, where Soviet districts had existed for six years. Abandoning their former capital, Juichin, in November, the Red Army, accompanied by tens of thousands of local peasants, marched more than a thousand miles westward through Hunan and northern Kwangsi into Kweichow. There, a few weeks ago, they threatened to capture the provincial capital. Turned back from this city, they crossed the Yangtze into Szechuan, where Soviet rule has been established for more than a year in certain areas. In view of the relatively isolated position of Szechuan and Kweichow and their wealth of natural resources, Soviet forces may have a better opportunity to develop a stable government than would have been possible in Kiangsi. But whatever the outcome, the thousand-mile trek of the Red Army through the heart of China must go down as one of the heroic feats of modern history.

FRANK W. SMITH, president of the New York Edison Company, issued a statement to the public on December 24 in the form of a paid advertisement in the press. Representing not only the various electric-light companies of the city but also the Consolidated Gas Company, Mr. Smith indulged in a public exhibition of hand-wringing that should have reduced to tears all but the most hardened of his audience. Mr. Smith, of course, was discussing the question of rates to utility users in New York, with particular reference to Mayor LaGuardia's proposal to build a municipal light-and-power plant. Among other things he said: "The millions of holders of insurance policies that are in part secured by investments made in these securities with the approval of the State of New York, have a stake [italics Mr. Smith's] in this situation and are endangered by this idea of cutting rates or building duplicating plants." On January 10, or a little more than a fortnight later, Floyd L. Carlisle, chairman of the board of the Consolidated Gas Company and the New York Edison Company, made another statement to the public. But in the meantime Something Had Happened. Mr. Carlisle, and presumably his associate Mr. Smith, had seen a great light. Speaking still, one assumes, for the millions of investors who have a stake in the question of cutting rates, Mr. Carlisle said: "Because the undersigned . . . are convinced that the prosperity and convenience of this metropolitan community require an increased use of their service at lowered rates [italics ours] . . . Because the companies know that substantial decrease in electric rates can be brought about almost immediately . . ." and so on. The solemnity with which this complete about-face is presented is one of the bright spots in an otherwise dreary world.

WHAT PROBABLY HAPPENED is that some bright boy in the office sat down and read through the Washington plan for reduced power rates and reported to Mr. Smith and to Mr. Carlisle that since the utilities companies were at present about on a par with the man-eating shark in general popularity, it might be just as well to take a chance on the new plan, particularly since it seemed not unlikely that there would be more money in it in the long run. But Mayor LaGuardia does not seem to be impressed by Mr. Carlisle's change of heart. He is still interested less in whether or not the power companies make more money than in—as he puts it concretely—how much Mrs. Finkelstein and Mrs. Pugliese and Mrs. Jones pay for electric current. So far Mr. Smith and Mr. Carlisle have not been very clear about that. But it is encouraging to know that their hearts are in the right place (just behind their pocket-books, that is) and that if the wicked municipal government with the support of the misguided federal government is going ahead with gestures in the direction of a municipal power plant, the utilities companies can do their parts, too, like little men. When Dr. Alton Smahl got a verdict of $5.40 against the New York Telephone Company for overcharges, the delight of the populace knew no bounds; if Mayor LaGuardia succeeds in forcing down the utility rates even half as far as they ought to be forced down, the heavens will ring with rejoicing and jubilation.

THE CASES against the fourteen men charged with conspiracy to overthrow the government under the Illinois state treason law did not go to trial. That preposterous charge was dropped by George Hall, state's attorney of Montgomery County, and the defendants were freed on paroles based upon pleas of guilty to the infinitely milder charge of "conspiracy to commit an unlawful act." There can be no other interpretation than that this was a victory for the defendants. Prior to their acceptance of this compromise, the prosecutor proposed that they take sentences of one year at the state penal farm under the treason law. Meeting in open court, the defendants voted this down and asked that the trial go on. Mr. Hall thereupon agreed to drop the treason charges. The truth is that he was glad to get out of the situation, gracefully if possible, but to get out in any event. Working people in Montgomery County are solidly opposed to the prosecution of persons taking part in relief demonstrations under a forgotten statute carrying severe penalties. The conservative element, with an eye on the county coffers and reckoning the cost of a long-drawn-out trial, decided that it was not worth the expense, particularly in view of the virtual impossibility of getting convictions on the original charge. This forced retreat of over-zealous local authorities in Lincoln's state ought to warn other communities to think before they act.

What Does the Supreme Court Mean?

IF Section 9-c were held valid, it would be idle to pretend anything would be left of limitations upon the power of the Congress to delegate its lawmaking function. . . . The question is not of the intrinsic importance of the particular statute before us, but of the constitutional processes of legislation which are an essential part of our system of government." So said Chief Justice Hughes of the Supreme Court in striking down a section of the National Industrial Recovery Act in the first case before that court testing this act. So said seven of the other eight justices, Justice Cardozo alone dissenting.

For the layman the applicability of these principles to the facts before the court is a matter of first importance, since what this decision foreshadows as to the Recovery Act as a whole, the gold clause, and the wide range of new legislation may be the destruction of nearly two years' building by the Administration.

In making such an evaluation one has to start at the beginning. What was Section 9-c of the Recovery Act? In striking contrast with the broad scope of most of the act, this section of only two or three lines simply "authorized the President to prohibit the transportation in interstate and foreign commerce of petroleum or the products thereof" produced in violation of state law. The reason that it was passed is equally simple and undisputed. For three or four years streams of "hot" oil—oil produced in violation of state conservation laws—had gushed from the great oil fields of Oklahoma City and East Texas in such volume as to render the operations within those fields a nightmare of roaring gas, wild wells, burning oil, and wasteful use. All fair competition in the oil industry was demoralized by the bootleg prices at which hot oil or its products were sold. Indeed, at the time when the Recovery Act was before Congress, bootleg oil had smashed the price of all oil to a few cents a barrel, and hiding behind federal-court injunctions which had denied to states the right to control the interstate movements of illegal oil, the "hot" oiler was writing his chapter of graft, corruption, thievery, and waste in a way to make the Teapot Dome scandal look trivial.

But when the Supreme Court cast its judicial eye upon

Section 9-c, these were not the facts upon which it focused. Rather it was upon the words in the book. And since these words did not express a flat Congressional command prohibiting hot-oil movements but only "authorized" the President "to prohibit," the court held that Congress had unconstitutionally tried to delegate its lawmaking power. Then, as if to buttress a somewhat doubtful point, it added that even if the act were not fatally defective on this score, the President in his executive order failed to make a "finding" that the prohibition was necessary to accomplish the purposes of the act.

Turning first to the matter of "finding," is this a matter of substance or is it just legal hocus-pocus? Any government law clerk could answer this one. He has one form for "proclamations" which include "findings," and another for "executive orders" without "findings." Proclamations read, "Whereas . . . Whereas . . . Whereas . . . I find . . . Now Therefore it is hereby ordered." Executive orders read, "By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Act of Congress, etc. . . . It is hereby ordered, etc." Both proclamations and executive orders are written according to form by a $2,500-a-year clerk. Surely it would be absurd to turn grave matters of national policy upon such a technicality of wording, particularly when the statute nowhere required such a "finding." As sensibly expressed by Justice Cardozo in his dissenting opinion, "One will not find such restrictions either in the statute itself or in the Constitution back of it. The Constitution of the United States is not a code of civil practice."

But what about the court's more serious charge that the structure of our government was endangered? Reduced to the facts of this case, Justice Cardozo's dissent shows this to be just plain nonsense. Congress told the President specifically and definitely what he could prohibit—hot oil—and where he could prohibit it—in interstate commerce; it left him only one narrow bit of discretion—when he could prohibit, to be exercised presumably when he found national recovery demanded it.

Moreover, it is significant, there was less delegation to the President in Section 9-c than in almost any other New Deal legislation. In the Recovery Act the President is empowered to approve codes dealing with thousands of commodities in a thousand different ways. His powers under the public-works program and under the Agricultural Adjustment Act are likewise extensive. In the matter of monetary standards he may decide when devaluation shall take place and in addition how much. And it is interesting that none of the executive orders dealing with gold recite the magic word "finding." If all these acts must go down, our economic structure might go with them.

But possibly the court will find another logic. The existence of a dissenting opinion proves there are at least two lines of applicable legal logic even to this extremely simple set of facts. Indeed, we find the internal logic of Justice Cardozo's opinion more persuasive, even as a matter of marshaling the ancient precedents, than the majority opinion. In so far as abstract law is concerned, the court could have selected the logic of Cardozo just as well as that of the majority opinion. Since the logic of the dissent was before the whole court before the majority opinion was issued, something more than mere legal logic impelled the majority to reach its decision. What were the real reasons in the minds of the majority? The court has not told us. Nor has it told the host of federal district judges throughout the nation in whose hands the trial of cases and the enforcement of the whole scheme of recovery legislation really rests. And few district judges will dare to permit the enforcement of these laws before the Supreme Court gives those reasons.

All that can be hoped is that those members of the court who have heretofore stood for a realistic approach to the law will agree with Justice Cardozo in one passage of his dissent: "Under these decisions, the separation of powers between the Executive and Congress is not a doctrinaire concept to be made use of with pedantic rigor. There must be sensible approximation, there must be elasticity of judgment, in response to the practical necessities of government, which cannot foresee today the developments of tomorrow in their nearly infinite variety."

Our Navy Madness

THERE was no more encouraging passage in President Roosevelt's annual message to Congress than his positive assurance: "I believe, however, that our own peaceful and neighborly attitude toward other nations is coming to be understood and appreciated. . . . Evidence of our persistent and undeniable desire to prevent armed conflict has recently been more than once afforded. There is no ground for apprehension that our relations with any other nation will be otherwise than peaceful" (italics ours). Immediately after giving this assurance, the President sent to Congress a budget message which calls for the greatest army and navy appropriations in peace time in our history. It provides no less than $870,922,292 for both services. Deducting the non-military expenditures of the War Department (rivers and harbors and the Panama Canal), there is still left the stupendous sum of $800,369,658, of which $488,133,847 goes to the navy for strictly naval purposes and $312,235,811 to the army for purely military purposes. In the face of the depression, when every other regular department is being skimped, the army and navy are to receive enormous increases.

Since the PWA spent $150,000,000 last year on ships—a neat way of outwitting Congress and increasing the appropriations without that body's constitutional sanction—the actual naval increase is less than appears from a comparison of the regular naval appropriations. These have none the less jumped enormously. In 1916 the sum was only $153,853,567. Then came our entry into the war and in 1919 the high point of $2,002,310,785; since then the lowest figure has been $312,743,410, in 1926. In 1930 it rose again to $374,165,639. Thereafter, until Mr. Roosevelt took office, some effort was made to hold down expenditures, the 1933 figure being $349,732,213. But the former Assistant Secretary of the Navy has come to the rescue. The increase for the fiscal year 1935-36 over 1933-34 will not be less than $138,401,634, or 39.5 per cent. Not until the World War came did our total naval expenditures reach the sum of $139,000,000. Indeed, all the expenditures of the federal government for 1916-17 were only $734,056,202, or $66,340,456 less than we are to spend on army and navy alone in the coming fiscal year! Could anything illustrate more clearly what the World War accomplished in the way of a permanent increase of government outlays for regular services—aside from emergency reconstruction and relief?

If we turn to the number of officers and men authorized, we find that in the year 1905, during the Presidency of Theodore Roosevelt, we had 2,252 officers and 30,804 men. Ten years later the force had grown to 3,780 officers and 52,562 men. Passing over the war years, we had 8,625 officers and 119,205 men in 1921. Thereafter came a sharp drop, but the average number of enlisted men from 1925 to 1930 was about 84,000, with the number of officers steadily rising until in 1932 we had 9,423. The proposal now made to Congress is that the total number of enlisted men shall be brought up to 93,500, with a further increase of officers to well above 10,000, as it is specified that in future all graduates of the Naval Academy shall be commissioned, instead of a number being returned to private life as is the case today. By July 1, 1936, then, we shall have at least 105,000 officers and men in the navy and withdrawn from productive life, which is as many as were carried on the rolls in the war year 1917—this alongside a regular army of 131,578 men and officers.

Our readers do not need to be reminded that this fleet enlargement is accompanied by no explanation except that the President and the Navy Department have decided to build the fleet up to the limits of the London treaty. Nor has there been any announcement of a change of foreign policy, national or naval. The candid mind must surely admit that in the face of this the people of Japan are to be pardoned if they show extreme restlessness and decide to arm with corresponding speed, especially in view of the announcement by Admiral Reeves that this year the American fleet will hold its annual maneuvers near the coast of Japan—according to the press, it will be a "vast armada, the largest and most powerful by a wide margin ever assembled under a single command in the world's naval history." Have not the American people some right to be told by the President why all this is going on? We know very well that it is defended by some members of the Cabinet on the ground that it gives more employment for our unemployed youth and shipyard workers. But the fact remains that while pretending to be a pacifist and non-militarist nation we are bent on outstripping the rest of the world in naval expenditure.

It is idle to deny that fear of a conflict with Japan helps to make Congress vote these large appropriations. But that is the way to provoke war, not to preserve peace. If proof of this were called for, one need only point to the German and British naval rivalry prior to the World War, which was so potent a factor in bringing on that struggle. Every time we move toward increasing our armaments there is a corresponding demand on the part of British jingoes and admirals for further increases of their fleet. Thus on November 14, 1933—to cite only one case—the First Lord of the Admiralty, in explaining why the British naval-construction program had been changed in the direction of heavier ships, officially declared that the change had been made simply and solely because of the action of the United States and Japan in laying down more cruisers. Yet our government, especially its representative in the disarmament talks at London, has deliberately refused the Japanese proposal to cut all the fleets from a 5-5-3 ratio to a 2-2-2. Is it not time for the American people to demand not only an explanation but a clear-cut statement from the government on just what its plans for the defense of the United States are, whether it intends to take the offensive in war, or whether it seriously means to urge upon the world the adoption of President Roosevelt's proposal, in his speech to the Woodrow Wilson Foundation on December 28, 1933? This was that the countries pledge themselves to build no more offensive weapons and sign an international pact guaranteeing this and embodying their sacred promise never to send their armed forces across their own boundaries.

France, Italy, and Abyssinia

FURTHER details of the Franco-Italian agreement make it clear that Abyssinia is expected to pay the price for Italian political concession in Europe. Not that Abyssinian sovereignty is to be openly or immediately sacrificed to Italian imperial ambitions. International politics no longer operate on quite so crude a basis. There is no definite clause in the Franco-Italian pact promising Italy a free hand in Africa; but by ceding to the Italian colony of Eritrea a small strip of the coast of French Somaliland, which will provide an outlet on the Gulf of Aden, and by granting Rome part ownership in the French-controlled railway to Abbis Ababa, capital of Abyssinia, France has given both moral and physical support to Italy in its dispute with the African kingdom.

What effect this will have on Abyssinia's appeal to the League under Article XI of the Covenant is not yet clear, but there is grave danger that the appeal will receive considerably less than justice from the leading powers. For one thing, Abyssinia appears to be an ideal scapegoat. Its government is notoriously corrupt, and its alleged connivance in the slave trade gives a good excuse for the extension of the purifying influence of European culture and morality. The fact that this trade could not exist without the protection of certain European governments may, of course, be conveniently forgotten. Moreover, the immediate interests of the powers most directly involved lie on the side of Italy rather than Abyssinia. In the case of France, which was the original sponsor of Abyssinian membership in the League, the shift in support is due to its paramount concern with European problems. Great Britain, on the other hand, has long been aligned with Italy in this region. As early as December, 1925, the two governments reached an understanding in which each agreed to place no obstacle in the way of the other's economic objectives in Abyssinia. The British are particularly interested in tapping the waters of Lake Tsana for the irrigation of the Sudan and have cast a somewhat covetous eye on the fertile valleys of southern Ethiopia, which are said to be admirably adapted for the raising of cotton. Italy's interests lie more to the north, where it has been engaged in building a railway connecting Eritrea with Italian Somaliland. Although the Anglo-Italian agreement has never been carried into effect, owing to Abyssinia's protests at Geneva, it is doubtless one of the factors which have caused Tory opinion in Britain to back Italy in the present controversy.

An additional factor in stirring up anti-Abyssinian feeling in Great Britain has been the playing up in the British press of greatly exaggerated reports of Japanese influence in the African state. These rumors have in part grown out of the projected Abyssinian-Japanese royal marriage, which was abandoned because of the opposition of Italy and the other powers. But they have been nourished more specifically by the recent spectacular expansion in Japanese textile exports to Abyssinia and neighboring regions, which has hit both Lancashire and Italy. Additional anxiety was created by the rumor, as yet unconfirmed, that a Japanese company had received a concession for an experiment in the raising of cotton. Reports printed in the Italian press that the Japanese are engaged in training the Abyssinian army smack suspiciously of deliberate propaganda, but have served further to prejudice British opinion.

While there is little likelihood of a falling out among the great powers over the question of Abyssinia, the situation is distinctly an unpalatable one. In refusing to arbitrate the Ualual incident and in demanding an apology and indemnity for the alleged insult to the Italian flag, Rome's attitude has been unpleasantly reminiscent of that adopted by Tokyo during the Manchurian affair of 1931. Should the powers give tacit approval to Italy's action, they will be striking a greater blow at the fundamental principles upon which the international peace machinery is based than was delivered by the failure to stem Japanese aggression in China. For in the case of the Manchurian incident it can at least be said that the League made an effort, though a belated and feeble one, to enforce existing international commitments. In the present instance there is serious danger that no action whatsoever will be taken, and that Abyssinia will be denied even the opportunity of bringing its case before the bar of world opinion. This obviously must not be allowed to happen. While the United States is not concerned in the immediate issues of the Italian-Abyssinian dispute, it might profitably, through Ambassador Davis, suggest that its future attitude toward the League cannot but be vitally affected by that body's handling of the present controversy.

Who Reads What —and Why

NEAR the beginning of the sixth century A.D. a Roman public official named Boethius was thrown into prison by his barbarian emperor, Theodoric the Ostrogoth. A few years later he was executed for alleged treason, but while still languishing in jail he wrote a book called "The Consolation of Philosophy" which was destined to be read with avidity for approximately one thousand years, or about three times as long as Shakespeare has yet been famous. The very title itself was a stroke of genius, because Boethius was writing near the beginning of a weary period during which thoughtful men were to despair of the world and to value most what enabled them either to escape from it or to endure a condition of life for which it seemed to them little could be done. Great faith in learning and letters as instruments for improving the world is a relatively modern thing. For at least a thousand years men read and studied chiefly to improve the soul or to seek "consolation."

Even today the motive continues to operate with what the more narrowly practical must regard as distressing frequency. Such, at least, is the impression one gets from reading a report made by Charles H. Compton, president of the American Library Association, concerning the readers of certain widely circulated books. He is interested chiefly in the "who" rather than the "why" of library patronage, but it is difficult to read what he has to say without realizing that even today most readers go to literature primarily for something which ranges from "consolation" to "pleasure."

Investigation seems to show that Mark Twain is by all odds the most popular "standard" author. At a given moment there may be more calls for the latest novel of Zane Grey, but the demand does not last very long, and of five libraries in five large cities all but the one in New York require more volumes by Mark Twain than by Sinclair Lewis, a distant rival. An analysis of 3,289 adult readers of the former in St. Louis shows, moreover, that they come from every walk of life and include, for example, two detectives, a pugilist, and an embalmer, as well as many skilled workmen and 317 unemployed. One would, perhaps, hardly expect Mark Twain to be read for definite instruction, and it is true that passing reference to doctrine is more frequently met with in letters regarding more explicitly tendentious writers. Nevertheless, letters from readers of Carl Sandburg, William James, Thomas Hardy, and Bernard Shaw contain, on the whole, surprisingly few indications that these authors are read primarily for their teaching. A waitress likes best Sandburg's lines: "Shake back your hair, O red-headed girl. Let go your laughter and keep your two proud freckles on your chin"; an unemployed man likes Mark Twain's books about Missouri and the Mississippi River because "I can almost see the places and the boats he mentions"; a student in a Negro high school confides, "I, like Hardy, believe that man is least important and that nature is all supreme."

Mr. Compton's researches seem fully to substantiate his contention that, whatever the reason, it is the "plain man" who keeps the standard authors alive so far as the libraries are concerned. Perhaps the upper classes have good libraries of their own; perhaps an unnamed college president was right, in his facts at least, when he proclaimed over the radio that colleges now prepare students for all the professions from automobile mechanic to dressmaker, but that the day of classical education is, thank God, over. Yet the Greek classics in translation are taken out of the library and read by, for example, an insurance man, a commercial artist, and a newspaperman, if not by members of the learned professions. Seven hundred persons recently borrowed books by Thomas Hardy from the St. Louis library. Among them were only four lawyers, one doctor, and one dentist. But there were ninety-one stenographers, ninety-six sales persons, and a scattering of mechanics, policemen, taxi-drivers, pipe-fitters, and blacksmiths. Doubtless these men belong to some sort of an élite, and it is hardly likely that pipe-fitters as a class read much Hardy. But if they are members of an aristocracy it is not one of wealth, education, or social position. Neither, on the other hand, do they seem for the most part to be protestants or rebels. They are seekers after "the consolation of philosophy."

Issues and Men

The Russian Murders Again

NUMEROUS letters of protest and congratulation have come to me in regard to my comment in The Nation of December 26 on the slaughter of men and women in Russia as the result of the assassination of Kirov. The protests have come from Communists and from some well-wishers of the Russian experiment, and the vehemence with which they write makes me suspect they realize what infinite damage Stalin has done to the cause they hold dear by the summary execution of 125 persons accused of taking part in the "conspiracy." The language of these protests is extraordinarily like that of the letters in defense of the Hitler purge of June 30, which have been coming out of Germany ever since. Even when insisting, as they do, that there is all the difference in the world between the summary executions of Hitler and those of Stalin, they use exactly the same arguments. Here is one letter:

Boiled down, the question seems to be which is the more important, the lives of a few dastards or the attempt of the U. S. S. R. to develop a new social order? I should not say "attempt," but rather an achievement beside which any former attainment pales into insignificance, and to class anything that is done in Soviet Russia with the mere brute instinct displayed in Nazi Germany is to be absurdly prejudiced in favor of Hitler. Do you see no difference between "Heil Hitler!" and the tenets of communistic philosophy? Does not what one is working for and toward count?

In the first place, this letter closely parallels one I received from Heidelberg, in which the writer, also a woman, wrote:

These men were villainous and were unfaithful to the Führer and the great cause of National Socialism. Why should they not have been removed at once since they were obstacles to the achievement of a united, ennobled, and worthy Germany, able to hold its head up with any nation of the earth?

In the second place, I should like to remind the writer of the first letter that the National Socialist program as outlined to the German people went farther in the direction of the Bolshevik program than any other that I have ever seen; that intensifies the parallel. But above and beyond details like this, I must again affirm, with all the emphasis and earnestness of which I am capable, that any government which stoops to wholesale murder to defend itself betrays its own weakness and enormously damages its cause.

Moreover, when any government finds it absolutely necessary to try the alleged miscreants in complete secrecy, without allowing any of the facts to come out either to its own people or to the world, it admits that it is too shaky to have the public know the whole base truth. From time immemorial the world has protested against summary or secret courts martial or court trials, and against immediate execution of those condemned to death. Men and women everywhere throughout the centuries have insisted upon open trials and the right of appeal to higher courts and, above all, on complete publicity; they have known that no government is justified in instituting secret trials and executions.

I, for one, deny the right of any government to butcher people as Hitler and Stalin have done, and I go farther and deny to any government the right to take human life, to commit the crime of murder, whether by judicial process or otherwise. Either the Commandment "Thou shalt not kill" means what it says, or it does not. If there are exceptions to it, it is meaningless. But waiving this for the moment, I deny that the difference in the aims of Hitler and Stalin has any effect upon the ethical considerations involved. Slaughter is slaughter, and remains such by whomever it is done. I certainly see nothing in the communist philosophy to warrant my saying that Stalin and his crowd stand outside the moral law, while Hitler and his gang must be judged according to it.

As I said before, the end never justifies the means, and no good social order can be established by bloodshed. But in Moscow and Berlin the despots insist that their way of life is so precious, their aims so ideal, that they are warranted in blotting out the lives of any who oppose them, or who are believed to oppose them. How does my correspondent know that these 125 dead Russian men and women are "dastards"? Has she seen the evidence? Has she heard from their friends? Not a bit of it. She has merely accepted the statement of a prostituted Russian government press, which does not differ in the slightest degree in its subservience and degradation from that of Hitler. She doubtless would not believe one official word that comes out of Germany as to the motives or actions of those whom Hitler put to death. I see no reason why I should believe Pravda or Izvestia any more than I believe the Tageblatt or the Frankfurter Zeitung. I know that they could not tell the truth if they wanted to do so.

The question remains: Can we uplift humanity at the cost of human flesh and blood? And how many "dastards" is an allegedly altruistic government to be allowed to kill anyhow? The Communists admit that no fewer than one million kulaks were torn from their homes and sent to Siberia, many of them to experiences worse than death. I heard a Communist orator say the other day that this exile of the kulaks was a "mere flea-bite of cruelty," but I am very sure that the million who suffered thought it something more than a "flea-bite." No, the world does not progress by murder, or by a violation of liberty, or by the vicarious suffering and death from persecution of multitudes. If American liberals had remained silent about these Russian outrages, they would have been debarred from speaking out against what is happening in Spain, Germany, and heaven knows how many other countries, or any miscarriage of justice in the United States. Wrong never yet made right, nor ever will.

Bruce Garrison Villard

Huey

Drawing by Eva Herrmann

The Biggest Show on Earth

By MARGARET MARSHALL

Flemington, New Jersey, January 9

THE white courthouse of Hunterdon County is solid and staid with its hundred years as bookkeeper of the lives and misdemeanors of an ordinary American community. It has suddenly become a world arena because the simple routine attempt within its walls to discover and punish the kidnapper and murderer of a child has been found to release, at a profit, more human curiosity than any other current event in the entire world. That curiosity drifts like a heavy fog about the sedate outlines of the old building and through its well-used corridors; it hangs in the street outside and clings to every figure living or inanimate. Every word, every look, every action breathes curiosity, strong in its own right and kept at fever pitch by that old master of ceremonies, the press, whose most famous trained animals are taking part in this performance, trying to steal the show from the principals and from one another in what must surely be the battle of the century.

The raw material with which dealers in curiosity work mills about in the courthouse square, straining at ropes, craning at windows, talking to the cops; waiting hours on end for a glimpse of a juror, an attorney, Lindbergh, Mrs. Hauptmann, for any scrap from the table of fame, set though it is with one of the most sordid of crimes. (Last Sunday more than 4,000 sightseers went through the courthouse while a barker pointed out the sights. Children were set in the witness chair and in the chair that Hauptmann occupies and told not to forget.) The crowd flows out across the street and on to the long porch of the Union Hotel, which stands in its mid-Victorian small-town ugliness opposite the courthouse. There are men, women, and children, whole families. But there are more women than men and they are incomparably more business-like in their curiosity. A well-dressed, coarse-faced, heavy but securely corseted matron pushes through to the bright-blue-coated state trooper who has a cauliflower ear and was once a boxer. The woman is smiling and eager as she engages him in talk. And there is no lack of understanding here. Importantly he tells her that Lindbergh and Jafsie will be coming out a certain door, that this place, his beat, is the best place to see them. She settles down happily to wait. Only an hour now. The sun is trying to break through the fog. A patch of sky shows for a moment as blue as the trooper's uniform. "This is a big day, Jafsie's day," she comments brightly. "I guess Hauptmann's day will be a big day too. . . . I've been in you know. Yes, I was in two days, but it's harder to get in now. They're giving the preference to the local people. And that's only right of course. They pay the taxes."

Two elderly gray-haired women in fur coats, somebody's grandmothers, edge close to the trooper. They are good-humored and determined. "I want to see Jafsie," says one of them. "Jafsie's a jolly good fellow—and truthful and honest too, don't you think?" She looks at the trooper for confirmation. Jafsie seems by all odds the favorite among the crowds. Perhaps they feel that he too is an ordinary human being like themselves who succeeded in getting in on the most famous case in the world, although to begin with he had no more to do with it than they. The tale of Jafsie is another success story out of the land of opportunity where anybody can be President—or the star witness in a murder trial.

The fog closes in again, becomes a thick mist. But the hour for noon recess is approaching and the crowd thickens. The sound-news trucks, stationed before the courthouse, get ready. The great moment comes. The jury, nondescript in the manner of juries, files out and crosses the street to the hotel. The special writers, who can never look as impressive as their names, come past our blue-clad trooper, who murmurs their identity to his eager clientele. It could hardly be less dramatic. Yet this afternoon the crowds will gather again for the next adjournment, will stand in the rain and hope for a glimpse of Lindbergh, will swarm over his car as he drives away, will cheer, will call out as one young thing cried out, "Lucky Lindy!" As the crowd disperses for lunch or other possible excitements, a woman speaks up proudly: "I'm one of the 150 you know!" (one of the first 150 to get into the trial). It is a new kind of distinction. And it is something to talk about, for only 350 people can be packed into that small building. The sheriff who gives out passes is one of the stars in this all-star performance. (There are ugly rumors about the price of choice seats.) There is also a faint chance that a few without passes may be able to get in; and it is that faint chance which brings people to the courthouse every morning at two o'clock to wait eight hours until court opens at ten.

And what of the press? Circulation, as everybody knows, has been bad the last few months. There is more human interest in the Lindbergh case than in any other world event. The attempt to translate this human interest into circulation figures has made of Flemington a frenzied community with but a single thought. There are 700 newspapermen in the town, including 129 camera men. Two hundred newspapers have their own correspondents on the scene. Hearst heads the list with fifty representatives, including, appropriately enough, his star sports writer and his Hollywood expert. The Hearst press pays particular attention to Mrs. Hauptmann. Is this foresight? If her husband is convicted, she will certainly be the star as the wife of the "doomed man." The New York World-Telegram has eleven men on the case, the Philadelphia Bulletin nine. The population of Flemington, normally 2,800, has been augmented by some 1,200.

Western Union formerly handled its business in Flemington through the railroad station agent and one messenger boy. Today it has two offices and perhaps a hundred men in town, besides messenger boys. There are forty-five direct wires, including a direct cable to London. One of the direct wires goes to Halifax to serve the Canadian press. Dispatches are being filed to Australia and Buenos Aires. During the day dispatches are sent mainly from a wire room on the upper floor of the courthouse. For a ten-edition afternoon paper in New York City new leads must be shot out one after another with lightning speed. It is here that the real newspapermen are to be found. The "special writers" follow a more leisurely pace and have plenty of time to bask in the public eye. The night dispatches are filed in a room at the back of the Union Hotel which opens conveniently into "Nellie's Tap Room," formerly a billiard room for the young blades of Flemington, now the rendezvous of the world's reporters, famous and not so famous, met here in a fierce competition, wringing the last trace of circulation out of a name that dropped from the sky in 1927 and has been God's gift to newspapers ever since.

Circulation has improved. It jumped 50,000 for one New York newspaper the first week. But the reporter who told me that was not impressed. Circulation isn't advertising. It is doubtful whether the increase will cover the cost of the trial, which is enormous. "When it's all over," he said dejectedly, "we'll probably get a cut to pay for it." What the great spectacle is costing day by day is anybody's guess. When I tried to get some figures from Western Union on its investment I gathered that that great institution maintains a large staff of idealists but no bookkeepers. "We just don't look at it that way," came the gracious but firm reply, "with us, it's just a question of service."

Meanwhile the greatest array of newspaper talent ever assembled to report one murder trial pours upwards of 300,000 words a day on to the wires and into the world's papers. No wonder a harassed, hard-boiled man in the wire room exclaims in answer to a question: "Yesterday? My God, I can't remember what happened yesterday!" And no wonder that at the bottom of page one of almost any newspaper in any city there runs a note: Other news of the Lindbergh case on pages 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20. Only in Flemington is it difficult to get late news of the testimony. The town has one paper, a weekly. It is meeting the emergency by coming out twice a week.

Court readjourns at 1:45 for the afternoon session. I am sorry to report that the courtroom scene is not much like the movies. It looks more like an old-fashioned country meeting-house crowded with ordinary people. The one huge room reaches to the roof, with many tall windows. Today, with the fog pressing it, it is close and breathless despite its spacious look. The judge's bench and the witness chair stand outlined against the big windows at the far end. The bright red dress of a juror, who is making the most of her short-lived fame, stands out on the right. The famous trick performers of the press and radio have managed to get places almost under the judge's nose. The working press must be content with less favored seats. Everywhere messenger boys stand ready to dash copy to the wire room.

From the narrow balcony opposite the judge's bench, where part of the press sits, the faces of the two principals, Lindbergh and Hauptmann, are not visible—only the non-committal backs of two heads. As the judge walks to his place, the tension draws tight in the balcony. It never relaxes while he is in the room. Copy is written and sent to the wire room, notes are passed back and forth, reporters come and go, climbing over each other's backs along the narrow benches. It is very hot, almost feverish, in the narrow place as a dozen men turn testimony into news with the speed and efficiency of machines and shoot it out to catch the ninth edition, which will presently be lying in a gutter while the tenth edition has its brief moment of triumph. As usual the unsung, underpaid, conscientious gentlemen of the press are pouring into this journalistic circus a degree of energy and talent quite disproportionate to the ends they serve.

Dr. Condon walks jauntily to the witness chair. He believes in "doing good." He believes there is good in everybody. He believes in "psychology." He uses it now. He is a popular witness who plays up to the judge and the audience and enjoys it hugely. (The newspapermen don't like him much—perhaps they don't believe there is good in everybody.) He tells the story of his meeting with "John" in the cemetery, of the transfer of the ransom money. In tones of satisfaction he describes how he got the kidnappers to reduce the ransom from $70,000 to $50,000, and there is immense pride in his voice as he quotes "John's" words of praise at the end of the encounter: "You're perfect. The crowd thinks you're fine." Under the direction of Attorney General Wilentz we get a self-portrait of the Inveterate Reformer from the most beautiful borough in the world shaking hands with a man in a cemetery who had just taken $50,000 for a kidnapped child that was already dead. "Remember," said Jafsie, "don't double-cross me." And finally there comes the fantastic moment when Dr. Condon, recounting how the bad bandit had double-crossed him after all, said with an aggrieved air as his glance swept the room: "I felt hurt, naturally." No wonder the crowd likes Jafsie.

The coverage of the trial in pictures is a story in itself. Judge Trenchard at first refused to have pictures taken in his courtroom. But 700 newspapermen can't be wrong, and there are now four cameramen stationed in court who are allowed to take pictures when the judge is off the bench. These "inside" men take their plates to a photograph pool in a former bakery shop, where they are developed in an improvised dark room. Each newspaper or press service in the pool gets a full set of all successful pictures. These are put in envelopes and addressed and the race for the home office begins. Record-breaking motor cyclists stand ready in the one-time bake shop to make a dash for the train, the airport, or the city room. One of them made the trip to New York in fifty-five minutes last week. One of them delivered his set of pictures ahead of an airplane which had started at the same time. Tonight the train will have to do; the fog is too thick for planes and motor cycles. There are only four pictures in this set, with Jafsie holding the main place. A newsman shoves his batch into its envelope in disgust. "That's the last picture of Jafsie I'm going to send." It isn't. The hundred or so photographers outside do not pool their pictures. They hunt new stuff and guard it with their lives. Yesterday with the help of a cop and a camera man a girl spectator was hoisted to one of the courtroom windows, where she was pictured "trying to get in."

One question is constant. Who is paying for the Hauptmann defense? Rumors are thick of course and facts are thin: he is being supported by pro-Nazi organizations; he is being subsidized by a powerful newspaper; Mrs. Hauptmann is carrying the expense through her broadcasts and a newspaper "life" of her husband. No one suspects that Mr. Reilly and his associates are working for humanitarian reasons.

Justice in the Virgin Islands

Washington, January 14

THE Virgin Islands may be a long way from Washington, but in one respect they are close to Nazi Germany—this in the administration of justice by District Judge T. Webber Wilson in a case which promises to become notorious in American jurisprudence. Incredible as it may appear to those accustomed to Anglo-American traditions, Judge Wilson acted in this case both as prosecutor and judge, and sentenced a government employee whom the government refused to prosecute. The case is that of The People versus Leonard Walter McIntosh. Judge Wilson, when the government attorney moved a nolle prosequi, overruled the motion, refused a jury trial, himself put the witnesses on the stand, questioned them, summed up their evidence, lectured the prisoner, and sentenced him. Thus stated in bald terms the facts are hardly credible. But this trial is the climax of a long and picturesque story which might be called “Storm Over the Virgin Islands.” It deserves a novelist’s canvas, which one can hope it will receive now that Robert Herrick has been appointed to the Islands as secretary to the administration. The material is too rich for detailed treatment here and can only be suggested.

The Virgin Islands, stepdaughter of the American colonial family, have appeared frequently in print during the Roosevelt Administration, principally because the President retained the services of the able, non-political governor, Paul Martin Pearson. Political insurrections have come to the boiling-point, with the steam rising to the newspapers. There was the rebellion of Paul C. Yates, administrative assistant to the governor, which ended in his own removal. Eli Baer, the government attorney, let it be known that the Islands were reeking with corruption, and brought 101 charges. This was followed by investigations by the Department of the Interior which ended with the dismissal of Baer and disclosed one actual case of petty thievery and no more, beyond a mass of innocent administrative irregularity natural in a far-away district, with a staff too small and untrained to handle a large public-works program. And there was this case against Leonard Walter McIntosh, chief clerk of the Public Works Department, accused of using $11 worth of government lumber and $27.40 worth of government cement in building his own house. McIntosh is an educated quadroon. He once borrowed some government cement which he returned. He did use the lumber and seven sacks of cement, total value of $16, in building his house. But for these he gave the government full value: he repaired the government radio set, supplying transformers and tubes, and he furnished the government with $5 worth of cartridge paper. The transactions were administratively incorrect, but they were crudely honest, and what is more they were approved at the time by his superior officer, Donald Stewart Boreham, Assistant Commissioner of Public Works.

A point to be noted is that if McIntosh could be convicted, it would do something to justify the broadside attacks on the Pearson administration and the Department of the Interior. A further point is that if Governor Pearson were removed he might be succeeded by none other than the ambitious judge in this case, T. Webber Wilson, a Democratic politician not under the Interior jurisdiction. And still another point is that if Wilson became governor there would be some twenty-five jobs to be distributed among “worthy” Democratic office-seekers. Judge Wilson, a former Democratic Congressman from Mississippi, was defeated for the Senate some years ago. A party man out of a job, he attained the bench in the Virgin Islands through the Department of Justice via Homer Cummings via Jim Farley via Pat Harrison. His effective qualification was that he “deserved” to be taken care of. At any rate it was not his mastery of the forms of American justice or his special fitness as a Mississippian to administer the law to a colored population. In the Virgin Islands he consorted with the little social clique which is chronically anti-administration, and on St. Croix, with its population of 14,000, most of it native, a tiny clique can be both vociferous and important. The administrative colony is a mere handful, and the defection of a judge and a government attorney can work havoc. Eli Baer and the Judge were the closest associates, lived in the same house. Baer worked up the charges of graft. The island population was in a flutter. But Baer himself was investigated and dismissed. His successor, George S. Robinson, arrived, and knowing the facts in the McIntosh case, saw no other course than to move to dismiss it. There, without the vivid tropical color of St. Croix, is the preliminary to this extraordinary trial.

Judge Wilson was not to be checkmated. He delayed the trial until Baer, despite his dismissal, returned to the Islands, for he was to be the star witness. McIntosh once gave a statement to Baer admitting that he received and used the lumber and some of the cement. The admission had been made late one night when McIntosh had gone to see Baer at the police station, frightened half out of his wits. Knowing that he was implicated, he had already had two “nervous breakdowns” that day (he testified), and he got through only part of his story to Baer before a third came upon him. He asked for a drink of water and begged to be allowed to finish the story next day, when he would explain everything. That explanation would have told of the irregular barter of the radio parts and the cartridge paper. But he never went back to Baer because the very next day Washington intervened and ordered the government attorney to desist from his star-chamber proceedings. So Baer had an admission without the explanation, and was going to produce it in court as a “confession,” incomplete as it was and unsigned.

The trial began with the refusal of the new government attorney to prosecute; his motion to dismiss the case had been overruled a fortnight before. Judge Wilson thereupon established himself as that phenomenon in American justice, a prosecutor and judge in one. McIntosh’s attorney asked for a jury trial. Judge Wilson refused. The Judge then put the witnesses on the stand and himself examined them. Thus he established that McIntosh had received the lumber and cement. Baer introduced the “confession.” McIntosh naturally explained the barter transaction, and his superior officer stood by him, swearing that he had authorized and approved it. In conclusion the Judge did a spectacular bit of summing up, regaled the crowded courtroom with a definition of fraud, and closed with a passage of Mississippian rhetoric which must be reproduced verbatim to be believed. Addressing the prisoner he declared:

You have become a Judas and Benedict Arnold to your country. There is a story from the Bible which I wish to recall to your mind, in the hope that it will be a great benefit to you and to others in the future. To err is but human, but when one does err and is brought to account he should remember the story of Christ on the cross. In the darkest hour ever experienced by mankind Jesus of Nazareth was delivered into the hands of the multitude to be crucified. Depraved mankind could not think of a more reprehensible death than to nail Jesus to a rustic cross with a thief on either side of him. One thief, so far as the record shows, never repented. The other looked up into the agonizing face of the Savior and repented, and Jesus uttered words that have echoed down the corridors of the centuries when he said: "This day thou shalt be with me in Paradise." I would suggest that when you go home you get on your knees and appeal to the Christ even as the thief on the cross. And if you do that, then I feel sure you will live a life devoid of criticism, and will be given every chance to walk in a right way by well-thinking people in this community. . . . I want people in this community to give you every consideration and to give you every chance to start anew and to get back on the highway of life on which you once walked. I ask this for the sake of yourself and your family. I shall fine you $200.

Now $200 is a lot of money in the Virgin Islands, and McIntosh is a poor man. At first it looked as if he might have to serve out the fine in prison, but bail was found. His lawyers also filed an appeal, which will go before the District Court in Philadelphia if it can be financed. The case is under consideration by the American Civil Liberties Union, and deserves their active intervention. It must be assumed that Attorney General Cummings knows about the remarkable attributes developed by his appointee, but Wilson still retains his judgeship. The moral of the story need hardly be drawn. The case is a further stigma on the practice of making political appointments without regard to fitness or ability. On the whole, the non-political appointees in our colonies have done excellent work, and the sooner we can develop a trained colonial service in which ability alone qualifies for office the better. It will be strange if Judge Wilson, by throwing the lurid light of his own grotesque behavior on the situation, has not hastened a basic reform.

R. G. S.

Election in the Saar

By JACK FISCHER

Saarbrücken, January 15 (By Cable)

The 10 per cent Socialist and Communist minority in the Saar say they will not submit to Hitler rule but plan to continue their opposition underground. France expects 30,000 refugees. A huge export of capital has been going on during the last three days. The plebiscite was absolutely fair and peaceful despite extreme Nazi moral pressure. Ninety-seven per cent of the eligible voters balloted—the most complete expression of public opinion on record.—FISCHER.

Saarbrücken, January 2

SAARBRÜCKEN, in these last days before the plebiscite, is in a jittery and apprehensive mood. Normally it is a quiet, soot-streaked little city, the capital of a territory not much larger than the average American county. Because its wooded hills cover a six-hundred-year supply of coal, this strip of land is one of the most densely populated—and most coveted—in Europe, and the whole population is overwhelmed by its responsibility for making history.

Today Saarbrücken's streets are crowded with the troops of the League's first international army—apple-cheeked English youngsters and dagger-toting Italians, most of them, with a sprinkling of Hollanders and tall Swedes. The French frontier, a few miles to the southwest, is stiff with soldiers. From the Saar hilltops at night you can see their arc-lights as they work on their great chain of forts running from Switzerland to the sea. What the Reichswehr may be doing behind the other boundary is something of a mystery, but every Saarlander is eager to retail the latest rumor. Many a sober citizen believes that before the month is out the Saar may be the first battleground in a new World War.

To an outsider this hysteria seems a trifle unnecessary, because nothing serious is at all likely to happen in the Saar. Every really explosive question stirred up by the plebiscite is already well on the way toward peaceful settlement. The result of the voting, in the first place, is a foregone conclusion. A German victory is so unmistakably certain that France stopped its propaganda long ago. And the last ominous possibility was forestalled by the arrival of the League's spruce little army. The excuse that international troops were needed "to preserve order during the plebiscite" was, of course, simply a tactful diplomatic pretext. The Saarlanders are docile folk, and the local police should have not the slightest difficulty in keeping them in order. The presence of British and Italian troops is the soundest guaranty that no putsch will be attempted by Nazi hotheads.

The only important question still at issue is the size of the dissenting vote. The Nazis have enrolled 93 per cent of the population in their German Front, but this figure means less than nothing. Thousands of members have been intimidated into joining, and not even the German leaders pretend that all of them will vote for the Reich. Few, indeed, will vote for France; but the Social Democrats claim—with pardonable optimism—that a good 35 per cent will declare themselves for the status quo.

Now the Saar population is almost solidly German. It includes only some 5,000 Jews and not many more Frenchmen—in all, less than 2 per cent of the total. Communism, likewise, has never claimed many converts even among the mine and iron-works laborers. A poll for the status quo of more than 5 per cent, therefore, can mean only one thing: a thumping vote of censure against Hitler by loyal Germans.

The Nazis, quite naturally, are doing their utmost to lighten this blow to their prestige as much as possible. Their campaign is being carried out with a thoroughness which has few parallels. No expense is grudged, no effort shirked. The Saar people have been organized, propagandized, spoon-fed, and high-pressured in every conceivable manner. Germany has bought up most of the established Saar newspapers and started many new ones, "coordinating" them so that they publish only "authorized information." Its powerful Stuttgart radio station just across the border floods the ether with nationalist propaganda and scurrilous attacks on the League Governing Commission eighteen hours a day. In America Hitler's envoys dug up 370 persons who were residents of the Saar in 1919, and hence are qualified to vote; they were brought back, passage free, and billeted until the plebiscite in the homes of loyal National Socialists. With them came 1,200 other qualified voters, rounded up from all the corners of Asia, South America, Africa, and Europe.

German favors to the Saar have been generous. Saar products are given a tariff preference. Saar citizens are invited to visit German cities, at a 75 per cent reduction in rail fare. Literally tens of thousands have been transported free to mass-meetings on German soil. Athletic teams have been subsidized; school children on holiday have been entertained for weeks in German homes. Until the Governing Commission put a stop to it, the Nazis even managed to enlist from 10,000 to 16,000 Saar youths in the German Volunteer Labor Corps. At a cost of more than $5,000,000, these youngsters were given trips all over the Reich, preferential treatment in the work camps, and "special instruction for the plebiscite campaign."

Against Saarlanders who are not susceptible to such bribery, the fascists have been able to bring almost irresistible social pressure. Persons who refuse to join the German Front have been shown the spot allegedly selected for the Saar's future concentration camp. A few, according to rumor, have even been kidnapped across the border and there imprisoned and beaten. An espionage system has been so thoroughly organized that for a time G. G. Knox, the harassed English chairman of the Governing Commission, could not trust his own police and personal servants. Social Democrat trade-unionists have the greatest difficulty in holding jobs. They are even hard pressed to find a place to meet, since no innkeeper dares rent his hall to "traitors." Nearly all the status quo demonstrations have been held either in the open or in the Saarbrücken municipal auditorium.

Few merchants are brave enough to advertise in Volksstimme, the principal Social Democratic newspaper, and still fewer distributors have nerve enough to sell it. You can still buy the paper at the railway-station kiosks, where it is kept under the counter and passed out with the name plate folded under. Nevertheless, Volksstimme manages to hold a good many readers—most of whom are content to read the pages pasted up each afternoon in the windows of the anti-Nazi bookshop.

Like many of his followers, Max Braun, the Social Democratic leader, has been personally boycotted. Because he can find no landlady willing to take the risk of sheltering him, he is forced to sleep in the Workers' Welfare House, owned and built by his party. Today he is hardly able to buy a meal in many of the Saarbrücken cafes. His mail is full of threatening letters, and once it contained a bomb which failed to explode. So far he has suffered no physical violence. The reason, he believes, is that Hitler has decreed that on no account must anything happen to Max Braun until after January 13. The Nazis want no more martyrs.

It is probably true, however, that open coercion has been held to a minimum. Knox has made heroic efforts to keep the campaigning as fair as possible. He has prohibited the formation of Storm Troop units, the wearing of political uniforms, and since December 23 the display of political flags. He can and frequently does suspend newspapers for printing particularly inflammatory articles. Since his recent reorganization of the police, either side can hold its meetings in complete safety. Street clashes have been remarkably few.

Knox's precautions are, of course, constantly decried by the German press as the most unconscionable kind of tyranny. Knox himself is the target for a barrage of hostile comment, and he has been virtually ostracized by Saarbrücken society. Almost no one has a good word to say for him; and yet no one denies that he has been an efficient and conscientious administrator. The only indictment is that he "protects traitors," that is, those persons who still doubt that Hitler is the new Messiah.

At the same time, however, the German Front seems to be making a sincere effort to help the commission preserve outward order. Realizing that an open reign of terror would hurt Germany most, the responsible leaders have done their best to keep a check-rein on their younger firebrands. They even send out polite apologies from time to time to persons who complain of insults or abuse from Nazi workers.

The Plebiscite Commission—which is, of course, quite distinct from the Governing Commission—reports that there is no evidence that either side has attempted to register illegal voters on a large scale. Because many Saarlanders live in one place and work in another, the registration originally showed a number of duplications, most of them quite innocent. By careful checking most of these have been eliminated, and the present list of 540,000 qualified voters is probably accurate. There is every reason to believe that the balloting itself will be scrupulously fair. The most sinister attempt to pervert the plebiscite was a Nazi campaign to persuade "every loyal German" to use an open ballot; those who refused would have been automatically branded as enemies of the Reich. This campaign has been spiked, however, and all possible precautions are being taken to guarantee that the polling shall be really secret.

If the transfer to Germany finally is made without any serious mishap, the League of Nations should harvest considerable prestige from its first experiment in international government. On the whole the League administration has been commendable, except during the early post-war years when the Governing Commission was dominated by the patriotic M. Victor Rault, who thought it his duty to act, not as an impartial ruler, but as an agent of the French republic. True enough, many Saarlanders still protest bitterly against being "ruled like a nigger tribe," and complain that the suggestions of their advisory parliament are usually ignored. Yet the Nazis themselves admit that under the last three commission chairmen—G. W. Stephens of Canada, Sir Ernest Wilton of England, and Knox—the territory has been governed cheaply and well. The Saar has incurred no debts, its budget is habitually balanced, and its taxes, compared with those of the bordering states, are low. Before the depression hit, the commission was even able to build up a surplus sufficient to permit a remission of taxes in 1929 and to carry a good part of the unemployment burden ever since. Relief and health service are admirable. And finally, in spite of the dictatorial form of government, freedom of speech and press have been greater than in almost any other Continental country. The very fact that 800,000 people are eager to trade such plain economic and political advantages for the doubtful glories of Nazi Germany is one of the most discouraging symptoms in Europe today.

The Menace of Huey Long

III. His Bid for National Power

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

Baton Rouge, December, 1934

"HUEY LONG is the best stump speaker in America. He is the best political radio speaker, better even than President Roosevelt. Give him time on the air and let him have a week to campaign in each state, and he can sweep the country. He is one of the most persuasive men living." This is the opinion not of a Long supporter, but of one of the key men in the fight against the Kingfish in Louisiana. The North, he said, is misled into dismissing him as a clown, and has no conception of Huey's talents and of his almost invincible mass appeal. Mrs. Hattie Caraway of Arkansas can testify to his powers, for when she entered the primary asking to succeed her late husband in the United States Senate, she was generally expected to run last among five candidates and to poll not more than 2,000 votes. The four men against her were experienced and able. But Huey took his sound van into Arkansas for one week, and though he could not get into every county, he made a circular tour during which he spoke six times a day. Instead of 2,000 votes Mrs. Caraway won a majority over the combined opposition in the first primary, tantamount to election in a Democratic state. An analysis of the vote showed that the districts where Huey did not appear virtually ignored her, while those which he toured gave her a landslide.

When his hour strikes, Huey will attack the rest of America with the same vehemence. That probably will be during the campaign of 1936. His platform will be the capital levy, strangely enough his exclusive possession as a political theme. He will speak more violently than Father Coughlin against the money interests of Wall Street and against the evil of large fortunes. He will pose as a misunderstood man, and to most listeners he will give their first information of what he has accomplished in Louisiana. He will be direct, picturesque, and amusing, a relief after the attenuated vagueness of most of the national speaking today. He will promise a nest egg of $5,000 for every deserving family in America, this to be the minimum of poverty in his brave new world. He rashly will undertake to put all the employables to work in a few months. He will assail President Roosevelt with a passion which may at first offend listeners, but in the end he might stir up opposition of a bitterness the President has not tasted in his life. Obviously, he cannot succeed while the country still has hopes of the success of the New Deal and trusts the President. Huey's chances depend on those sands of hope and trust running out. He is no menace if the President produces reform and recovery. But if in two years, even six, misery and fear are not abated in America, the field is free to the same kind of promise-mongers who swept away Democratic leaders in Italy and Germany. Huey believes Roosevelt can be beaten as early as 1936, but he is prepared to agitate for another four years. In 1940 he will still be a young man of forty-six.

Over the radio, if he follows the technique he uses at home, Huey will begin something like this: "Hello, friends, this is Huey Long speaking. And I have some very important revelations to make. But before I begin, I want you to do me a favor. I am going to talk along without saying anything special for four or five minutes, just to keep things going. While I'm doing that I want you to go to the telephone and call up five of your friends, and tell them Huey Long is on the air, and has some very important revelations to make." Thus he builds up an audience. He then can hold it for an hour or even two, weaving a speech of argument and anecdote and special pleading which is entertaining and informative, and quietly eats away any latent prejudice of his listeners. The country will make his acquaintance over the air before it does on the stump. Louisiana State University is to have a new radio station of fifty-kilowatt power, strong enough to reach all but distant states. L. S. U. is Huey's university, and this will be his station. It is a basic factor in his national plan. (Since this was written he has given the first of two talks over a National Broadcasting Company network, introduced as described above and including a strong attack on the President.)

He does not expect the support of the press. But the "lyin' newspapers" in a contradictory sort of way are an asset. Upton Sinclair knows how it arouses instant sympathy to say you are the victim of a conspiracy of misrepresentation. And most newspaper publishers, despite their pretense of representing American opinion, do not guess how little the majority of their readers rely on them for disinterested service. Like Sinclair, Huey publishes his own newspaper, but in Louisiana he depends still more on a remarkable system of circulars. His card catalogue of local addresses is the most complete of any political machine in the world. It holds the name of every Long man in every community in the state, and tells just how many circulars this man will undertake personally to distribute to neighbors. Huey's secretary maintains a pretentious multigraph office, and it can run off the circulars and address envelopes to each worker in a single evening. Huey then mobilizes all the motor vehicles of the state highway department and the highway police. The circulars can leave New Orleans at night and be in virtually every household in the state by morning.

One may say that remarkable as that may be, it will work only in Louisiana and cannot be done throughout the United States. But in a way it can. By November the "Share Our Wealth" campaign had recruited 3,687,641 members throughout the country in eight months. (The population of Louisiana is only 2,000,000.) Every member belongs to a society, and Huey has the addresses of those who organized it. To them can go circulars enough for all members. The "Share Our Wealth" organization is first of all a glorified mailing list, already one of the largest in the land, but certain to grow much larger once the Long campaign gets under way. It is the nucleus of a nation-wide political machine. And though the movement is naively simple, its very simplicity is one secret of its success. Anyone can form a society. Its members pay no dues. They send an address to Huey and he supplies them with his literature, including a copy of his autobiography. He urges societies to meet and discuss the redistribution of wealth and the rest of his platform. He promises to furnish answers and arguments needed to silence critics.

The movement, however, is more than a mailing list, and since its doctrine is the basis of Huey's national appeal, it warrants close examination. This is set forth in a pamphlet entitled "Share Our Wealth," compiled by "Huey P. Long, United States Senator, Washington, D. C." On the cover is the quotation from St. John, Chapter 8, verse 32: "And ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." Under the title is the subtitle: "Every Man a King"—part of a phrase of William Jennings Bryan's, "Every man a king but no one wears a crown." This is followed by a six-line quotation from Goldsmith, and under this: "Containing authorities, laws, statistics, and published comments of Leaders of all times." On page 1 is the following statement of principles and platform:

1. To limit poverty by providing that every deserving family shall share in the wealth of America for not less than one-third of the average wealth, thereby to possess not less than $5,000 free of debt.

2. To limit fortunes to such few million dollars as will allow the balance of the American people to share in the wealth and profits of the land.

3. Old-age pensions of $30 per month to persons over sixty years of age who do not earn as much as $1,000 per year or who possess less than $10,000 in cash or property, thereby to remove from the field of labor in times of unemployment those who have contributed their share to the public service.

4. To limit the hours of work to such an extent as to prevent overproduction and to give the workers of America some share in the recreations, conveniences, and luxuries of life.

5. To balance agricultural production with what can be sold and consumed according to the laws of God, which have never failed.

6. To care for the veterans of our wars.

7. Taxation to run the government to be supported, first, by reducing big fortunes from the top, thereby to improve the country and provide employment in public works whenever agricultural surplus is such as to render unnecessary, in whole or in part, any particular crop.

In black-face type follows the text: "Go ye into all communities and preach the Gospel to every living creature."

The pamphlet is so replete with Huey's Scriptural references that it is no surprise to find that a clergyman, the Reverend Gerald L. K. Smith, is chief organizer of the movement. He is a kindly, eloquent, and sincere Long enthusiast, who left the wealthiest church in Shreveport to pursue this work. I doubt if he knows much about economics, for if he did he could not address huge meetings with such alluring promises and so much faith that he adds members by the tens of thousands. The power of promises among credulous people is not confined to Germany. There is a strawberry-grower near New Orleans who usually borrows enough money from the bank each year to finance his crop. This year the bank solicited the business, but the man said he wouldn't need the money as he was going to have more than enough from the $5,000 that Huey Long was giving him. Nor could the bank convince him that he was mistaken. He refused the loan. America may not be a nation of Louisiana strawberry-growers, but gullibility is not local to the lower Mississippi valley. Others will believe Huey's figures, and if he says the wealth of America is enough to give every family $15,000, they will not wonder that he is ready to guarantee each family a modest one-third of this figure.

I doubt whether Huey and the Reverend Gerald L. K. Smith realize that property as such cannot be redistributed. How, for instance, divide a factory or a railroad among families? Value lies in use, and if the scheme were to be realized, all property would have to be nationalized, and the income from use distributed. The income from $5,000 would not be much for each family, not more than $200 or $300, certainly not enough to make true the dream of a home free of debt, a motor car, an electric refrigerator, and a college education for all the children, which is Huey's way of picturing his millennium. And if property is to be nationalized, why not share it equally? Why give the poor only a third, and decree the scramble for the other two-thirds in the name of capitalism? If Huey were to ask himself this question, he probably would answer that since both he and America believe in capitalism, he must advocate it. But probably he has not thought the platform through. He conceived of it early one morning, summoned his secretary, and had the organization worked out before noon of the same day. It isn't meant to be specific. It is only to convey to the unhappy people that he believes in a new social order in which the minimum of poverty is drastically raised, the rich somehow to foot the bill through a capital levy. It may be as simple as a box of kindergarten blocks, but could he win mass votes, or organize nearly four million people in eight months, by distributing a primer of economics?

I doubt, too, whether Huey has studied the dictatorships of Europe, though he can hardly help thinking of himself as a coming Hitler or Mussolini of America, since the parallel between him and his European prototypes is obvious. However, it must not be drawn too closely. Huey, for instance, is not a national socialist, if that title equips him at once with a philosophy of the state as the single dominant expression of the individual. He is a vulgar American politician, who has learned to play the two-fisted, sordid game of vote-getting and patronage infinitely better than his opponents. At his worst, he is no more unprincipled than they, his sin being that he is more ruthless and successful. At his best, he is not a social thinker, certainly not as much as either Hitler or Mussolini. Hitler's "Mein Kampf" is the work of an ascetic crusader. Mussolini's autobiography palpitates with ideas. Huey's autobiography is a scratchy, smug little tale of his political victories, tossed off in two weeks. Even so, Huey is an improvement on Hitler in two respects worthy of mention. He is free of the virus of racial prejudice and he is not anti-intellectual. That is not to say that he does not have the proverbial Southerner's disdain of the colored man, but it is not the basis of his political creed. Indeed, he prides himself on having improved Negro education in Louisiana, and on the exemption of virtually all Negroes in the state from taxation. Nor will Huey Long ever burn the books of his contemporaries in a public bonfire. Like many a man deprived of an academic education, he has an almost touching faith in it, and certainly cheaper and better schooling has been one of his central objectives. However impetuously he stamped out criticism of himself in the student newspaper of L. S. U., he has seen to it that good professors have been employed by the state, and they enjoy academic freedom. The incident of the Reveille is to be explained not by a philosophic hostility to free speech, but by the fact that the student who wrote the critical letter was a nephew of one of his bitterest opponents. He exploded because he thought his enemies were using "his" university against him and were getting away with it. It showed well enough how little he cares about the rights of criticism, but he does not mount the platform telling people, as Hitler and Mussolini do, that individuals must be prepared to sacrifice such personal rights for the good of the community.

It would clinch the larger parallel between Huey and Hitler if it could be demonstrated that Huey, like the dictator of Germany, understands how to win the financial support of big interests. Ostensibly he is their implacable foe, and his record shows much to justify his claim. But if he knows how to strike he may know also how to withhold his blows. Julius Long, Huey's brother (at the time estranged from him), testified before the Senate committee under oath that Huey's first unsuccessful candidacy for the governorship in 1924 was financed principally by the Southwestern Gas and Electric Company and allied interests. He also alleged that money had passed to his brother from representatives of the Union Indemnity Company. "They handed my brother," he testified, "a large roll of money, I think a couple of times, while I was there, which he tucked into one of the back pockets of his trousers. It looked like it would almost pull them off; at the same time he sort of seemed to be talking to himself that the Union Indemnity Company would get all the insurance of this state." This brother also threw doubt on Huey's sincerity in attacking big interests. "He does not care whether the trust is in, just so he is in. The trust could not have a better agent than Huey Long." This opinion is frequently expressed in New Orleans by those who have watched him in action. Nor would inconsistency, if it exists, be a change from the political tradition of Louisiana. Where there is only one party, and political power swings from one faction to another, fundamental principles often are obscured or even absent, and the focus of the fight is victory, and the fruit of victory is the spoils. Certainly this description of Huey Long's political conquests is just as true as to say that he has fought for the good of the people. There is room in Huey's scheme of things for inconsistency. Power must precede reform, and the end justifies the means. Even the Reverend Gerald L. K. Smith himself said so.

The assumption in the North that Huey Long is a local phenomenon, a product of conditions not to be duplicated elsewhere, rests on the fallacy that the social picture of Louisiana is unique. The same easy-going mistake is made about those foreign countries, Germany and Italy. One has only to translate conditions in any of these regions into abstractions to see how little external distinctions really matter. Given a land in which the great majority are in want or in fear of it, in which democracy has not produced wise leadership or competent organs to conduct public affairs, in which "big interests" have far more than their share of power, the easiest sacrifice that society seems ready to make, if only its prejudices can be stirred, is of its democratic freedom. In Louisiana the dictatorship already is absolute; Huey controls all three functions of government, executive, legislative, and judicial. Is it resented? Certainly, by some people, just as Hitler and Mussolini are resented by some people in Germany and Italy. But not by all the people one might expect. This was brought home to me here, in a conversation with a young instructor at Louisiana State University. "I am troubled, too," he admitted. "There are many things Huey does that I don't approve of. But on the whole he has done a great deal of good. And if I had to choose between him without democracy and getting back the old crowd, without the good he has done, I should choose Huey. After all, democracy isn't any good if it doesn't work. Do you really think freedom is so important?"

This was not a German talking to me about Hitler, or an Italian about Mussolini. The argument was the same, the perplexity the same, the conclusion the same. I have heard scores of such confessions from equally intelligent Germans and Italians. The only new fact was the geography of the conversation. I was walking across the campus of an American university. And here it was I came face to face with the full menace of Huey Long. I repeat, he is no menace if Roosevelt succeeds, if he brings security to the lives of those who constitute the great majority of our people, if he redistributes wealth and democratizes economic power, if he establishes honest and efficient government. But if he fails, the man is waiting who is ruthless, ambitious, and indeed plausible enough to Hitlerize America.

[The last of three articles on Huey Long. Next week Mr. Swing writes on Bilbo the Rabble Raiser.]

A Merger for Music

By B. H. HAGGIN

OPERA at the Metropolitan, it has long been recognized, is an appendage of wealth, power, society. This was made clear a few years ago when there were proposals for a new opera house that would permit the long-suffering humble folk in the balconies to see. The boxholders—who under one name constitute the producing company and under another name the real-estate company that owns the opera house—refused, since the present opera house, which permitted them not only to see but to be seen, was completely satisfactory to them. The opera was theirs and for them; only their comfort, their social purposes were to be considered; and the rest of the public, which was present by their sufferance, could demand nothing.

At first there appears to be an analogy with opera in Europe, which was theoretically for the monarch—part of the pomp and pageantry connected with his position, and in this case the official, external expression of his supposed cultural enlightenment and taste. The shape of the opera house conformed to this fact: it was designed to let him see and be seen. And the public was there by his sufferance, his graciousness. But there was an important difference. Since the opera, in theory, was his and for him, he supported it out of his personal income. He had to do this because the public was really admitted to the performances by his generosity—that is, it paid very little for seats. The theory, then, was as usual a fiction; in effect the opera was for the public—which was why the republic continued to support it when the monarch was deposed. But our millionaires who pose as royalty want the privileges of royalty without its responsibilities. They charged the public high enough prices to make the opera pay for itself; and recently, when there was a deficit, they had the cheek to call on the public to save “its” opera.

With all their cheek, however, they could not very well ask the public to assume the annual loss on the opera house. So they attempted to use the method which they are accustomed to use in such situations in business. Some of the Metropolitan directors were also on the board of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, which paid rent to Carnegie Hall for its concerts; and they attempted to get rid of their loss by securing the concerts for the opera house. They attempted to do this by a merger which also would have secured the Philharmonic-Symphony’s money—its endowment fund, and the guaranty fund contributed last year by the public to insure the continuance of the concerts during the next three years—for the Metropolitan producing company.

The significant thing is that these men were willing to sacrifice the interests of the Philharmonic-Symphony, which were intrusted to their care, and to impoverish the musical life of New York in order to accomplish their purpose. For the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra had nothing to gain financially from the merger; and artistically it had a great deal to lose. A point was made of the advantage of having a first-class orchestra for the opera; but the double burden would have caused a deterioration in the orchestra’s playing in both opera and concerts, and the quality of the concerts would have suffered in addition from the unfavorable acoustics of the opera house. Protest had its effect; the agreement, which was upset by the objection of Toscanini, provided for separate periods of opera and concerts, and restricted the use of the public’s guaranty fund to the concerts. Nothing, however, was said about the use of the Philharmonic-Symphony’s own endowment fund; and the concerts were still to be given at the opera house, which meant that Carnegie Hall would be torn down, and therefore that the city would be deprived of the visits of the Philadelphia and Boston Symphony orchestras.

The merger has fallen through this time, but sooner or later we shall have to accept the consequences of having artistic enterprises dependent on business men and financiers, who inevitably apply to them the criteria and methods which they are accustomed to apply to business and finance.

In the Driftway

WRITING in the Drifter’s favorite magazine, the Countryman, St. John Ervine, who is always provocative even when he is being silly, sets forth his reasons for liking to live in the country. After first describing the city as noisy, dirty, unaired, and full of people, Mr. Ervine, in an eloquent peroration, sums up his rural passions thus:

I like the country because, except when townspeople are about, it contains no clutter; because one can have solitude in it; because one can live near to growing things and enjoy the blessings of fresh fruit and fresh vegetables and not be dependent on stale stuff and things out of tins; because one can have a sense of community; because one can still live like a human being and not like an overworked machine; and finally because, as I said at the start, I like living in the country.

* * * * *

OF these several reasons for preferring rural to urban life, the Drifter believes only the last to have any validity whatever. Of the first point, it is clear that the country clutter is merely different in kind from that of the city. Unless, for example, English farmers differ markedly from those in the United States—and there is small reason to suppose they do—there is in every field a residuum of broken plowshares, rake teeth, scythe handles, and rusted blades; every farmhouse is accompanied—sometimes even surrounded—by piles of varying sizes and degrees of offensiveness, depending on the neatness of the housewife and her ability to persuade her menfolk to clean up, in which old rubber boots, broken bottles, tin cans, bits of harness, bent bolts, and fragments of china mingle in desolate fraternity. Hardly a road that does not boast its ancient, twisted motor car; hardly a secret wooded place which is not in some corner or other somebody’s dump heap also, the last resting-place of discarded stoves and water pails with holes in them. Clutter is clutter, and country people create it, being human beings, just as do their cousins who live in town.

* * * * *

MR. ERVINE’S next point is the popular notion that only in the country can solitude be found. Now apart from the fact that in a small community every neighbor knows the private doings of every other neighbor—and if he doesn’t, he takes considerable pains to discover them—it is well known that the most bitter, the most heart-crushing solitude is that found in the center of a great crowd of human beings, all strangers. To the unfamiliar in New York City, Times Square at theater time must be the loneliest, most solitary place in the world. The subway during the rush hour is packed with solitude—is packed, that is, with acres of human beings each bent on his own concerns and resenting furiously the intrusion of anyone else, however accidental. Push your subway neighbor’s paper awry, step on his toe, urge yourself past him, however apologetically, and he will glare at you for the simple reason that you are alone and he is alone and he wishes matters to remain that way. And for the most part they do. Country solitude, when it is not being interrupted by friendly calls or the insistent ringing of the party line, is broken by birds whistling, or calves bawling, or branches creaking in the wind, or the distracting downfall of water on a brook bed. Not at all displeasing sounds, any of them, but not conducive to solitude.

* * * * *

MR. ERVINE'S other points may be briefly dismissed. Obviously, the city is the place for fresh fruits and vegetables; obviously, except for the comparatively short summer season, it is in the country that things are eaten out of tins, or—at best—out of glass jars filled in the warm weather by the country wife. Obviously, the only countrymen who do not live like overworked machines—that is, who do not rise with the sun and work till it sets—are those effete ex-city folk who, like Mr. Ervine, are slaves to only one machine, the typewriter, and otherwise regulate their own hours. No, there is only one good reason for wanting to live in the country, and Mr. Ervine has expressed it in his last six words. The Drifter heartily agrees with him, but a number of years ago he stopped trying to rationalize his prejudice.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Were the Russian Executions Justified?

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Oswald Garrison Villard in a recent issue of The Nation takes a flat-footed stand that no end, however noble and desirable, would in his eyes justify such means as violence and the sacrifice of human life. But certainly no nation, no community in the past or present, has ever adopted this attitude. Of course Mr. Villard does not condone the shooting of spies and traitors, the killing of strikers, the execution of those who are caught plotting against existing governments.

But did not the Revolutionary Fathers know that the taking up of arms against England would result in the death of thousands of patriots as well as redcoats? Did not Lincoln know that thwarting the desire of the South for separation from the Union would mean the death of tens of thousands of Americans? Is not the path of human progress paved with the blood of willing and unwilling martyrs? Look at the human cost of the progress of aviation, of the motor car. Would Mr. Villard halt such progress?

The statistician can foretell with almost scientific accuracy the toll of human life that will be the cost of every bridge, every tunnel, every subway to be built in the future. Fifty thousand innocent lives could be saved yearly if every automobile were taken off our streets and replaced by the horse and buggy. Would Mr. Villard, in his concern for the sanctity of human life, consent to that? And would he forbid the building of bridges and subways and dams because of the lives that will be inevitably lost?

New York, December 28

M. SHAINÉ

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

At last Mr. Villard has come to his senses by raising his voice with a bitter cry (The Nation of December 26) against the Russian despots for their latest butchery of their political dissenters. The true libertarians raised their voices many years ago, and among them were Bertrand Russell, Emma Goldman, and Alexander Berkman. Their protest did not differ in principle from Mr. Villard's; and yet it required sixteen years for Mr. Villard to be convinced of the fundamental truth that a dictatorship by whatever name it may be called can be nothing else but despotic and cruel. From now on Mr. Villard will be placed in the column of the libertarians.

Stelton, N. J., December 29

A. SCHNEIDER

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The article by Mr. Villard on the executions in the Soviet Union reveals the following points:

1. That Mr. Villard obtained all his information from the anti-Soviet press.
2. That the press reports tried to make it appear that large numbers of men, women, and children were seized and shot without valid cause and without trial.
3. That it is the intent of the capitalist-owned press to spread lies and distortions of truth about the Soviet Union.
4. That Mr. Villard entirely forgot that a government which aims at a new social order must deal severely with those who are ready to destroy the building of that order. And that "speedy justice," which American newspapers demand for criminals here, is a fact in the Soviet Union. That does not make justice less just, for these conspirators were tried and found guilty. Many of them confessed and named others.

However, many tears will be shed over these enemies of the new social order, as Mr. Villard has also shed tears over the exiled kulaks—the petty Insulls and grafters who thought more of their own selfish gain than of the well-being of the mass of the Russian people.

Boston, December 30

HERBERT S. HYSON

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I am a new reader of The Nation—indeed, a very recent convert to radical tendencies—and I hesitate very much to take issue with Mr. Villard, for whom I have the greatest respect; but his article on page 729 on the Russian executions doesn't seem to jibe very well with the Spanish piece on page 727.

Terrorist methods apparently do get results! If the Paris Commune had used them more generously in 1870, if the German Socialists had tried them with more rigor at the end of the war, if the Italian radical leaders had shed a bit more blood, if the Austrian Socialists had killed a bit more indiscriminately, isn't it at least perfectly reasonable to suppose that they might be better off, and that the cause of the working classes might also be better off in those countries?

It must be acknowledged in general that there is more ability, more leadership, more executive ability among the wealthy classes in capitalistic countries than among the Bolsheviks. Granted this, and the fact that the Bolsheviks realize how few of them were engaged in bringing about their revolution, without outside help that amounted to anything, is it strange that they feel that as long as the rest of the world is capitalistic, they cannot afford to take the slightest chance with domestic discord? Discredit their methods as much as you will—and no one would deplore them more than myself—still, looking at the facts of the case from a disinterested point of view, you must admit that they at least are running their country more in the interests of the working class than any other country is being run. Russia is still the only country in which a revolution has been made to stick.

I agree with Mr. Villard's statement that the recent Russian events merely prove the instability of the Russian regime. That is true. But I also imagine that as long as Russia is the only socialist state in the world, its leaders, if they stay realistic, will continue to consider it unstable.

Chicago, December 30

C. R.

Fortune and the Honor Roll

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The editors of Fortune magazine wish to express to you their deep appreciation of your mention of Fortune's disarmament article in your Honor Roll for 1934. We are proud indeed to have your approval so publicly expressed.

In communicating our gratitude to you, I should like to make one personal correction which perhaps you can find means to effect. In the newspaper accounts of your awards my name has been associated with the preparation of the article. Actually, Fortune articles are the result of the combined work of several members of the staff, and in this particular case the editor in charge was Associate Editor Eric Hodgins, to whom all personal credit should go. That the publication of the article had my fullest and most enthusiastic approval goes, I hope, without saying, but though I should very much like to claim the credit which the newspapers have given me, I cannot do so.

You would relieve me of an embarrassment which I very keenly feel if you could either make public this letter or in some other suitable way transfer your specific personal approval to the man who deserves it.

New York, December 28

ARCHIBALD MACLEISH

[Mr. MacLeish's name was inadvertently included in press releases sent out before The Nation went to press. It was not on the Honor Roll as printed in The Nation. We are grateful for his letter and glad to print the necessary correction.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

A Correspondence on Liberty

The Nation reproduces the following five letters between Mr. Krutch and representatives of the American Civil Liberties Union as an interesting, if casual, commentary on a problem of immediate importance in a period of social unrest.

Joseph Wood Krutch to Elmer Rice

DEAR RICE:

I am inclosing a check and membership card to the American Civil Liberties Union. I must say frankly, however, that I would be happier if I were convinced that the majority of members really believed in civil liberties as such. I wonder if Roger Baldwin does?

New York, December 31

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Roger Baldwin to Mr. Krutch

DEAR MR. KRUTCH:

Elmer Rice has sent me your letter of December 13 with a copy of his reply. I see that you raise some question as to whether I really believe in civil liberties "as such." I think the best practical answer to that is that I do believe in applying without discrimination the right to carry on any propaganda whatever without interference, regardless of the political or economic philosophy involved. On that point I am in entire agreement with my fellow-members of the Civil Liberties Union, who represent, however, quite diverse elements from the point of view of their politics and economics.

On the economic front my views are left. I can support for that reason the Soviet dictatorship, which tolerates no civil liberties. I do so because, though I oppose dictatorship in principle, the Soviet Union has already achieved economic liberties far greater than exist elsewhere in the world. In the long run the only ground on which liberty can be securely based is economic. The "workers' democracy," despite the limitations of dictatorship, is the nearest approach to freedom that workers have ever achieved—and they constitute all but a small minority.

New York, December 19

ROGER BALDWIN

Mr. Krutch Replies

DEAR MR. BALDWIN:

Thanks for your letter. I know that the American Civil Liberties Union has more important things to do than to carry on a controversy like this, but I am going to answer your letter anyway. My original question was prompted by the book you wrote a year or two ago about Russia. I am well aware that the union makes a practice of defending the civil liberties of all sorts of people, but I assume that this is merely because you believe that in a democracy it is only by such tactics that you can effectively fight for the civil liberties of the particular kinds of persons you are interested in. It does seem to me, however, that it all comes down to this: I believe in civil liberties as long as my side is in the minority and can enjoy liberty only by granting it to others, but of course if my minority should become the majority it would promptly deny to others the liberty which it now claims for itself.

I feel that free criticism is the only thing which could possibly prevent any dictatorship or bureaucracy from becoming completely corrupt. The article you inclose says that when the power of the working class has been achieved, you are for "maintaining it by any means whatsoever." The only way it can maintain itself is by securing the right of criticism.

New York, December 31

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

From Mr. Baldwin

DEAR MR. KRUTCH:

I have to add a postscript to our correspondence in the light of yours of the thirty-first, to say that I entirely agree that the right of criticism is indispensable to the successful conduct of any government. In the Soviet Union they have sought to achieve that by what they call self-criticism in the Communist Party—a quite limited right I agree—and the development of the so-called workers-and-peasants correspondents all over the Soviet Union, who are encouraged to register complaints and kicks with the authorities.

I know this does not take the place of a political opposition, but I concur in the view that this is quite impracticable in a period such as that through which Soviet Russia is going. For a political opposition would strike at the very framework of a socialist state. I say all this, deploring, as I know you do, the terrorism and highly concentrated political power of the present regime in Russia. I can tolerate it only as preferable to the concentrations of power in capitalist countries.

New York, January 2

ROGER BALDWIN

From Mr. Krutch

DEAR MR. BALDWIN:

You say that political opposition is "quite impracticable" in Russia today. Now I am constantly being assured by Communists that while capitalism is obviously collapsing, communism is inevitable. If this is true, then is it not obvious that a communist state is in a better position than a capitalist one to permit opposition?

New York, January 9

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Labor and Industry

How Radical Are the Farmers?

By JAMES RORTY

Pierre, South Dakota

DURING the month of November I traveled some two thousand miles by automobile through the agricultural regions of Wisconsin, Minnesota, and South Dakota. I talked to scores of farmers, as well as to educators, agricultural economists, journalists, farmer-business men connected with the producers' and consumers' cooperatives, and miscellaneous citizens. In addition I attended two conventions of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union—the Wisconsin State convention at Wausau and the national convention at Sioux Falls, South Dakota.

When, in an effort to ingratiate myself with the farm leaders I encountered at the state and national conventions, I explained that I owned a few acres in southern Connecticut on which I grew a few cabbages, they shrugged and changed the subject. They were right. I am no farmer. In fact, I have always thought farmers a pretty stupid lot. When I intimated as much, they suddenly became interested. They agreed with me. They could prove it. They did prove it in closely documented speeches to their assembled "brothers and sisters"—this being the prevailing form of address. And this is how they talked to their brothers and sisters at the state convention at Wausau, Wisconsin:

"You are a class, a class of slaves, a voiceless herd of cattle. For years you have understood that you were the slaves of society. Why else have you educated John or Mary to be a doctor, a teacher, a business man—anything but a farmer? You have sent the best minds, the best spirits to the city, and have left the worst on the farm to become the future peons of America. What makes you think you have anything in common with these bankers, business men, Rotarians? They are a class; they know it, and organize as a class. Well, it's time you did the same thing. You've got to take out a card in a militant farm union."

It sounds like the anarchist Galleani in his best rabble-raising manner. But the speaker is Charles Talbott, president of the North Dakota Farmers' Union. He owns a big ranch near Jamestown, North Dakota. He is no peon. In Russia they would call him a kulak, or even a landed proprietor. And at the national convention at Sioux Falls a week later he was standing with the right wing of the convention, which wanted to placate the secedent Nebraska union by yielding to their demand that Edward E. Kennedy, the national secretary, be replaced. The right wing lost when the candidacy of Cal Ward, Kansas president, for the national vice-presidency was ruled out on the ground that a farmer-union man who got more of his income from the government than he did from the union was not eligible to hold a national office. (Ward had been paid $15 a day by the AAA in connection with the corn-hog acreage-reduction program.) In the convention fight the expletives "pay-roller" and "bird-dog" were freely used in the lobbies and even on the floor. But Fritz Shulheis, retiring National Board member, who was active in the fight against the right-wingers, himself holds the position of Deputy Commissioner of Agriculture in Wisconsin, having been put in the position more or less at the demand of the Wisconsin Farmers' Union. And both left-wing and right-wing spokesmen were equally eloquent in denouncing the scarcity-promotion program of Secretary Wallace and in demanding "cost of production," government refinancing of farm loans, and agricultural embargoes. I was obliged to conclude, therefore, that farmers' conventions, like labor conventions, are highly political, that the strife of leaders is intense; that as between right, center, and left only a highly sophisticated reporter—not the present writer—could be quite sure which was which.

Surely, one would suppose, Milo Reno represents the left of the farmers' movement. It was he who put Cal Ward on the spot in the national convention, and no one denounced more loudly the program of the Triple A. Well, I pursued Brother Reno to his hotel, scratched him, and found the fundamentalist underneath. Cost of production, remonetization of silver, embargoes on agricultural products—he was emphatically for the Farmers' Union line. But would not this line lead ultimately to the nationalization of the land as the only permanent solution? No. That would be communism and he was against communism.

"I'm a believer in the Bible," said Milo Reno. That gave me rather a jolt. Wilbur Glenn Voliva had said the same thing when I interviewed him in Zion City a month before. Wilbur also believes, or pretends to believe, that the earth is flat. Wilbur also believes in some kind of ecclesiastical cooperative commonwealth, although the cooperatively produced peanut brittle I bought in the Zion restaurant was not good. Wilbur wears a prehistoric boiled shirt with foot-long cuffs that stick out at you like cannon when you sit opposite him. I had to go through two secretaries and three deacons before I was privileged to interview the prophet. The top of his square head was dusty, like the white-maned head of Bryan in his last, fundamentalist period. He reads the papers. He says he gets his prophecies of doom out of the Bible but I think he gets them out of the papers. The little boys in Zion City speak slightly of the prophet. They refer to his tabernacle as the "White Dove Movie Palace." I think the prophet knew that I knew that he didn't believe in his prophecies, or care much. A seedy, dusty, dated showman, but useful by way of reminding us that fundamentalism still lives and must be watched out for. Reno is not like that. His political principles are disorganized, unintelligent, unformulated, but he has been a fighter, a leader ahead of his crowd, and in some respects he still is. But he remains a Middle Western fundamentalist.

It may be, of course, that the Holiday Association is to the left of its national president. Of all the farmers' meetings I attended, the most impressive was a conference of delegates from the drought-stricken counties of western Minnesota, organized by John Bosch, president of the Minnesota Holiday Association, to petition Governor Olson for more help than the FERA and AAA were giving them. For the better part of a day they matched facts and arguments with the state relief administrator and came out better than even. Not, however, with more stock feed, which was what they wanted. There was no money for that. They warned that the farmers had only two or three days' feed ahead for their stock; that if the snow came and covered what was left of the meager forage, the farmers would probably take by force what little grain and roughage there was stored in the region. (They did precisely that at Appleton, Minnesota, a few days later.) And by way of summing up, one exasperated farmer shouted: "Why doesn't the government treat this drought as a calamity instead of as a plaything?"

This man, you would say, must have been a thoroughly class-conscious farmer. I visited him later at his farm near Montevideo. House, barns, and land were well kept. Here again was no peon. He told me that he had been a dealer in land in Iowa and had lost out in the "landslide" a few years ago. He had salvaged enough to make a good payment on 200 acres of Minnesota land and had done reasonably well until the dry years came. As business man and farmer, alternately and both together, he was more or less typical of the membership not merely of the Farmers' Union but of the Holiday Association. That is one reason why it is hard to make the phrase "class consciousness" mean anything as applied to farmers. Farmers are in business. Farmers are also traders and capitalists—oppressed and dispossessed capitalists, if you like, but still pretty much dominated by the individualist business man's psychology.

Why, for example, doesn't the Holiday Association, most of whose members also belong to the Farmers' Union, merge with the latter organization? Because the Holiday Association is not in business, owns no property, and is consequently foot-loose, whereas the Farmers' Union is tied to a complex structure of producers' and consumers' cooperatives, most of which center in St. Paul. The members of the Holiday Association describe themselves cheerfully as the "scrubwomen" for the Farmers' Union. It is they who stop evictions and stage milk strikes. And it is they, significantly, who join forces with organized labor, as recently when the Minnesota Holiday Association fed the striking truck drivers of Minneapolis. As for the Farmers' Union, as late as the convention of 1924 it came close to passing a resolution deploring the use of the strike as a weapon in labor disputes. It has traveled leftward since then, but not as far as one might suppose.

The farmers are in business. The Sioux Falls convention passed a resolution introduced by the delegate from California, K. V. Garrod, who is incidentally a member of the California State Board of Agriculture, opposing "unreasonable rules applied by the Food and Drug Administration for the protection of the consumer." The trouble was about prune juice, a designation for the new product of the California Prune Growers' Association which the Food and Drug Administration objected to. More importantly, the Minnesota union split two years ago because the "educational"—that is to say, political-organizational-legislative—part of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union couldn't get along with the cooperative part, which means the Farmers' Union Central Exchange, Live Stock Commission, and Grain Corporation.

A word about these cooperatives. Radical phrases such as the "cooperative commonwealth" are imbedded in their constitutions and declarations of principles. But with the possible exception of the Finnish cooperatives in northwestern Minnesota they seem to be anything but class conscious, and many of the cooperative leaders make a point of being non-political as a matter of principle. The Finns have a small string of cooperative stores centering in Cloquet, Minnesota, and in this region have more or less completed the circuit of producer and consumer cooperatives. For them cooperation has a social and cultural content derived from their old-country tradition; only with great difficulty is any such content injected into the American cooperatives by the educational program of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union. The Finns don't understand this. A while back, at a cooperative meeting, a disgusted Finn exclaimed: "You Americans think a cooperative is something to make money out of." That is pretty much what they do think. And in a Farmer-Labor state like Minnesota the non-political philosophy of the cooperatives raises some curious contradictions.

The cooperatives, especially the consumer cooperatives founded on the cooperative distribution of gasoline and oil, have been flourishing during the depression, and one does not wish in the least to discount their significance. At the moment an FERA investigator with a staff of nearly a hundred people is gathering statistical and other information concerning the cooperatives of the Northwest. As money-saving enterprises, and as economic arms of the Farmers' Union, they have contributed aid—especially the check-off of Farmers' Union dues—as well as embarrassment. But it is not unfair to say that the growth of the cooperatives cannot be taken, in and of itself, as an index of the spread of radicalism among the farmers.

The Farmers' Union Youth Movement—otherwise known as the "Juniors"—will be a better index when and if it really gets going. The Juniors were very much in the foreground at both the Wausau and the Sioux Falls conventions. They sang and recited and danced and produced the inevitable pageant with a stage populated by the personified abstractions of Truth, Justice, and so on. A chorus of farm boys in overalls and red bandannas sang:

Don't go to the left,
Don't go to the right,
But right in the middle of the road.

Artistically, some of the numbers exhibited an unfortunate miscegenation of Broadway and the prairies. But others were pretty good, and on the whole the Juniors were impressive. The report of the Junior chairman states:

If we are forced to abandon capitalism we must adopt another system of economics; there is but one path open to a free people, and that is the collectivism of cooperation. It is imperative that our children understand how to use the principles of cooperation as the only known defense against a dictatorship of capital, with its impending rule of terror, sabotage, and war.

What kind of radicalism is this, and is it likely to develop a philosophy, an organization, a program adequate to deal with the social and political situation facing the farmers? Only the future can answer.

Meanwhile it may be said that on the showing of the Sioux Falls convention the farmers are making progress. No new splits developed, and the national secretary reported the organization of new state unions in Alabama, Michigan, Indiana, and Ohio, with a combined new membership of 40,000; also fifteen other states in process of organization. All factions represented at the convention united in opposing the crop-reduction program of the AAA and in demanding that when the government takes plebiscites of the farmers it give them a chance to vote for a cost-of-production as against a crop-reduction program.

But the most impressive thing about these farmers' meetings was the farmers who attended them. They are not peons yet; they are not as dumb as they like to call themselves; and most of them—the younger ones especially—have stopped being fundamentalists. There are better, more realistic ideas brewing under the surface than appear in the Farmers' Union "line." What with one thing and another, it looks like more trouble ahead for Secretary Wallace.

A Cross Section of Insecurity

By EVELYN SEELEY

Washington, January 7

WHILE the Seventy-fourth Congress was opening on Capitol Hill, another congress—the National Congress for Unemployment and Social Insurance—was opening in rambling old Washington Auditorium. Representative Ernest Lundeen of Minnesota, sponsor of the Workers' Bill for Unemployment and Social Insurance which this congress met to support, came, he said, from "the little Congress on Capitol Hill" to this, "the big congress." Certainly this "big congress," as one looked and listened, was a more dynamic and realistic cross-section of the country.

Twenty-six hundred industrial, agricultural, and professional workers had come from forty states, delegates from organizations representing millions of workers, to plan how to establish a new concept of social insurance—namely, that "continuity of average income, with an established minimum equal to a living standard, must be assured through governmental action." They were Socialists, Communists, Farmer-Laborites, Lovestonites, and people of no affiliation or philosophical category. There was, nevertheless, only one argument—inspired not by a political faction but by a young careerist—and only one threatened fight—between two individuals, and women at that. The Congress was, in fact, as many speakers said, the nucleus of the broadest united front workers had ever seen.

Delegates had come by train, bus, horseback, and on foot. The first man in from California had come, and must return, on $10 for total expenses. He said that the increasing discontent in California, manifested by last summer's general strike and by the great vote for Upton Sinclair, was an expression of the need for what he called "a real people's program." A farmer from Ohio grinned and said, "I rode in on a pig." Having no money to send him, his farmers' union had raffled off a neighbor's pig. He told how at last the farmers of his state had begun to organize for their own needs. A tall, lanky, sandy chap from a Wyoming ranch, member of the Farm Holiday Association, rolled in, with six Denver delegates from industrial unions, in a homestead shack mounted on a truck—its larder stocked with fried chicken and pie from the Wyoming ranch house and home-baked beans from Denver. He said his family, living on a ranch inherited from his grandfather and worked by his father and brothers, was holding its own but that all around him ranchers faced bleak deprivation. A gray-haired, eagle-beaked, deep-eyed boilermaker from Denver, a passenger in the homestead caravan, said: "I will fight to the bitter end for real unemployment insurance. Never can they get me to sign the Wagner bill. I have worked too hard for my Socialist and union cards for thirty-five years to let them force me to become a coward or a traitor to the workers." A bent little share-cropper from Virginia came with friends in a battered Ford. He said: "When my father died, he left me a team of mules but the mortgage people took them away from me. Then along come a fellow with a fine wagon and a team of mules and he could work the land. Now I got nothing." These are only a few samples to indicate the broad geographical range of the delegates: weather-beaten farmers, pale factory workers, big-muscled steel workers, sallow miners, bow-legged cowboys, broad-shouldered longshoremien, bearded architects, studious professors, fact-filled social workers, actors and writers and newspaper reporters; the butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker; the doctor, the lawyer, and the union chief.

The congress made history because it was the first time professional workers had met with industrial and agricultural workers for a common need. It was the first time, in other words, that white-collar workers had expressed their new realization that their fundamental status is precisely the same as that of every other worker, that their traditional aloofness in the clouds of pure professional integrity did not protect them from suffering more seriously in proportion to their numbers than any other group, and that they too must organize for their economic security. They stated their position at a special meeting—as part of the congress—of the Interprofessional Association for Social Insurance, to which most professional groups represented belong and which all other professionals attended. They said:

The professional worker's relatively privileged status is gone. He now knows unemployment, insecurity, hunger, want. More than half the architects, engineers, chemists, research and laboratory workers in this country have no work. Teachers, nurses, and government employees in general have been let out in increasing numbers. Musicians, artists, dentists, and physicians have suffered a steep decline in income because the great mass of people lack money to buy their services. . . . The numbers of all these groups are being constantly augmented by college graduates for whom there is no future under our present system.

The professional worker . . . has been turning increasingly to the promotion of broad . . . groups whose orientation is frankly economic and which seek security for their members through collective action on specific issues and joint action with other workers' groups on common issues.

This was news to the labor world, news voiced by some of the best and most able persons in the professions. Seasoned trade-unionists may have looked on at first a bit skeptically, wondering if the professional people had come to see what the other half was like or if they did, in fact, mean business. They listened to Mary van Kleeck, head of the Interprofessional Association for Social Insurance, as she wound up a brilliant analysis of their joint concept of social insurance with these words:

This address must close with an assurance to the workers of America that an increasing number of professional workers and technicians are ready to place at the disposal of the organized labor movement not only the technical, professional, and scientific knowledge which is needed for the solution of the nation's problems, but also the devotion and loyalty of a group to a movement which in all history is alone the source of progressive social change.

When she finished, the great audience rose to a man, cheered and whistled and applauded until even farmers' calloused hands were stinging.

This response, repeated in less degree as individual professional groups sent spokesmen to the platform, was construed by the professionals not so much as labor's recognition of the fact that the professionals had at last come over to it as labor's acceptance of the professionals as equals in realism.

Labor Notes

The President and Steel

COMING too late in the history of Section 7-a to be of much use, the recent election orders which the National Steel Labor Relations Board has directed against the United States Steel Corporation possess a purely academic interest. Hiding behind the puppet company union, the Steel Corporation has already projected the orders into the federal courts, where they will remain entangled in the red tape of the judicial process for many months. They cannot possibly come to a determinate issue, that is, to a review by the Supreme Court, before the Recovery Act, Section 7-a included, expires in mid-June. Why did the Steel Board wait six months before it sought to bring about a showdown on collective-bargaining referendums? The answer is simple. In his anxiety to promote labor-capital "truces," the President conveniently forgot all about the terms of the steel truce executed last summer. When he extended the iron and steel code on May 30, 1934—a week after the Amalgamated, its recognition demands rejected, began to prepare for a strike—the President pledged his word that he would shortly provide for Section 7-a elections in every unit of the industry. When William Green, on June 15, 1934, talked the Amalgamated out of the strike due to begin the very next day, he appeared in a quasi-official role and gave tacit assurances that the government was about to set true collective bargaining in motion. When the Steel Labor Board was created on June 28, 1934, the executive order conferred election power upon it and stipulated that majority rule should govern. By this time, however, the strike threat had died down, at least temporarily.

For half a year thereafter the Steel Labor Board refrained from exercising its theoretical election powers. Instead, it held hearings and tried to argue employers and the union into working out formulas of accommodation. By December, 1934, steel production was picking up at a brisk rate; a strike once again became possible. At this point the Administration intervened with proposals which denied point by point the terms of the original truce. Bind yourself to a new truce, the Amalgamated was urged; submit to proportional representation; permit compulsory arbitration; and agree to forgo election demands for the next six months. For once in its history the Amalgamated was clever enough to avoid the snares of the "national run-around." Moral suasion upon the workers having failed, the Steel Board proceeded to turn the feeble sanctions of the law, long overdue, upon the employers.

The steel strike, if it comes, will constitute the most violent labor explosion of the New Deal. The Administration has sidestepped any true showdown with the feudal barons of the steel mills. If union recognition is worth fighting for, the workers will have to carry on the fight by and for themselves.

Prodding the A. F. of L.

THE recent victory of the striking printers at the Altum Press in New York City centers attention on a labor situation which is distinctly unusual. The strike was conducted by the Independent Printing Employees, a new organization. For years New York newspaper and book printers have been organized in A. F. of L. craft locals. These have not striven seriously to unionize job-printing plants, which are difficult to approach on craft lines because they seldom employ more than one or two workers in each craft. Union books have been closed and initiation fees set high enough to discourage applicants. Craft officials justify such exclusiveness largely on the ground that, with many members unemployed, to admit more might ruin conditions in union shops. In truth, many union men, hiding their affiliation, now work in non-union shops at non-union wages. The cutthroat competition among "cockroach bosses" has jeopardized the status of organized and unorganized workers alike.

The Independent Printing Employees began more than a year ago to organize the unorganized. The union now has over 1,000 members. It holds that the protection of all must be based on universal organization and job expansion through a compulsory thirty-hour week. Its chief demand is for admission of the unorganized into the A. F. of L. "We are no dual union," says the I. P. E. president, D. S. Gordon. "We advocate solving the problem of the unorganized through a joint organizing drive with the Allied Printing Trades unions. Perhaps there is need for a special local embracing all crafts in the small shops. Thus far most of the unions have ignored the question, although some officials seem inclined to discuss it. The I. P. E. has been approached by an agent of an ink corporation whose credit control makes it a power in the industry. He proposed to make a company union of the I. P. E. Kicked downstairs by us, he is now organizing a company union to fight us and the A. F. of L. Unless the latter answers satisfactorily the questions we raise, there is grave danger of a union-smashing drive with further deterioration of wages and working conditions throughout the industry."

While knocking for admittance on the closed doors of the A. F. of L., the I. P. E. has been conducting a fight against the violators of the Graphic Arts code, which culminated in the Altum Press strike. The Altum Press workers filed a complaint against their employers through the I. P. E. more than ten months ago. They were given the usual national run-around from the code authorities to the Labor Compliance Board, from the Regional Labor Board to the State Labor Board. Finally, when one of their men was fired for union activities and refused reinstatement despite an order from the State Labor Board, a strike was called on December 11. In five days the employers came to terms with the union. As a result of its quick victory the I. P. E. has tremendously increased its influence among the printing employees, both organized and unorganized. It may yet compel the A. F. of L. to open its doors.

Books, Drama, Films

Values and Manners for Radicals

Was Europe a Success? By Joseph Wood Krutch. Farrar and Rinehart. $1.

THE battle is on in the literary field. And it is a more fundamental controversy than that embodied in, let us say, Mike Gold's attack on the alleged superficialities and evasions of those who write pleasantly merely to entertain the leisure class. V. F. Calverton and Granville Hicks in "The Liberation of American Literature" and "The Great Tradition," respectively, have argued that the real fruition of American literature lies ahead with the full recognition of the class struggle, proletarian values, and the social revolution. John Strachey, in his "Literature and Dialectical Materialism," has gone even farther and contended that the significant writer of today must not only espouse the above dogmas but must also undergo an emotional conversion and submit to a complete mental discipline which closes his mind to any contrary suggestions.

Joseph Wood Krutch picks up the gauntlet for the liberals, albeit a very advanced group of liberals, and returns to the charge in an expanded version of his notable articles in The Nation. He uses a rapier rather than a bludgeon and reminds one of the intellectual subtlety of a Bayle arrayed against the Jesuits and other dogmatists of nearly three centuries ago. His little book is by all odds the most damaging criticism of the intellectual temper and literary manners of the exuberant Marxians and Communists that I know of in any language. Preserving the utmost good nature throughout, his analysis is utterly devastating as a study of the weaknesses in the undeviating radical temper and perspective.

The main contentions of the author are: (1) that the liberal differs from the dogmatic Communist mainly in seeking what appears to be immediately desirable rather than what is alleged to be "inevitable," according to the Marxian dialectic; and (2) that no social or economic system can be justified if it repudiates intellectual urbanity and civilized attitudes and tastes. By the latter he does not mean the rationalizations and obscurations of the predatory leisure class, but those intellectual and aesthetic standards and values which have been approved by civilized writers from Plato to Huxley and Bertrand Russell.

Many will be likely to hold that Mr. Krutch has been ill-advised in assuming to be writing as the champion of liberalism, for he apparently has little use for the optimistic temporizers who think that a cancer can be treated successfully with an ice pack or by cauterization. He comes far closer to writing a brief for civilized radicalism. I can see little in his book with which Bertrand Russell, for example, would differ very sharply. But he certainly sails into the 100 per cent dogmatic Marxians, especially the recent and fanatical converts to the new theology.

Mr. Krutch shows that Marx and Engels were just as sure that capitalism was on its last legs in 1848 as the Daily Worker is that the days of capitalism are numbered in 1935. He holds that there is nothing "inevitable" in history, and that the class struggle may very well go on indefinitely if governments allow it to proceed with some fairness. The radicals appear to believe that bourgeois civilization must disappear root and branch and that we are in a "new Middle Ages" which will prove to be the transition to the proletarian Utopia. The liberal, Mr. Krutch compares to Plato and the radical to Tertullian:

He [the liberal intellectual] may even be convinced that the economic system of the modern world has outlived its day and cannot possibly last much longer. But even granting the possibility that the most radical radicals are right in their main contentions, he feels himself on surer ground in asserting that, however right they may be in their conclusions, both their thinking and their writing certainly lack all those secondary virtues which are commonly implied when we speak of anything or anyone as "civilized." The thinking and the writing are dogmatic, harsh, and intolerant. They are full of an intense and burning hatred for that urbanity, detachment, and sense of fair play which make thinking amiable and which liberals pretend, at least, to admire.

Some of the best sections in the book are those in which Mr. Krutch compares the contemporary "reds" at length with the early Christian controversialists—with their mystical faith, their belief that the slightest questioning is blasphemous, their fierce hates, their intolerance, and their insistence upon 100 per cent acquiescence in the most minute phases of the creed. In their deification of the worker they seem to Mr. Krutch much like Rousseau and his apotheosis of the noble savage. He has little relish for the radical belief that there can be no art for art's sake—that the artists must be "in uniform," to use Max Eastman's phrase, and must make art and literature a vehicle of proletarian propaganda and technique. He also chides the radicals for their inconsistency in fiercely attacking international capitalistic war and in the same breath glorifying the proletarian class war which they allege to be impending.

How shall one assess the outcome of Mr. Krutch's joust with the radical writers? My own prejudices are all with his argument. Urbanity has appealed to me as the highest of human virtues—one Montaigne is worth an army of Loyolas or John Calvins. I would much prefer resolute gradualism to revolution in economic reconstruction if it were feasible. But there seems pathetically little real evidence in the Western world that gradualism has any strength or prospects, especially now that the New Deal has petered out and become a mere bid for the cooperation of the moguls of predatory finance and the "captains" of exploitative business, mainly on their own terms.

One contention does not need Karl Marx to back it up, and that is that a man must eat before he can have any mind or art or urbanity. It is becoming ever more evident that capitalism neither can nor will feed its sheep. It begins to look as though revolution, though not necessarily a bloody one, is the sole way in which the economic requirements of a civilized society can be assured in any reasonably complete or permanent way.

Some will doubtless feel that the outcome of Mr. Krutch's book is encouragement of a profound pessimism: capitalism is economically hopeless and communism is today intellectually barbarous—as is also militant capitalism in the form of fascism. The civilized man is intellectually all dressed up with no place to go. Perhaps the best way of resolving the dilemma is to regard Mr. Krutch as writing not so much a refutation of, or direct attack upon, the basic principles of economic radicalism as a most powerful and engaging argument for better intellectual manners and sounder aesthetic values on the part of contemporary radicals.

There is some basis for this view in Mr. Krutch's own argument, for he points out clearly the fallacy of American radicals in their slavish aping of Russian communism, which had to adopt methods suitable to a backward and barbarous culture that does not exist in Western Europe or the United States. There may be no real need for American Communists to adopt with the most abject intellectual servility the repulsive, if necessary, intellectual harshness and brutality of Russian radicalism today. American radicalism will make headway among those who count here just in proportion as it makes its appeal in terms that do not repel every man with any intellectual subtlety or spirit of fair play. Moreover, and this is a point which Mr. Krutch might wrestle with in a new edition, the advanced technology of the Western nations might permit so rapid and easy a transition to communism that the abysmal "dark ages" which Mr. Krutch fears would hardly be perceptible. There is no reason why economic reason and justice must of necessity be harnessed to intellectual barbarism.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

Unemployment Insurance in Great Britain

The British Attack on Unemployment. By A. A. C. Hill, Jr., and Isador Lubin. The Brookings Institution. $3.

SO much unmerited censure and unearned praise have been bestowed on the unemployment-insurance system of Great Britain that only the expert can describe it as less than a mythological wonder. It is far from perfect, even with the reforms introduced in the Act of 1934, and its critics, had they been wise, might have flooded this country with far more accurate derogations than they did. But they condemned it in many particulars for what was its strength, and ignored its inestimable service to Britain during the depression. Most discussion has been a debate not on the system but on the advisability of any kind of insurance whatever. Now that unemployment has become a major political fact in America, no longer to be hidden simply by being unmentioned, the British system of insurance deserves close study as the fruit of human experience from which much is to be learned. The first lesson, and one which Washington may well consider first, is that the establishment of unemployment insurance is a long, intricate, and experimental process. Even after thirteen years of depression the British have found answers for only the simplest of their problems.

Mr. Hill and Mr. Lubin have written a terse history and description of the British experiment, rounded out with a valuable critique. They like the contributory basis in Britain and do not foresee any advantage in changing it, though they might mention that such men as Snowden and Lloyd George now regret that contributions were taken from labor. Their chief criticisms are that the labor exchanges need to be much more effective, that five million workers, nearly all good insurance risks, are not covered and do not help bear the cost of the scheme, and that rates of contribution, being by age and sex, are not as satisfactory as if made according to income. They also point out the defect that insurance is against time lost, instead of income lost. The reader may be surprised to learn that the cost of the system to industry, paying roughly a third of the bill, has been an average of $75,000,000 a year, or 1.6 per cent of the industrial wage bill, an extraordinarily cheap protection against civil unrest. The reader, too, will be reminded that the British have made no real effort to reduce unemployment by public works, confining their spending for this end to the years before the crisis of 1931. The book should be in the hand of every Congressman and legislator who must vote this year on bills which launch the kindred experiment of insurance in America, not because the British system is a pattern, but because this lucid analysis gives a realistic measure of the scope of the problem.

RAYMOND GRAM SWING

New Lyrics for Old

Permit Me Voyage. By James Agee. Yale University Press. $2.

TO take exception first to four of the pieces in this book, Epithalamium, Chorale, Ann Garner, and Dedication: the first two are exercises, logical attempts for a young, experimenting poet to make, able as such, but more interesting as the data of poetry than as successful poetical statements. Ann Garner, it is said, was written while Agee was still in school, which is explanation, not excuse. Emotionally and factually it is a bit of back-to-the-bulls-and-Jeffers, a trial in blank verse without distinction, again data. The inclusion of Dedication was made, I imagine, in self-defense, precipitated by the current fashion of reviewers to label a man by his social conscience, national fervor, primitive sensuality, everything but by his achievement in handling his medium. Its interest, besides that to be found in the objects of its tribute, in the information that the author believes in God and pays homage to certain men and women living and dead, lies in its affirmation of positive Christian—not here a synonym for Aryan—virtues, of the complexity and paradox of man's character and institutions, of the dignity of man, of the threat of the evil that lurks in high place and the benightedness among the lowly. In such affirmation is a restatement of certain observations not now fashionable, which Agee insists are worthy and valid. Yet again these are data, those data of belief and emotion which Archibald MacLeish, in his preface to the book, warns us about mistaking for art.

Agee's art is in the short poems at the beginning of the volume, in the title poem ending the volume, and in the sonnets. Admiration for them increases with rereading, admiration for the firm dexterity of their technique, for the right and individual choice of the words, for the true and ably ordered sound of syllables and lines. It is emotive verse, dependent on the correct descriptive word, on the implication in the arrangement of those words, and not on the final metaphor. It is sentient, and its sentiency is pointed with active reason and humor, which, as in an occasional phrase, bring short echoes, if you like, of the early seventeenth century and of some contemporaries. But the suggestion of derivation is never derogatory or harmful when, as with Agee, its impression is cut short by a transformation essentially the poet's own.

So with his music: his lyrics have the same functional grace and movement, the same clear melody that English poetry had when it was by descent and practice nearer performance on musical instruments or by the human voice. There is nothing, however, borrowed from the other art and imposed upon the lines, no confusion of material, nothing that is not a natural property of the words themselves, no artificial use of liquids and gutturals to fabricate a counterpoint, a cadence, a rhythm that does not actually belong to poetry.

In censure it may be wished that Agee would permit more detail in his poems. They are closed to it now, confined by what are probably his reservations about the uses and purpose of poetry, but this restriction in attitude—not a limitation in perception—makes one wonder in what ways his future verses can differ without repetition from these. At the moment his talent is well fitted, well exercised, but it could be loosened without lessening its effect. His perceptions are especially sensitive to the comedy and sorrow of living, to the good and need of love, to the year's changes into seasons, to the fresh newness of that old brawl, man versus nature. In the shorter lyrics this gamut stretches from the gentle "I loitered weeping with my bride for gladness" to the lusty Happy Hen. It is more formalized in the sonnet sequence, which is also a cycle, an autobiography. For the irrelevantly curious, there is no invocation to the masses, nor, as a corrective, is there retreat. There is a firm new lyric gift approaching maturity with strenuous precedents self-imposed.

FLORENCE CODMAN

The Power Theory of Politics

Political Power. By Charles E. Merriam. Whittlesey House. $3.

THE most significant work in the entire field of political science at the present moment is probably being done at the University of Chicago. Here alone there is adequate recognition that the problem of the power appetite is one which neither bourgeois nor Marxist political theorists have done more than evade. Peculiarly the Marxists have fallen down over it. Professor T. V. Smith has just produced a fascinating book on the philosophy of the problem, of which one can say that if the kill takes place in the twilight of skepticism, the hunt is an absorbing pursuit. Professor Lasswell's forthcoming book may be of momentous importance to the technical student. The present work is the second volume of this trilogy. It discusses such issues as "the birth of power," not without attention to psychology, the reasons why power is regarded with repugnance by moralists, the significance of propaganda, and others of equal interest.

Machiavelli's "Prince" has been called a manual for practicing diplomats. Marx wrote a quarto, and Lenin thirty volumes, as a practical manual for the class war. This book also is a "manual of power." When Signor Mussolini reads, in Professor Merriam's book, "It is important that leaders possess some facility in invention," I do not doubt that he will concur. But I cannot feel convinced that Mussolini is likely to consult Professor Merriam's collection of data as a vade mecum for the attainment of sovereign rule. Its statements lack the precision that recognizes that "le détail c'est tout."

Professor Merriam has a singularly honest and unprejudiced mind. He approaches his subject with a proper preference for description rather than for premature and pretentious dogmatism. He even seems to feel that there is scientific virtue in the absence of definition. Thus the word "power" itself—not to speak of the word "political"—is haunted to the end with an ambiguity between technological power and the appetite for personal power. At least Professor Merriam has none of the chastity-imperative in confronting the allurements of power that characterized Lord Acton. He concludes with something like a mystical paean to the "emergent trend of power" molding the new world, coupled with a hesitant proviso that these "conflicting controls . . . sweeping on" had better be guided by intelligence.

The most valuable parts of this experimental book are in the indication of the nexus between "conditional anarchy" and Marxist revolution; the statement of the issue between the expert society and the free society; the description of the role of technological change in the brave new world; and the suggestion that the study of the method of politics, and of the uniformities or laws that have been revealed in the conduct of revolution after revolution in our own times, is more important for the scientist than the question of which brutal group actually achieves power. The laws of human nature are mightier even than dictators and condition their success. It is for us to serve, by patient study, this nature if we would ultimately control it. This suggestive book will be remembered among the pioneer works toward that end of social control.

GEORGE E. G. CATLIN

The Career of Alfred Stieglitz

America and Alfred Stieglitz. A Collective Portrait. Edited by Waldo Frank, Lewis Mumford, Dorothy Norman, Paul Rosenfeld, and Harold Rugg. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

"THIS book," write the editors in a short, pertinent preface, "is not a collection of tributes, it is not a symposium of opinions, it is not a compilation of facts about a man. The life of Alfred Stieglitz has been lived in active relation with the world; his work has been in the deepest sense a communal work. This book is an attempt to express the nature of the career of Alfred Stieglitz by being, itself, in spirit and form, a communal work, a work organic with its subject." The volume is divided into two parts. The first of these presents the body of the subject in historical and biographical terms. Part Two treats less personally of Stieglitz and is more ideological. Dr. Harold Rugg evaluates Stieglitz's place within "the Great Transition," the forty years of drastic social change between the 1890's and the present time, in which "the First Industrial Revolution catapulted into the Second," and "the wasteful Machine Age passed quickly over into the efficient Power Age"; Dr. Evelyn Howard and Waldo Frank discuss his relationship to the philosophy of science and to the organic evolution of mankind. In a special section labeled Variations on the Theme there appear memoirs of personal relationships with Stieglitz in both lyrical and narrative form, followed by an essay on the machine by Paul Strand and a discussion, technically interesting, however obscure, on the aesthetic significance of photography, by Evelyn Scott.

Stieglitz was born at the end of the Civil War, when photography was still in its prenatal stages. When he was ten years old, however, and was spending the summer with his parents at Lake George, he became a regular visitor to the laboratory of the village tintyper, where he naively probed the mysteries of light striking a sensitive plate. As a university student he switched from mechanical engineering to photochemistry and in 1887 won his first recognition in an amateur competition held in London. About four months after his matriculation from the Berlin Polytechnic a camera with a single lens resting in the window of a shop in the Klosterstrasse held his attention. He bought the camera, studied it, experimented with it. He was dissatisfied with the explanation of his instructor that in photography compromises are inevitable, that the faithful reproduction of a plaster Juno with a black cloth is impossible. He purchased a modern camera and took up the dry plate, which had recently appeared in the market. He improvised a dark room. He was told that the camera could photograph only in daylight. He shut himself and his camera in a cellar "lit by a weak electric lamp and occupied by a disused dynamo. He focused the camera, uncapped the lens; and after an exposure lasting for twenty-four hours, finds he has secured a perfect negative of the machine . . . deliberately, he is pushing the camera beyond accredited frontiers."

In 1890 he helped reestablish the New York Society of Amateur Photographers, which was considering the project of transforming itself into a bicycle club; he edited their magazine Camera Notes, exhibited photographs demonstrating the human friendliness of the machine, and recreated an interest in the medium. In 1903 he resigned from Camera Notes and founded Camera Work, the quarterly organ of Photo-Secession, the American branch of an international photography movement of which he was considered the international leader. In the unanimous opinion of all critics, Camera Work, where Stieglitz championed the work of Eugene, Strand, Steichen, White, and many others, remains the greatest periodical of photography ever published. He then founded and maintained the famous 291 Gallery at 291 Fifth Avenue, and in 1908 and 1911, respectively, exhibited the paintings of Matisse and Cézanne for the first time in the Western Hemisphere, as well as the first Rodin drawings, Picassos, and Toulouse-Lautrecs. Since then he has devoted his energies almost exclusively to presenting the work of John Marin, Georgia O'Keeffe, and Arthur Dove. Young men and women, artists and others, continued to seek out Stieglitz. Many of these, after viewing his photographs, talking with him, attending the exhibitions, were able to go back enriched to their own work in artistic and other fields.

Most of the contributions in the first two sections serve to indicate, within the sequence of history, and ideologically, Stieglitz's place in our civilization. The most distinguished essays are in Parts One and Two, by Lewis Mumford, Ralph Flint, Harold Rugg, Evelyn Howard, and Waldo Frank. The Variations on the Theme, except for the two critical studies by Elizabeth McCausland and Harold Clurman, the seemingly superficial but actually penetrating observations by Victoria Ocampo, and Sherwood Anderson's well-planned lyric prose, are far inferior.

"America and Alfred Stieglitz" is an unusual experiment, and a success. Despite its 120 illustrations, a special section at the end of the volume, I do not recommend it for cursory reading. The book's implications are manifold—and worthy of the sensitive reader's closest scrutiny.

ERIC ESTORICK

Drama

Heartbreak House

THE brilliant and instantaneous success of "The Petrified Forest" (Broadhurst Theater) need surprise no one.

Writing so suave and acting so ingratiating would be enough to insure the popularity of a play far less interesting in itself than this one happens to be, and even now, indeed, they make it difficult to be sure just how substantially good it really is. Mr. Sherwood, the author, has something to say and he is obviously in earnest, despite the light grace of his manner. He is also, however, too accomplished a craftsman to ask indulgence from any Broadway audience, since he knows the tricks of his trade and has a witty fluency quite sufficient to make something out of nothing. He could fool us to the top of our bent if that was what he wanted to do, and we may take it for granted that at least half of his delighted audience will like the play for reasons which have little to do with its theme. Not for the moment am I meaning to suggest that he is wrong to use his talents or that a serious play is the better for being uncouth or clumsy. I am saying only that "The Petrified Forest" could succeed upon its superficial merits alone, and that one has some difficulty in deciding whether or not one has been charmed into granting it virtues deeper than any it really has.

To begin with, the play is quite capable of standing on its feet as a simple comedy melodrama of a familiar type. The lonely filling station on the edge of the desert has been used before, and so has the band of fleeing desperadoes which descends upon it to take charge temporarily of the assorted persons who happen to find themselves there. In itself all this is merely sure-fire theatrical material, and so is the fresh and innocent rebelliousness of the budding young girl, who happens in this case to be the proprietor's daughter. Add, for love interest, a penniless young man who has made a failure at writing, and there is still little to distinguish the play from very ordinary stage fare. Imagine further that the dialogue is bright and the characterization crisply realistic. You have now a play admirably calculated to please anyone intelligent enough to prefer the routine when it happens to be well performed. What is more, this routine play can easily be detached from all the meanings which Mr. Sherwood has given it. It is complete in itself and it is, as I remarked before, quite capable of standing alone.

Yet for all this, it is plain enough that this play is double and that the familiar situations may be taken, not at their face value, but as symbols. Solidly realistic as the filling station is, it is obviously intended also as a place out of space and time where certain men can meet and realize that they are not only individuals but phenomena as well. Though there is no obvious patterning, no hint of plain allegory even for an instant, the characters represent the protagonists in what the author conceives to be the Armageddon of society. The young man is that civilized and sophisticated intelligence which has come to the end of its tether; the young girl is aspiration toward that very sensitivity and that very kind of experience which he has not ceased to admire but which have left him bankrupt at last. About them are the forces with which they realize they cannot grapple: raucous bluster in the commander of the American Legion, dead wealth in the touring banker, primitive anarchy resurgent in the killer and his gang. By whatever grotesque name the filling station may call itself, and no matter how realistic the hamburger being served across its lunch counter as "today's special" may be, the desert tavern is Heartbreak House, a disintegrating microcosm from which the macrocosm may be deduced. And the moral—or at least the only one which the only fully articulate person in the play can deduce—is a gloomy one. What he calls Nature, and what a poet once called Old Chaos, is coming again. We thought that she was beaten. We had learned her laws and we seemed to manipulate her according to our will. But she is about to have her way again. She cannot get at us with floods and pestilence because we are too clever for that. But she has got us through the mind and the spirit. Intelligence can no longer believe in anything, not even in itself. It can only stand idly by with refinement and gallantry and perception while the world is taken over by the apes once more. And so when the bullets of the posse begin to shatter the windows, the young man and the young woman drop to the floor in each other's arms. It is a symbol of all they know or can still believe in, but they have no illusion that it is enough.

When Cervantes had finished the first part of "Don Quixote," he was visited, so he says, by a friend to whom he confessed his inability to describe in any Introduction what his aim in the book might be; and upon this the friend replied that he should not worry about either explanations or meanings. "Strive," said he, "that the simple shall not be wearied and the great shall not disprove it." One can hardly deny that the method worked in that particular instance, and it works again in the case of Mr. Sherwood's play. I have, to be sure, a lingering feeling that there are dangers inherent in the effort to write on two levels at once, and some scruples about accepting as symbols things as familiar in their literal use as some which "The Petrified Forest" employs. There is an unresolvable ambiguity at times, not only concerning the meaning but also concerning the emotional tone, and the melodrama as such sometimes gets in the way of the intellectual significance. But such objections are purely intellectual. Mr. Sherwood has achieved the almost impossible feat of writing a play which is first-rate theatrical entertainment and as much more than that as one cares to make it. He has also had the good fortune to secure in Leslie Howard the ideal performer for the difficult central role. Mr. Howard has all the charm which the part calls for and yet he remains always masculine and convincing. He is also very generous with his fellow-players and permits Peggy Conklin, as the girl, and Humphrey Bogart, as the killer, to give very fine accounts of themselves.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Films

Too Good to Be True

IT is some weeks now since Messrs. Covici-Friede brought out what they announced as "the first full-length scenario for an actual talking-picture production to be published in book form as a serious example of the craft." In the meantime, it has been possible both to read the script of "The Mighty Barnum" as written by Gene Fowler and Bess Meredyth and to view the production based on it by Walter Lang, the director, with the help of Wallace Beery, Adolphe Menjou, and Janet Beecher in the principal roles. One has had time, in other words, to meditate a little on the claims set forward in the statement just quoted. That the first part of the statement is true is probably most convincingly evidenced by the rumor that this scenario in book form was completely sold out on the first day of publication. Undoubtedly many among the thousands of untutored poets of the cinema throughout the land availed themselves immediately of the hint on the dust-cover that the book might provide "a reliable and highly practical guide to their endeavors." The insertion of the word "talking," however, just saves the publishers from an inaccuracy. For several full-length scenarios for silent films are to be found scattered through the various little film magazines, including the famous Eisenstein version of Dreiser's "An American Tragedy." And one must not forget such attempts to apply the scenario form to the novel as Jules Romains's "Donogoo-Tonka" and Blaise Cendrars's "L'Or," both of which appeared more than ten years ago. But Messrs. Covici-Friede are quite justified in claiming honors for the talking picture; and it is only to the last few words in their announcement that one might object. Mr. Fowler's script is bright, lively, mildly amusing, but not, by any extension of the critical tolerance, a serious example of anything. It is all too evident that this writer whose principal talent is for the debunking wisecrack, is too busy poking fun at the whole idea of a Hollywood picture about Barnum to be much concerned with giving us the truth about Barnum and his time. This is, as a matter of fact, the trouble with the picture from beginning to end. Nobody was prepared to take Barnum with enough seriousness, that is, as a human being, to make him seem even mildly credible to a contemporary audience. It was not necessary to make Barnum consistently ludicrous; more of his absurdity could have been left to the audience to discover for itself; the real problem as always was to impose a decent restraint on life—to make this more than life-size creature seem not too good to be true. But both Mr. Fowler, in the lines and situations which he contrived, and Wallace Beery, in the unrelieved exaggeration of his performance, were carried away by their subject. Everything was possible in a picture about Barnum, and everything is put in. Let us not fail to mention the nauseating sequence of the love scenes between Barnum and the Bearded Lady, which terminates, of course, with Barnum's burning the seat of his trousers on the lady's curling iron. It is to be hoped that the neophytes who have bought the script of this picture will learn the proper use of such terms as "close shot," "sound track," and "dissolve." But it is also to be hoped that they will not be deceived into believing that it is "a serious example of the craft."

"Evergreen" (Radio City Music Hall) is also, in its way, too good to be true: a musical film from the British studios which yet manages to sustain its "penny-colored" mood very successfully from beginning to end. For this phenomenon various circumstances are responsible—an ingenious plot situation by Benn Levy, the music and lyrics of Rodgers and Hart, an American camera man, and Miss Jessie Matthews. Concerning Miss Matthews the report must be made that she can sing, dance, and act with almost equal distinction; that she possesses a quality unlike that of any other musical star on the English or American stage; and that this quality belongs quite definitely to an earlier period than our own. The period, to be exact, is the Edwardian, which happens also to be the period evoked for us in the opening sequences of the film. But Miss Matthews has about her a suggestion of the early Anna Held, as that fin de siècle symbol of Continental wickedness exists for us in old photographs of the theater, which she would probably keep in any costume or role.

WILLIAM TROY

Contributors to This Issue

JACK FISCHER is an English journalist now engaged in research work in economics at Oxford. He has been in the Saar for the past month and has written articles on the plebiscite for the London New Statesman and Nation.

B. H. HAGGIN is the music critic of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle.

JAMES RORTY, author of "Our Master's Voice: Advertising," is making an extended tour through the United States gathering material on social and economic conditions. He has published a series of articles in the New York Post and will contribute additional articles to The Nation.

EVERLYN SEELEY, a New York newspaperwoman, has been editor of the woman's page of the New York World-Telegram and feature writer for the Scripps-Howard papers and the United Press.

HARRY ELMER BARNES, a member of the editorial department of the Scripps-Howard newspapers, is the author of "A History of Social Thought" and "History of Western Civilization," to name the most recent of his many books on sociology and history.

FLORENCE CODMAN is the head of the publishing house, Arrow Editions.

GEORGE E. G. CATLIN, a member of the Department of Government at Cornell University, is the author of "Preface to Action."

Coming Soon

The Hitlerites on Hitlerism

A Collection of Gems from the Nazi Press Selected and Classified

by John Gunther

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	113
EDITORIALS:
The World Court	115
Where Is Security, Mr. Roosevelt?	116
The Casa Is Fascist	117
Sticky Business	118
ISSUES AND MEN. WALKING THROUGH RACE PREJUDICE.
By Oswald Garrison Villard	119
CARTOON. WANTED—A SHOTGUN. By LOW	120
A FLIER IN SUGAR. By Leslie Ford	121
BILBO THE RABBLE-ROUSER. By Raymond Gram Swing	123
IF THE COURT TURNS THUMBS DOWN. By Henry Hazlitt	126
PARTY REGULARITY IN 1936? By R. G. S.	127
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	128
CORRESPONDENCE	129
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	130
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
The Newspapers and Child Labor. By Dorothy Dunbar Bromley	131
BOOKS AND FILMS:
All Too Historical. By Mark Van Doren	133
Man's Fate on the Pampas. By Anita Brenner	133
Stories by Pirandello. By Arthur Livingston	134
A Poet Turns Novelist. By Clara Gruening Stillman	134
A Psychogenic Goodness. By R. P. Blackmur	135
Case History. By Eda Lou Walton	136
Pass the Salt. By Mary McCarthy	137
Shorter Notices	138
Films: Blood and Glory. By William Troy	139

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 30 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher.
Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

THE SUPREME COURT of the United States, in a striking decision, has at last pushed open for Tom Mooney the door that was slammed shut upon him eighteen years ago with all the force that perjury and collusion could muster in the hysterical, red-baiting state of California. The case has been sent back to the California Supreme Court, to be sure, but it is made clear that if Mooney cannot get relief there he may appeal to Washington with a fair certainty of a complete review; and the court administered a severe rebuke to California for its preposterous contention that its courts do not have the power to reopen cases in which intrinsic fraud is alleged:

Without attempting at this time to deal with the question at length, we deem it sufficient for the present to say that we are unable to approve this narrow view. . . .

The court then goes on in effect to instruct the Supreme Court of California as to its duties under the Constitution:

No decision of the Supreme Court of California has been brought to our attention holding that the state court is without power to issue this historic remedial process when it appears that one is deprived of his liberty without due process of law in violation of the Constitution. . . . Upon the state courts, equally with the courts of the Union, rests the obligation to guard and enforce every right secured by that Constitution.

These are stirring words. It is difficult to see how the Supreme Court of California can resist their logic or their appeal to reason. Meanwhile the Governor of California could well afford to order the immediate and unconditional release of Tom Mooney. It would save the expense of another hearing, and it would do more than any other single gesture to rehabilitate California's reputation for justice.

THAT MOST USEFUL SENATOR, Edward P. Costigan, of Colorado, has again introduced an anti-lynching bill in the Senate in conjunction with Senator Wagner of New York, who cooperated with him on a similar bill which was favorably reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee at the last session of Congress. Though there has been a decrease in the number of lynchings, the necessity for this measure is greater than ever because of the failure of the Department of Justice to move in the case of Claude Neal, who was lynched on October 26 last at Marianna, Florida. The circumstances of this crime were revolting beyond words. The lynching was planned and advertised in advance and was accompanied by every form of torture and mutilation that a brutal and sadistic mob could invent, including the searing of the man from head to toe with red-hot irons. When he was finally killed—after hours of torture—his remains were hung up and viewed by a crowd variously estimated at between 3,000 and 7,000 people. Now it happened that this Negro was seized in Georgia and carried into Florida, but the Attorney General of the United States has not acted—for reasons which doubtless seem sufficient to him. It is clear that we need a law which will compel the government of the United States to move in every lynching case; if it did so with the enthusiasm with which it is going after gangsters and bank robbers, it would speedily reduce lynchings to a minimum. Such fiendish atrocities as those at Marianna do the good name of the country vastly more harm than a Dillinger or a Floyd.

ALL FRIENDS OF PEACE will rejoice that the munitions investigation is to continue. The first $50,000 needed for this year's work was voted without difficulty and Senator Nye did not press for the second $50,000 on being assured that he would get it when needed. Investigation will go into shipbuilding, steel, chemicals, and banking, with promise that the revelations will continue to indict the profiteers and illumine the dire need for nationalizing the munitions industry. The success of the committee in maintaining public interest despite the vast volume of material unearthed redounds to the credit of Stephen Raushenbush, chief investigator. He has been a thorn to the manufacturers, and at one time was to be attacked by the underhand method of a pamphlet on his matrimonial affairs. The pamphlet actually was written but was never circulated, probably because news about it was published in good time, which drove leading manufacturers to be quick in denying they had any part in it. His work of investigation has been done with so much modesty that it is well to point out that the committee has relied on him for a considerable measure of its own success, a statement which does not in any way minimize our admiration for the signal ability with which Senators Nye, Clark, and Bone, in particular, have used the material and conducted the inquiry.

SENATOR NYE and his colleagues now find themselves in something of a dilemma. They are being pressed to bring in an early report with precise recommendations. This is by their friends, who want them to cash in on the present public interest, which experience suggests cannot be kept too long at high pitch. It is also by those who are interested in defeating the main purpose of the investigation, who know that hasty action is likely to be superficial. We hope the committee, even if public interest is not kept at fever heat, will not do anything to jeopardize its fundamental program, which in our opinion should have two parts. One should lead to a drastic revision of our defense policy, now conceived in terms of raising and equipping an army of 4,000,000 for service overseas as in the World War. The other should be the nationalization of the munitions industry. Not until we have a really defensive defense policy, with army and navy only large enough to protect our territory, will a nationalized munitions industry be practicable. But until the industry is nationalized it may not be possible to revise the defense policy, since our munitions profiteers are not going to let the country decide defense matters on their merits if they can avoid it. The first step may have to be nationalization as a means of reaching the second.

HIROTA'S annual speech before the Diet affords slight comfort to those who had hoped for the emergence of a more liberal policy in Japan. While in tone it is friendly enough to foreign nations, it is nevertheless firm in its reiteration of Japan's "special position" in Eastern Asia. Particularly disquieting are Hirota's reference to the "growing trend among the Chinese people to appreciate the true motives of Japan" and his expressed hope that they will "undertake to meet the genuine aspirations of our country." These words carry especial significance in view of the fact that Nanking has apparently just acquiesced in the surrender of another slice of Chinese territory. Although the section of Chahar which the Japanese are seeking to annex to Manchoukuo is of no great economic importance, it would be of high strategic value in the event of a war with the Soviet Union, as it would furnish a base for a flanking movement against the Trans-Siberian Railway. It is significant, moreover, that Hirota follows his remarks regarding difficulties with the Soviet Union with a reference to Chiang Kai-shek's campaign against the Communists, in which he laments the fact that the Chinese Soviets appear to be consolidating their position in Kweichow and Szechuan. Taken as a whole the speech is neither provocative nor particularly alarming, but it serves as a warning that Japan is unlikely to be swerved from its fundamental objectives.

EVENTS RATHER THAN DESIRES have forced Prime Minister Bennett of Canada to agree to negotiate a reciprocity treaty with the United States at the same time that the British are preparing a festive effort to consolidate the empire. This is the jubilee year of King George's accession, and the upwelling of loyal sentiment throughout the dominions, London hoped, would make it easy to widen and strengthen the economic ties of the Ottawa agreement. That agreement, it will be recalled, brought Canada somewhat out of the American constellation and drew her more into the British economic field. It was effected largely at the cost of trade with the United States. American exports to Canada have dropped two-thirds since 1929, and imports are down nearly three-fifths. Mr. Bennett's Opposition has been working up strong feelings in favor of its traditional policy of reciprocity with us, and now he must try to steal as much of the liberal program to avert if possible his own defeat next year. So within the Anglo-Saxon clan comes a curious strain—the British trying to draw Canada into their branch of the family while we are trying to lure it into ours. The outcome may not be clean cut, but it might mean the end of the narrow conception of imperial free trade, hence of a self-contained empire.

THE PRACTICABILITY of international planning is illustrated once again by the shipping agreement just concluded at London. A tentative scheme has been drawn up, subject to approval by the various governments, whereby all ships in commission would contribute to an international fund for the retirement or compensation of serviceable vessels for which there is no employment. While the fact that any agreement could be reached in an enterprise so strongly affected by nationalist feeling is encouraging, the shortcomings of the proposal should serve as a warning to those who look upon planning as a panacea for all present-day economic difficulties. Largely because of American opposition, nothing is to be done to restrict the prevailing system of subsidies. What we have in effect, then, is a scheme by which American taxpayers not only subsidize their own uneconomic vessels, but pay foreign ships to stay off the seas. Of course some American ships will also doubtless be retired, but that merely means that the taxpayer pays both ways—first to construct a vessel that never should have been built, and then to retire the ship to make way for another. This may be flattering to our national ego, but it is bad politics and worse economics.

A NEW pure-food-and-drug bill substantially weaker than the original Tugwell measure has just been introduced by Senator Copeland. This time Senator Copeland has been so zealous in the protection of the manufacturer that his bill omits the existing legal requirements—in effect since 1907—that labels of drugs shall disclose the presence of alcohol, chloroform, or the dangerous sedative acetanilid, to say nothing of the newer coal-tar sedatives and the cumulative poisons like arsenic, mercury, and strychnine. Another conspicuous weakness of the bill is its failure to require complete formulary disclosure on labels, to provide for licensing medicine manufacturers, or to ban outright the sale of drugs for those diseases in which self-medication is dangerous. The proposed measure follows closely the second Copeland bill introduced last year. It makes illegal the adulteration and misbranding of food, drugs, and cosmetics, prohibits false or misleading advertising, and provides for two important committees to prescribe regulations for the act. The Committee on Public Health, to be composed of five disinterested experts appointed by the President, is empowered to designate dangerous adulterants or narcotics and to impose safe tolerances for their use, to require precaution on labels against unsafe dosage or use by children, to regulate the licensing of food manufacturers or packers whose product may be contaminated by bacteria, and to designate diseases for which drugs may not be advertised as having therapeutic claims. A Committee on Food Standards, with the food industry given minority representation, is similarly empowered to fix standards of identity and quality for food. The bill, of course, represents a tremendous improvement over existing legislation, but it is not much stronger than the one introduced last year by Senator McCarran at the request of the food and drug industries. We see no reason why the consumer should be entitled only to that protection which trade interests are willing to give.

IF WE WERE MARXISTS, we should be inclined to say that by taking the President's security measure out of the hands of the House Labor Committee, where it normally belongs, and referring it to the Ways and Means Committee, Administration leaders have revealed the class character of that measure. Headed by Representative Connerly, of Massachusetts, A. F. of L. spokesman, the Labor Committee is alleged, whether justifiably or not, to have a somewhat pro-labor bias, a charge that has never been leveled against the Ways and Means Committee. Not being Marxists, we shall merely call the action of the Administration machine a despicable maneuver, praise the members of the Labor Committee for their courage in filing a unanimous protest, and trust that they will go through with their announced intention of holding hearings on the Lundeen bill. It is interesting to note in passing that this was another of those items which the New York Times does not consider "fit to print."

WALTER LIPPMANN, whose ability to carry water on both shoulders has been phenomenal, seems to be getting tired. In his speech before the National Association of Book Publishers he took his stand resolutely on the right. Publishers, said Mr. Lippmann, should not accept codes, because codes constitute a threat to the freedom of the press. Not even Elisha Hanson has suggested that building regulations might be used to interfere with the freedom of the press. But Mr. Lippmann has the courage of his prose style and he hesitated not at all to draw a horrendous picture of a progressive publisher being forced out of business by a censor disguised as a building inspector, an architect, or a labor board trying to get higher wages for newspapermen. Incidentally he paid tribute to the principle of lower wages, which has lately come to be one of his minor theme songs. On January 19 he approved the President's proposals for unemployment insurance not because they were generous but because they were niggardly.

This American system [of unemployment insurance] is devised . . . to discourage rigid wage rates and to encourage reemployment. It discourages rigidity because the unemployed worker, after his insurance is exhausted, will be offered work that is distinctly less attractive than the work he might obtain elsewhere by accepting a private wage. It encourages reemployment, in part, because public works stimulate private business but chiefly because wages must come down when prices fall if men are to be employed.

A few days earlier, in a lyrical outburst in praise of what he called The New Deal of Today, Mr. Lippmann said:

Since the balancing of the budget is made dependent upon the revival of business, it becomes the duty of the government to reject policies which obstruct revival . . . This involves a refusal to raise the cost of production before profits are earned, and therefore a refusal to encourage monopolistic prices, monopolistic wages . . . It involves the abandonment of merely punitive and terroristic attacks on private business.

It was in this same article that Mr. Lippmann furnished final proof that even a man with a prose style cannot carry water on both shoulders indefinitely without getting all wet. Of the President's new program he said:

[It] has been applauded as radical by all but those who had hoped that the New Deal was seriously proposing to establish a planned socialist economy. It is radical . . . On the other hand, the new program has been applauded a conservative except by those who distrust all public enterprise and prefer to rely upon a struggle for survival. It is conservative . . .

The World Court

ADHERENCE to the World Court has never been a policy we could support with unqualified approval, though we prefer it to non-adherence without much hesitation. The objections to it are not, we admit, of a purely isolationist character. The court is an imperfect institution, with the shortcomings to be expected of a modest departure into a new international venture. Our adherence will not greatly strengthen the court at the outset, any more than our non-adherence has greatly weakened it. It will remain for a long time a judicial body which in minor matters will function as a court of law and on issues of major political importance will vote along political lines. What many Americans easily assume is that the World Court in international affairs is even more supreme than our own Supreme Court in interstate affairs. But this is far from being true. Our Supreme Court is an integral part of a federal system of government, built upon the limitation of state sovereignty. But there is no corresponding world state or federation, nor even the prospect of one. National sovereignty remains the uncontested principle in all international relations. Most of the American hesitation about adherence to the court has been due not to the objections advanced by those trying to draft reservations protecting our sovereignty, but to the fear of a system of world law in which we somehow lose control over our own affairs. The reservations laid down by the Senate protect us fully, but even with them many persons are timid of stepping out of isolation and cooperating in any way with far-away and suspect countries.

Europeans have been taken aback by our prolonged weighing of scruples. It appeared to Europe that we were holding back from a worthy and essential start on a new technique of international dealing, and giving quite inappropriate reasons for it. The real function of the court, beyond strengthening the fabric of international law, is to provide a way of settling a limited range of international disputes. Obviously the chief task of the present generation, the first in history to turn so passionately against war, is to find an effective alternative to it. Arbitration, conciliation, the outlawry of war, the League, the World Court, the Optional Clause, all are attempts to create machinery which nations will use to settle conflicts without impairing their sovereignty, and yet without resort to force. The efforts have been vitiated in large measure, because they ran parallel to the determination to punish Germany through the Treaty of Versailles, convert the League into an agency for enforcing that treaty, and through the League make certain that all future wars must be League wars, hence world wars. The years since 1919 have been rich in fruitful disappointments in these contradictory efforts. The League abjectly deflated itself as an agency to impose peace in the Manchurian crisis. The rise of Hitler bitterly rebuked Europe for trying to carry out punitive repression in a peace treaty. The first major issue before the World Court, following the Silesian plebiscite, brought a straight political vote by European judges against Germany, and showed how far sovereign states still remain from voluntarily accepting the application of abstract justice. But the years have not been all lost. Indeed, these setbacks have brought us much closer to realities, and have taught the first lesson of all—what not to expect. At the same time the peace machinery of the League has settled some minor but dangerous conflicts, and the World Court, though not put to another major test, has worked well in ruling on lesser differences. The habit of using the court has begun, and without the slow establishment of the habit, there can be no development of a genuine system of international justice.

Where Is Security, Mr. Roosevelt?

WHEN the President declared in his message to Congress last June that the primary objective of the Administration's policy was "the security of the men, women, and children of the nation," he was voicing the fundamental desire of millions of American citizens. Ten to twelve million unemployed with their families, three to four million indigent people, and a countless number of men and women dependent because of illness, child-bearing, or other circumstances were promised that the resources of this great country would be mobilized to banish forever from their lives the terror of insecurity and undeserved pauperism. On January 17 the Administration's specific program for carrying out this promise was laid before Congress. Even as it stands it represents a historic advance in the whole social outlook in this country. For this the President personally deserves credit, however much we are astonished that he did not support his own experts, who wanted to start with a national system of social insurance.

In essentials the unemployment-insurance plan provided in the new Wagner bill represents little, if any, advance over that in the old Wagner-Lewis bill. A federal tax is to be levied on payrolls, beginning with 1 per cent in 1936 and reaching 3 per cent in 1938, to encourage the states to adopt unemployment-insurance legislation. States must make all contributions compulsory, but are free to determine whether or not employees shall contribute and what shall be the length of the waiting period and the amount of benefits to be paid. No recommendation is made regarding the crucial question of whether the states should adopt the company-reserves scheme now in force in Wisconsin, or whether all reserves should be pooled as in the so-called Ohio Plan. No minimum benefit is established, but the Committee on Economic Security recommends half wages with a maximum of $15 a week for a period of from fifteen to twenty-five weeks.

Provision for the care of needy persons over sixty-five years of age is also to be left to the states, except that the federal government would appropriate not more than $50,000,000 to supplement state funds, an appropriation which may rise to $125,000,000 in succeeding years. As in the case of unemployment insurance, no minimum benefit is stipulated, but the maximum is set at $30 a month for persons who can qualify under a means test. Individual states can, if they so desire, increase this maximum, but the chances are that many will fall short of even this level. In addition, the plan calls for a compulsory old-age-insurance scheme, to be financed by a tax on both employers and employees, which will not begin payments until 1942. This is to be supplemented by a voluntary system of old-age annuities to be sold by the government to low-income groups not included in the compulsory plan. The bill also provides for small appropriations for mothers' assistance, maternal and child welfare, and public health—the total cost to be no greater than $48,000,000 a year.

From this brief summary it is evident that the defects in the President's program are not matters of detail but of fundamental principle. To refer to the Wagner bill as a plan for social security when it makes no provision for the millions now unemployed is, to our mind, presumptuous. To be sure, the Administration is planning to enroll 3,500,000 men in a gigantic government-works scheme which is to be launched soon. But even allowing for indirect employment under this project, there will remain at least four million adults for whom no national provision is being made. Moreover, to establish forty-eight different systems of unemployment insurance is a violation of all sound actuarial principles. If unemployment is to be conceived of as an insurable hazard—as the President's plan assumes it to be—it is desirable to spread the risk as widely as possible rather than to confine operation of the scheme within plant or state boundaries. In lieu of rigid federal standards, we can be certain, furthermore, that many of the states will adopt legislation even less adequate than that suggested by the President's committee. Some day, perhaps, we shall learn why the Administration, against the recommendation of many of its technical advisers, sidetracked the proposal for a national insurance scheme, based on the established principle of grant-in-aid, for the cumbersome federal-state plan.

Finally there is the crass assumption that half pay or less for from fifteen to twenty-five weeks—providing the reserves have not previously been exhausted—can afford any genuine protection against the hazard of unemployment. In a survey made in Buffalo in November, 1933, it was found that 71 per cent of the unemployed had been without work for more than forty weeks and 60 per cent had been jobless for over a year. The old-age pensions are likewise so niggardly as to be of little value. If each dollar of the $50,000,000 to be appropriated by the federal government is matched by similar contributions from the states, a total of $100,000,000 will be available for distribution among 6,500,000 persons, at least two-thirds of whom are without means of self-support. In later years this fund is expected to rise to $250,000,000—but even that amount will provide less than $100 a year apiece for the needy aged.

While the editors of The Nation are conscious of the necessity of immediate action in the field of social insurance, they believe that it would be a mistake to commit the country to a long-time program as cumbersome as the present one. On this we agree fully with the experts of the Committee on Economic Security, who maintain that any national scheme, no matter how inadequate, would be preferable to the Wagner-Lewis formula, since it would more easily lend itself to amendment and liberalization. We would go farther and question whether genuine protection against the hazard of unemployment can be placed on an actuarial basis. In those countries where actuarial schemes have been tried, experience has shown that they either have to be abandoned or transformed into direct relief measures when a crisis becomes really severe. The actuarial approach conceives of wealth as being stored up to meet future contingencies. This is economically unsound. The goods and services which we consume must obviously be derived from current production. Thus protection against the hazards of modern life must be based on a redistribution of existing resources rather than on an accumulation for future catastrophes.

The Workers' Unemployment and Social Insurance bill, introduced into Congress by Representative Lundeen, dramatizes some of the fundamental principles of social security. It is loosely drafted and must be reworked before it is ready for legislative consideration, but it has served in its present form as a rallying-point for working-class support. With its basic principles we would differ at one point. The bill provides "compensation . . . equal to average local wages" to all workers and farmers unemployed through no fault of their own. A more satisfactory criterion would be that of an adequate living standard, irrespective of prevailing wages. Such a standard not only would be more equitable but would have the advantage of simplicity in operation, and should have a salutary effect on wages. In practice, it should necessitate benefits at least as large as the minimum of $10 per week, plus $3 for each dependent, specified in the bill, varying slightly with the locality.

In commending the Lundeen plan we realize that we are laying ourselves open to the charge that we are seeking to wreck the capitalist system. To this we would reply that we have no interest in preserving any system which cannot give security to the American people. But on the basis of careful computation, we find no justification for the charge that this bill would impose an intolerable burden on the national economy. The experience of this country between 1917 and 1919 shows rather conclusively that it is possible for the whole population to attain a relatively high standard of living if the resources of the country are utilized to the utmost. And we know of no means better calculated to stimulate the fullest use of these resources than a measure which would provide the underprivileged groups of the country with sufficient purchasing power to guarantee them a decent living. All of this is not to imply that security can be bought cheaply, but rather that true security would cost and be worth vastly more than any sum envisioned in Mr. Roosevelt's miserly program.

The Casa Is Fascist

ABOUT three months ago The Nation published an article charging—and giving evidence to prove the charge—that the Italian Department and the Casa Italiana at Columbia University were controlled by active fascists, that the Casa was a center of fascist propaganda in the United States, and that free discussion was prohibited within its walls. A letter of denial from President Butler was printed in The Nation on November 14. It was evasive and general and ignored most of our charges, but it contained a few positive statements. Dr. Butler could not claim that anti-fascist scholars or publicists had ever spoken at the Casa but he did assert that the famous historian, Guglielmo Ferrero, "was invited by the director of the Casa Italiana in person to speak at the Casa, but was compelled to decline to do so." A week later The Nation published a letter of similar reproof and denial from the officers of the Graduate Club in Italian Studies at Columbia, in which it was suggested that it might "be of interest to know that it is part of our program for this year to invite Professor Gaetano Salvemini to speak on some phase of contemporary Italian history (and this not as an after-thought). . . ." This was of interest, since Professor Salvemini of Harvard is certainly the most distinguished anti-fascist Italian scholar in the United States and had not even been mentioned in President Butler's careful defense.

The assertions by President Butler and the Graduate Club have until now constituted the only important objections to the general indictment brought by The Nation which have remained unanswered. In this issue they are answered. We call our readers' attention to the exchange of letters between Professor Salvemini and the Graduate Club in Italian Studies on page 129 of this issue, and the letter to The Nation from Dr. Ferrero on the next page. Their effect on the small remaining fragments of the defense is like that of a sharp pin on a soap bubble. Dr. Ferrero was never invited to lecture at the Casa Italiana and, therefore, was not "compelled to decline." The hopeful defense put up by the officers of the Graduate Club has similarly collapsed. Professor Prezzolini, put to the test, flatly refused to be a party to an invitation to Professor Salvemini to speak at the Casa. The students were evidently taken aback by this refusal. They had somehow cherished a belief that the Casa would welcome even an anti-fascist scholar of Dr. Salvemini's distinction. When the truth was forced upon them by Prezzolini, they acted with courage; they withdrew from the Casa and then, as an independent organization, renewed their invitation.

These letters do more than buttress The Nation's indictment of the Casa. They place the president of the university in an uncomfortable spot that was certainly not of his choosing. Dr. Butler is, or likes to think of himself as, a liberal. In his recent Annual Report to the Trustees, he earnestly reaffirmed his condemnation of fascism and his respect for Lehrfreiheit. But in the same report he praised "the vigorous scholarly activities of the Casa Italiana." How does President Butler manage glibly and with apparent sincerity to reconcile his opposition to fascism with the existence of out-and-out fascism under the roof of his own university? The answer is not as hard as it looks. Naturally Dr. Butler wants to believe that his Italian Department and its magnificent Casa are instruments of free scholarship. And naturally, when they are attacked, he turns to their chiefs for information and reassurance. The "facts" in his letter to The Nation were supplied to Dr. Butler by Professors Bigongiari and Prezzolini, heads, respectively, of the department and the Casa. They doubtless composed the best defense they could; it is unfortunate for Dr. Butler that it was so frail. But it apparently served his immediate needs, and he was able to go on believing in the academic integrity of an important segment of the university. The integrity he leans upon has turned out to be a weak reed. Sooner or later Dr. Butler is going to discover that the first loyalty of the men he relied upon is not to the university that houses them. Dino Bigongiari and Giuseppe Prezzolini are Italian citizens. Bigongiari is openly a member of the Fascist Party. Prezzolini has not acknowledged membership, but it is reliably reported. Both men owe duties to Mussolini that precede and override those to Columbia or its president. That these are not merely general or sentimental duties is indicated by the following regulation which appears in an official circular issued by the Italian Ministry of Education in August, 1934, for the instruction of Italian professors who lecture in foreign countries:

When, moreover, professors intend to go abroad to lecture or to take part in events or conventions of a cultural character, the Ministry must be informed, if possible, at least two months before the date fixed for departure, so that measures may be taken, in concert with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, for the guidance of our authorized diplomatic representatives concerning the proper propaganda to be carried on in the interest of our culture [italics ours].

What has happened, then, is obvious. The fascist professors at Columbia are obligated to the double duty of representing the Italian government and at the same time preserving a necessary appearance of impartial scholarship. But under examination and in the face of challenge their essential bias becomes clear.

Now that the facts are all known, what action will the Columbia authorities take? Will President Butler continue to hide behind the screen of official silence that has surrounded him since he dispatched his ill-fated letter to The Nation? And what will be the function of the Casa now that the only important student organization has withdrawn in protest against its policy? Can it justify its continued existence (not to mention a deficit amounting to one-fourth the deficit of the entire university) by serving as a lodging-house for visiting fascist officials and housing a few graduate courses? The Casa stands as a pretentious monument to the spirit of dictatorship which Dr. Butler so solemnly deploras.

There is only one honorable way out for the university. That is to make a clear break with fascist control; to let Professor Prezzolini and Professor Bigongiari go home and serve their party on their native soil, where the universities make no pretense of permitting free discussion or supporting disinterested learning; and then to appoint as head of the Italian Department at Columbia and as head of the Casa scholars who are not obliged to carry on "proper propaganda" in the interest of fascist "culture."

Sticky Business

BALLYHOO has been such a howling success in this country that it has all but broken down the power to recognize it, as well as any scruples against using it even to corrupt public opinion and private conscience. It finds its way into the most respectable newspapers and magazines, often over the names of our best-known molders of thought, reaching its highest point when these molders of thought do their molding at so much a word which they themselves do not write—for, aside from the willing press agent who can turn out copy to anybody's style, "ghosts" now advertise their shadowy services in the best papers. But Americans are still shocked when money passes hands; and even hard-boiled realists have a right to be stirred by the disclosure, based on conclusive proof which The Nation possesses, that the recent thrilling flight of Amelia Earhart was merely the most spectacular of several projects in ballyhoo designed and paid for by the Pan-Pacific Press Bureau to increase the profits of Hawaiian sugar planters.

We are more than willing to believe that Miss Earhart, whose passion for flying is perhaps matched only by her desire to demonstrate that women are the equals of men in the air or out of it, would rather fly the Pacific than have $10,000 if the choice were necessary. The fact remains that she was privately paid that amount, not to fly the Pacific but to fly the Pacific and then, against the shining background of that magnificent achievement, parrot a puny phrase to the effect that Hawaii was part of the United States. Such transactions are generally regarded as corrupt, even though her best friend—presumably her husband, who arranged the terms—neglected to tell her so. In this instance it appears that Miss Earhart, used to more rarefied air, was not the equal of the gentlemen with their feet on the ground who traded upon her interest in aviation to promote their private fliers in sugar, publicity, and plain cash.

This is not to imply, either, that Miss Earhart should not have had $10,000 for risking her life to cross an ocean for the first time. As a prize, $10,000 would have been little enough. As a secret payment for propaganda services rendered, it was $10,000 too much. "It helped my peace of mind to know that I was obligated to do nothing at all beyond the fulfilment of an ambition Mr. Putnam and I have long cherished—to visit the alluring southwest corner of the United States that is Hawaii." So read the tail end of Miss Earhart's own story in the New York Times of January 13. Since then she has received the congratulations of the nation's congratulators from the President down, she has been proposed for a Congressional medal, and her stock as "an example to the youth of America" has undoubtedly risen to a new high. It is this which really distresses us. The youth of America have been put upon quite enough already. They have seen one great example after another bite the dust in the past few years. Miss Earhart might have spared the y. o. A. the disillusionment of finding that the pot of gold at the end of her rainbow flight from Hawaii to California was badly tarnished. We suspect that our foremost woman flier has at least learned one of the facts of life; and that in future she will keep her wings free of sugar of whatever sort.

Issues and Men

Walking Through Race Prejudice

A SIMPLE news item in the New York dailies the other day gave me a real thrill. It read as follows: "Twenty-nine sergeants today were promoted to lieutenants by Police Commissioner Lewis J. Valentine. Among them was Samuel J. Battle, a Negro, the first of his race to rise above the rank of patrolman." It took my mind back a long time, to the days of the founding of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and the demand of some of us who were associated in that undertaking that Negroes be appointed to the police force of New York City. Of course we were looked upon as crazy people. It had never been done and it couldn't be done. You could not mix the two races. Had we forgotten that policemen sleep and at times eat in police stations, and that you could not expect white policemen to associate in that way with colored men? Policing the city was a white man's privilege, and while you might find a colored man who had the physical courage necessary for the job, you could not find one with the brains and the judgment necessary in some of the dangerous situations which arise in a policeman's life, and of course it was inconceivable that a colored man should have the right to give orders to white men. Vainly we pointed out that the men best fitted to deal with Negroes were men of their own race; that as Italian detectives were put on the force to deal with Italian criminals and Russians to deal with Russians, so colored police would not only understand colored people better, but actually get greater obedience and cooperation from them than would white.

Well, time passed. Negroes took the civil-service examination for patrolmen but were usually found ineligible or skipped on the list for promotion. Finally one man, Samuel J. Battle, came along who stood so high in his examinations that it was impossible to pass him over, and besides there was a police commissioner in office who was willing that the experiment should be tried. He was appointed and assigned to a station house—and went through hell. He did encounter race prejudice—lots of it. Had he been a colored cadet at West Point he could not have been tried more severely. Whether he was inspired by the fact that he was a pioneer for his race or not, he stuck it out and won the respect and regard of the men who had started out by yielding to senseless prejudice without stopping to reason about it. Today there are no less than 125 Negroes in the Police Department doing entirely satisfactory work. Battle was the first to be promoted to sergeant, but another Negro, Dr. Louis T. Wright, has been for years a police surgeon, having the rank now of inspector. The white policemen are very happy to have his services. He was the second Negro medical man to be elected to the College of Surgeons; at a dinner given to him in recognition of this the chief surgeon of the Police Department testified in highest terms to Dr. Wright's worth as a physician and a man. But, of course, it couldn't be done—before it was attempted. Oil and water wouldn't mix, and white men would never submit to close association with Negroes or to examination by a colored physician.

In the Fire Department of New York City the captain of Engine Company 55 is Wesley Williams. He, too, is a colored man—no doubt about that—and he is today commanding the very same company which he joined years ago as a lowest-grade fireman. He, too, was told that he could not last, that he wouldn't be allowed to sleep in the dormitory with the white men. He attended strictly to his business; he took with a smile the tricks played upon him in the hope of shaking his nerve and getting him to resign; he worked his way up steadily through every grade, serving always with this same company which he now commands. The white men under him who know his worth are happy to serve under him, and the Fire Commissioner went out of his way, when Wesley Williams was promoted, to call attention to the fact that he was the first colored man to reach this rank, and that he was considered one of the ablest officers in the department. It couldn't be done!

All this reminds me of the old Eastern fable of the traveler who came to a narrow defile and found his way blocked by an obstacle. He tried to surmount it and could not. He tried to go around either side and failed. He tried to go under it, but that was impossible. Finally, after much delay and doubt—he walked right through it and found that it wasn't an obstacle after all. So it is with many manifestations of race prejudice. Years ago in New York City the Cosmopolitan Club gave a dinner to which some of us were invited to discuss the lot of the Negro in New York. Of course some Negroes were asked. How could we discuss the Negro problem adequately without getting their point of view? A drunken Hearst reporter attended and the next day there were tremendous headlines. Leering, vicious-looking Negroes were portrayed by staff artists as sitting next to white women; and the whole undertaking was pictured as a move for miscegenation. The Associated Press sent the story all over the country, with the result that those of us whose names were mentioned, both men and women, received letters of abuse and obscenity from half the states in the Union, and the good old New York Times, true to its Southern ownership, solemnly warned us that we were countenancing something that must never be in America.

Well, a couple of years ago I attended a dinner here in a leading hotel in honor of a British lieutenant general, given by a group of entirely conservative persons interested in Southern education. Half the people in the room were Negroes and half whites, but this fact was never referred to in the accounts of the dinner. White people and colored people frequent the same night clubs and restaurants in Harlem, there is free and open association between literary men and women and artists of both races, yet the Republic still stands, the heavens have not fallen, and in its own opinion the Anglo-Saxon race is as sacredly virile as ever.

Bruce Garrison Villard

A Cartoon by LOW

WANTED A SHOT-GUN.

A Flier in Sugar

By LESLIE FORD

THE ways of the power trust with professors, "experts," and journalists have been so thoroughly exposed during the past few years that an article or interview extolling the benefits of private ownership in this field is no more convincing to the intelligent reader than is a Vanderbilt or Cabot testimonial for a face cream. The same may be said for the press agency of a dozen other national issues. Probably few people realize, however, that one of the bitterest and most amusing "public relations" campaigns of the past year has been that conducted by the Hawaiian sugar interests against the Jones-Costigan Act.

Other politico-industrial battles have had bigger and better lobbies, larger budgets, and more spectacular legal talent, but none has had more devious literary sidelights. Born in the brain of an advertising executive who two years ago "sold" himself to the various interlocking Hawaiian interests—sugar, pineapple, shipping, and tourist—as the Ivy Lee of the Pacific, it has been founded upon two assumptions: namely, that one page of display advertising should result in six pages of editorial matter (and no nonsense about "editorial integrity" either), and that any writer's name can be "had." The campaign itself has been conducted by the Pan-Pacific Press Bureau, ostensibly an unbiased news and feature service covering the Pacific area, but actually the publicity agency de luxe for the Hawaiian sugar and allied interests. The bureau is synonymous with Bowman, Deute, Cummings, Inc., the advertising agency handling the accounts of the Hawaiian Sugar Planters' Association, the Matson Lines, the Hawaii Tourist Bureau, and the Hawaiian Pineapple Company. Since the passage of the Jones-Costigan Sugar Control Act in May, 1934, its primary function has been the defeat of the Hawaiian sugar quota by attempting to convince the American public—and incidentally the United States Supreme Court—that Hawaii is "an integral part of the United States," and therefore entitled to quota parity with American continental producers. To the service of this program, Sidney S. Bowman, executive of both the advertising agency and the press bureau, has tried to harness the talents—or at least the names—of novelists, short-story writers, journalists, moving-picture stars, professional travelers, cartoonists, broadcasters, and a member of the Cabinet. (One of the bureau's recent releases is "Law Enforcement in Hawaii" by Homer S. Cummings.) The literary and journalistic profession—ranging from Irvin S. Cobb, Vicki Baum, and Anita Loos in the higher-income brackets to mere contributors to the liberal journals in the lower—has been most persistently wooed because, as every advertising man knows, a stable of established writers provides an excellent entrée to editorial columns. But even though novelists and journalists frequently supplement their incomes by writing publicity or advertising copy, many of them are reluctant to lend their names for obvious political-propaganda purposes. The Pan-Pacific Press Bureau has stubbed its toe on more than one angle of editorial sophistication and literary integrity. It has had, however, its distinct triumphs. The most spectacular of these was the recent Earhart flight from Hawaii to the mainland, for which its clients paid $10,000.

Though there may seem to be little relation between a trans-Pacific hop and a Supreme Court decision on the Hawaiian sugar quota, the Hawaiian sugar interests—through Mr. Bowman—did not pay out $10,000 "in the interests of science." A trans-oceanic flight, especially by our foremost woman aviator, is front-page news. From it flow publicity releases, personal interviews, signed stories, lectures, radio broadcasts—and in this case a possible moving picture featuring Miss Earhart and built around her flight, by her husband, George Palmer Putnam of Paramount. These are the legitimate by-products of long-distance flying, as they are of prize fighting or the winning of a Nobel prize. Through all such by-products of the Earhart flight there was to run a certain leit-motif—familiar by now in newspaper and magazine offices throughout the country as the theme song of the Hawaiian sugar planters in their fight against the AAA quota. Its dominant note is "Hawaii, an integral part of the United States," or the variant—"Hawaii, the southwest corner of the United States." The significance of these phrases will be discussed later. It was with the explicit understanding that this and allied "educational material" should be introduced into all the publicity flowing from the Hawaiian flight that Miss Earhart—through Mr. Putnam—received $5,000 before her departure for the islands, with the promise of $5,000 more before her take-off. In other words, the bureau cared not who flew the Pacific so long as it could write the theme song.

In spite of the facts that the "inspired" nature of the flight was revealed in Editor and Publisher of December 15 (in the course of an exposé of the Pan-Pacific Press Bureau's space-chiseling activities), and that the exact amount paid for it by the Planters' Association was revealed in the San Francisco News of January 4, Mr. Putnam has persisted, both before and since the flight, in denying its connection with any propaganda agency. Miss Earhart, who unquestionably is more interested in aviation than in sugar, has been merely hurt at the suggestion. But the facts are too well known to too many people to bear denial. And when Miss Earhart's "own story" of the flight, released through the North American Newspaper Alliance, appeared on the day after her landing, it bore, as was expected, the Pan-Pacific trademark—"the alluring southwest corner of the United States that is Hawaii." Because of the News scoop of January 4, the propaganda content of the flight publicity necessarily has been decreased.

During the eighteen hours spent by Miss Earhart in flying the Pacific from Honolulu to California probably the two most nervous persons in the world were George Palmer Putnam and the head of the Pan-Pacific Press Bureau. After the revelation that the flight was a publicity stunt, both the Honolulu Star-Bulletin and the San Francisco News, together with a number of navy aviators, had urged that it be abandoned, since Miss Earhart would be risking not only her own life but those of the fliers sent out to find her in case she was forced down. Had Miss Earhart been lost, the repercussion would have been unfortunate for Hawaiian sugar, Mr. Bowman, and Mr. Putnam, who made the arrangements. Luck was with them. The newspapers, knowing the truth, have been kind enough not to mention it in their stories of the flight.

Although Miss Earhart has been unquestionably the brightest feather in the Pan-Pacific Press cap, the always fertile field of Hollywood has not been neglected. College professors and experts have their uses, but for the glossy-papered monthlies there is nothing like a movie star. Here is an excerpt from a sample story prepared for the signature of Miss Claudette Colbert by a Pan-Pacific copywriter, an account of the star's adventures in a Hawaiian rain storm:

After such a flattering speech, I did feel better and, with a little thought, even grateful that with such showers a more bountiful crop of sugar was in the making—Hawaii's perennial gift to her sister states from this near-western part of the United States.

To the credit of Miss Colbert, it must be said that she objected to the sugar content of this opus.

In a story released to the movie-magazine circuit, Miss Betty Compson, through her ghost writer, tells one how to develop a glamorous personality. The secret, it would seem, is travel—and particularly travel to Hawaii. In the midst of all this glamor there is sounded a strictly statistical note, strangely out of place from such a pen:

Ninety per cent of Hawaii's trade is with the mainland. Good times in the Islands mean good trade on the mainland, for in trade as in politics, Hawaii is an integral part of the United States.

And in an intimate little item, scheduled for a golfing journal and called Footloose in Hawaii, Mr. Frank Condon, short-story writer for the Hearst magazines, is made to say:

The sports of the whole country seem to be condensed into this very integral part of the United States.

Mr. Condon also is said to have objected to the amount of sugar in the compositions created in his name by the harried copy-writer.

A travelogue entitled Hawaiian Medley, by Joseph C. Granger, appearing in Vanity Fair in its December, 1934, issue, manages by a miracle of editorial manipulation both to quote the President and to mention the sugar quota within the space of a dozen lines:

"Your Administration in Washington," said Mr. Roosevelt, addressing a multitude whose eyebrows had a tendency to slant upward, "will not forget that you are in very truth an integral part of the nation."

The Administration may not forget that the Islands are American (though someone did when the sugar quotas were being established last spring and Hawaii was permitted to send the United States less sugar than foreign Cuba or the Philippines), but anyone going for pure pleasure to Hawaii . . . is strongly advised to do so.

If you happen to live in those less urban districts where editors are partially dependent upon boiler-plate, you may have opened your paper on the morning of your state's last birthday to find a full-page illustrated spread celebrating the event. A hundred to one it contained the following non-sequitur:

Eleven years after Washington [in this case] became a full-fledged state, Hawaii, then a republic, came into the Union on a territorial basis. . . . Hawaii is the sugar bowl of the country. . . . For that reason Washington citizens will watch closely the progress of the Hawaii sugar planters' suit contesting the sugar quota imposed by the Jones-Costigan Act. The people of Hawaii claim that it shows discrimination against Hawaii in favor of a foreign nation, failing to take cognizance of the fact that Hawaii is an integral part of the United States.

These "state birthday stories" featuring Hawaii have appeared in newspapers throughout the country during the past year.

Just recently the editor of a metropolitan rotogravure section discovered as he went to press that the four smiling socialites sipping drinks on the lanai of the Royal Hawaiian Hotel were able to smile in spite of the fact that the Jones-Costigan Sugar Act discriminates against an integral part of the Union.

All of this would be merely funny and of no particular significance if the same theme were not enlarged upon in some serious monthly review by some academic authority whose disinterestedness the editor may have accepted at face value, and in the daily newspaper columns. This is not to say that there are not academic authorities and newspaper editors who fully agree with the arguments of the Hawaiian sugar interests. But every one of the items mentioned, with the possible exception of the quotation from Mr. Granger, was written not by the person who signed it but by a copy-writer in the Bowman agency. One former copy-writer was startled to find one of his routine publicity stories appearing verbatim in the financial column of the San Francisco Examiner. A recent confidential report of the Pan-Pacific Press Bureau to its financial backers coyly admits the inspiration of editorials in the Hearst newspapers attacking Secretary Wallace and Rexford Tugwell (the red flag of internationalism was waved in this case), describes the "cultivation" of a Washington columnist who "will work our material into his syndicated column as conditions permit" and its efforts to influence the editorial policy of an important monthly magazine, and discusses the manipulation or attempted manipulation of editors, authors, columnists, broadcasters, and political reporters.

If all this seems a little far-fetched in relation to the AAA, it may be well to review briefly some of our recent sugar history. The three-cornered battle of the sugar barons—continental beet sugar, American insular, and the Cuban cane producers—has been waged with particular intensity since 1929, with Cuba steadily losing ground before the rapid increase in domestic production and a diminishing consumption. It has been waged with every type of propaganda and lobbying device. The Philippines owe their independence to the beet-sugar pressure, and the agitation for the reduction of the Cuban sugar duty was inspired less by the desperate plight of the Cuban workers than by the fate of \$600,000,000 worth of American investments in the island. Early in 1934, with the sugar caldron boiling over in Washington, the Roosevelt Administration attempted to solve the problem on the basis of a "planned" domestic program and a cut in the Cuban tariff. The Jones-Costigan Sugar Control Act was passed in May after a titanic battle for quota advantages on all sides. It made sugar a basic commodity under the AAA, fixed definite quotas for the continental producers, and authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to allot quotas to the insular producers, including Hawaii. A processing tax was imposed on refined sugar, and the Cuban tariff was cut $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent.

The continental growers were satisfied, Cuba was mollified, the colonial possessions protested weakly, and Hawaii rent the heavens with cries of discrimination. As "an integral part of the United States" it claimed parity with continental producers. In July the Hawaiian Sugar Planters' Association sought an injunction against the quota. Denied the injunction in October, it took an appeal to the United States Supreme Court. In the meantime the campaign to convince the American people that Hawaii has been discriminated against has been waged from every possible publicity angle. Privately it was whispered to Republican newspapers that Hawaii was being "punished" for its traditional Republicanism. To the Hearst newspapers the quota was portrayed as an evidence of the Administration's "internationalist" attitude toward Cuba.

It is not the purpose of this article to go into the merits of the quota, Hawaii's legal status, or the economic soundness of a crop-reduction program. The Hawaiian publicity campaign has not concerned itself in the least with this last issue or with the treatment of other insular producers. There are certain things to be said in behalf of Hawaii's feudal aristocracy—primarily, that its plantation wages and living conditions, poor as they may be, are infinitely superior to those of other insular producers and excel those of many of our agricultural states. But this argument is evidently considered by the Planters' Association and its press bureau a dangerous one with a strictly proletarian appeal. Instead, the propaganda battle has been conducted on a high moral, patriotic, and constitutional note, ridiculously out of keeping with its methods. Those methods have been no more high-handed perhaps than the ones employed by the New York-financed Cuban interests or the Midwest beet-sugar people before the passage of the Jones-Costigan Act. The Cuban interests were the best-financed and undoubtedly paid the highest retainers. The beet-sugar people had the advantage of a large Congressional bloc. The Hawaiian campaign is backed by an impressive array of advertising power and unquestionably has the most sex appeal.

The use of literary "names" as first aid to editorial cooperation was probably suggested to the Bowman agency by its spectacular coup in the Saturday Evening Post more than two years ago. The occasion was the launching of the great new Matson liner. Under the signature of Peter B. Kyne there appeared at this particular moment a six-page "romance" of the building and launching of the new Pacific greyhound, a saga of the Matson family, and a fulsome testimonial to every firm, including the purveyors of the silverware, involved in the building or furnishing of the Matson boat. The article was profusely illustrated and was probably the most obvious and brazen piece of advertising ever to appear in an American periodical without the little word "advertisement." The Post was induced to leave that word out, and as a result is said to have got involved with the Post Office Department. It is the office joke at the Bowman agency that Mr. Kyne never saw the article until it appeared in print.

Bilbo the Rabble-Rouser

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

THEODORE GILMORE BILBO, twice Governor of Mississippi, was clipping newspapers at $6,000 a year for the AAA in Washington last summer; at least that was his function, though the piles of uncut newspapers mounted higher and higher in his tiny office and he spent much of his time chatting with stogie-smoking cronies who visited him there. One day he sent his stenographer to ask the guard on duty outside the Department of Agriculture building to arrange a permanent space for parking his car. Parking is the prime problem of the capital, and naturally the guard said it couldn't be done. Bilbo sent the stenographer back with the word that "Governor" Bilbo asked for it. The guard still refused. The newspaper cutter grew testy and drove the stenographer down a third time. The guard, looking at the crowded curb, threw up his hands and exclaimed, "I couldn't without arranging it with Einstein himself!"—a remark which the stenographer duly reported to her chief. "All right," shouted the former Governor, "go down and tell that guard to telephone Einstein, and get it arranged!"

Bilbo, former newspaper clipper, now occupies a commodious suite in the Senate Office Building and admits to looking forward to at least eighteen years in the Senate. No political down-and-out ever experienced a more dazzling change in fortune. It smacks of the miraculous, even to those who know Mississippi. For if ever a politician was through in that state, after stepping out of the governorship, it was Bilbo in 1932. He had a few friends, but his last record in the Statehouse was phenomenally blank; a pig-headed legislature had blocked him in every effort to build a machine or foster constructive legislation. He was broke. He had to give up his heavily mortgaged pecan farm, worth $75,000, because he could not raise $500 to settle a claim against him. The job of newspaper clipper in Washington was a life-saver. It happens that it set him up politically, too, like a restorative. For it demonstrated to the wiseacres in Mississippi that Bilbo wasn't so dead after all. He still had "influence" with somebody, and that somebody was Senator Pat Harrison. Bilbo without Harrison was nothing, a pathetic relic. Bilbo with Harrison—well, he was the only man ever twice elected governor, and Harrison was the universally accepted elder "statesman" of Mississippi.

Bilbo wanted to succeed his old personal enemy Senator Hubert D. Stephens as Senator from Mississippi, and when he learned that Stephens as member of the Senate Commerce Committee was considering the approval of Dr. Willard Thorp as expert to the Department of Commerce, though Thorp, an Amherst man, once registered as a Republican, he had his cue. He returned to Mississippi, told the boys that Stephens was about to give a $9,000 job to a damn Yankee Republican, and began his extraordinary campaign for Stephens's job. He came in second to Stephens in the first primary and beat him in the run-off. He won because he is a rabble-rouser, second only in talent to Huey Long in the South. Even with the shadowy support of Pat Harrison behind him, his victory was miraculous. A real rabble-rouser is a wondrous creature.

Bilbo is a little fellow in his middle fifties; usually wears loud check suits (in Washington they are more subdued), a red tie, and a diamond horseshoe tie pin. He has a wide skull with far-apart pale-blue eyes, a pointed chin, and a lipless straight mouth which makes a grim, thin line across his face. But the line belies his nature, for in him lurks a rare devilment, which is one of the essential condiments of the true rabble-rouser, who must have a genius for instantaneous, crushing, and laughter-provoking sallies. A lay preacher of Baptist persuasion, Bilbo looks the part until the devilment in him is provoked. Then the eyes come to life, the grim mouth smiles boyishly, and out comes the devilment without reservation. The performance is part of his stock in trade, but it also can get him into hot water. During the last campaign for governor he called a certain local candidate a man "who was found newly born in a cemetery, suckling a sow," and the candidate followed him across the state and nearly brained him with a revolver butt in a railroad car. This experience cost him weeks in a hospital. But biting invective, the stronger the better, is essential to rabble-rousing, and the spontaneous gift of it is one of Bilbo's great attributes. He and Stephens crossed swords in 1931 in a famous exchange. Stephens had gone to the hospital and was expected to die. But the thought of Bilbo, who as governor would have the appointment of his successor, revived him, and he issued a statement accusing Bilbo of waiting like a ghoul for him to die. To this Bilbo replied in writing: "Hubert Stephens is a vicious, malicious, pusillanimous, cold-blooded, premeditated, plain, ordinary United States Senatorial liar." And of Huey Long, whom he dislikes still more than Stephens, he predicted in a speech on the border of Louisiana: "Within five or eight years he will end in one of three places, or all three: in an asylum, in the penitentiary, or in hell." The Senate is not likely soon to see a demonstration of this talent of Bilbo's, for he has adopted the self-denying discipline of not making a speech for a year. But let Huey Long once taunt him, the devilment in Bilbo will not be denied and he will show the Upper House how picturesque invective can be.

Invective, of course, is not the whole of rabble-rousing or even more than an essential detail. A greater part is rhetoric, flowing, sententious, high-flown, and the still greater part is theme. The rabble-rouser must know the prejudices of his rabble. In this knowledge Bilbo has attested his expertness. He has been elected state senator, lieutenant-governor, governor on two occasions, and now United States Senator. The expertness was specially demonstrated in last summer's Senatorial campaign, when Bilbo clearly had to cover the entire field of prejudices if he were to overcome the handicaps he faced. He must make a wholesale job of it, and he did. His platform ran to twenty-seven points. The chief four of them, essential to success in Mississippi, were social security, particularly unemployment insurance and old-age pensions, government control of the Federal Reserve System, payment of the bonus, and redistribution of wealth. That is the essence of radicalism in the South and fairly generally throughout the Middle West. Where election depends finally on mass response, this is the kind of special appeal that is needed. Bilbo went the whole way down that particular road. He also advocated shorter working hours and more than a living wage for labor, but he showed no really coherent scheme of society, nor, indeed, any knowledge of the social structure. He threw in a few bright ideas of his own; one of them, preparedness for war, was decorated with the proviso that every Congressman qualified for service should resign on declaration of war and be placed in the ranks of the first attacking forces. Another was the return to two-cent postage. The full details do not matter; so long as one recalls again that monetary expansion, government banking, payment of the bonus, redistribution of wealth, and social security are what plain people want their Senators to believe in. This holds for the red-necks and hill-billies and plain townsmen of Mississippi; it holds as well for their kinsfolk almost anywhere.

Such an appeal is not enough of itself to elect a man to the Senate, not even if the candidate also has the gift of invective. He needs the further attributes of tireless vocal chords and a lust for travel within the state. Stephens lost the election because, a crippled man whose foot had been amputated, he could not get out into the piney-woods country and meet the people, and partly because he did not take his opposition seriously. But the little fellow in the bookmaker's suit is a phenomenon. He delivered more than a thousand speeches during his campaign—all long-winded, full-length affairs. He spoke six or eight times a day, which means that he was orating on his feet for as long as the average clerk sat at his desk during the same months. At the end of the campaign he had been seen in nearly every hamlet in the state, had spoken in every county, and had been heard by almost everyone who might possibly be interested in politics. Almost frail in physique he gained ten pounds in weight during the ordeal. Rabble-rousing is a strenuous occupation which might kill a weakling, but apparently it also can be as health-giving as a vitamin diet.

Certainly purity of political behavior is not requisite to the success of the rabble-rouser. Though in the South allowances are quickly made, since politics after all is a game with accepted rules, Bilbo played it with sensational crudity, as for instance in the field of education. This makes a diverting chapter in the past of a Senator. Mississippians will boast to the visitor that the state has always been a pioneer in education, by which they mean that it opened the first state college for women in the country, started the first state agricultural high schools, and has consolidated its little red schoolhouses into larger units with a teacher for each grade. But when Bilbo was governor he removed in one day the heads of the University of Mississippi, the State College for Women, and the Mississippi Agricultural and Mechanical College, and lopped off 179 professors and teachers for political reasons. For president of the Agricultural and Mechanical College he chose the director of public relations of the Mississippi Power and Light Company. For chancellor of the State University he chose a real-estate salesman without a college degree. He named a new administrative board for the university which consisted of two dentists, one bank cashier, one physician, and three lawyers. Patronage is the basis of state power and Bilbo was having trouble with his legislature, not being able to get enough money spent to build up his machine. That is one reason he dipped into the schools and demoralized them. But at the same time he avowed a deep interest in education, sought to move the University of Mississippi from Oxford to Jackson, and wanted to spend vast sums on a new plant. The students burned him in effigy and that scheme fell through. Bilbo, however, insisted on a new plant and rebuilt the university at Oxford at a cost of $2,000,000.

The patronage problem did not loom so large during Bilbo's first term as governor, 1916-20. He initiated the school consolidation and built a school for the feeble-minded and a tuberculosis sanitarium. Looking backward, even his present enemies admit it was a fairly good showing. But the second term, which ended in 1931, was a stormy and fruitless time. It was one long wrangle over the new state insane asylum. It may strike the outsider as morbid that the chief state enterprise of recent years is this institution, probably the finest in America. It was begun under Bilbo's predecessor, and when Bilbo became governor he naturally wanted to cut in on the spending, so as to build up his machine. The legislature objected; Bilbo equally stubborn, would not issue the necessary bonds. The asylum was half built and was left, so to speak, in mid-air while Bilbo and the legislature blocked each other. The old asylum at Jackson had accommodation for 1,400 patients, but actually was housing 2,500; probably 200 were dying each year who might have lived in the new quarters. At last Bilbo compromised when a $10,000 architect of his choosing was appointed to the board, and construction could be continued. When completed, the institution will have cost $5,500,000, and the group of eighty buildings, with many bronze fixtures and marble baths, will be the pride of the South.

The legislature heartlessly obstructed Bilbo's whole program. He had promised during his campaign to build brick-paved roads throughout the state, the bricks to be made by convict labor; this was his parallel to Huey Long's road-building project in Louisiana. He wanted a state printing plant where all state schoolbooks would be printed for free distribution, a modification of a Long idea. He wanted a central state purchasing agent, a worthy project if politics did not enter into the matter. He had a scheme for reorganizing and consolidating the agricultural schools of the state. He proposed a central board of trustees for all state colleges, a state constabulary appointed by the governor and responsible to him, an \$82,000,000 bond issue to finance road buildings (after he had dropped the convict-labor scheme), and a $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent sales tax. He got none of it. But most of the platform was promptly passed by Bilbo's successor after the little Governor, impoverished and discredited, had retired to private life.

The state highway scheme with its huge bond issue led Bilbo into close fellowship with high finance, and he was near at one time to getting his money on an I.O.U., the bonds actually to be deposited in a bank outside the state. The eminent group which played with him was interested on a vast scale in road material, and one of the principals, Luke Lea, is now in prison. This project would have been a vast "gravy-dish," but the money was not borrowed after all, and when he retired the state was $11,500,000 in the hole and its credit was in jeopardy. His successor had to clap on a 2 per cent sales tax, a 20 per cent cigarette tax, and a 6 cent gasoline tax, and slash the overhead of all state institutions by 35 per cent, while complaints were made that some children in state institutions were going hungry to bed. One would think this would have made Mississippi an impossible place for Bilbo, who at least was partly to blame.

There were other demerits for him to overcome. Even in Mississippi it was not quite to his credit that he had launched his candidacy for governor from the yard of a prison from which he had just been released. This happened in 1923. He had gone to prison to avoid testifying in a seduction suit brought against his successor, Governor Russell, by a woman employee of the state. He was imprisoned for contempt, after having been found hiding in his barn on his Pearl River farm. Another judicial matter also not wholly reassuring was his impeachment for bribery in 1910. He had taken money for his vote in a Senatorial convention. There was plenty of evidence to show that he accepted the money to trap the bribers, for before taking it he discussed the trap with friends. But the evidence also showed that the bills with which the bribe was paid were not the bills he ultimately returned, and he escaped impeachment by only one vote. But nobody in Mississippi ever charges him with having grown rich from politics. Indeed, he is known as one of those unhappy mortals who live in a tangle of debts and he probably never owned a clear $10,000 in his life.

Senator Bilbo from a national point of view is not a menace, but he is a portent. What he has done to conquer difficulties in Mississippi he probably never will undertake elsewhere. If he were ten years younger, knowing the rabble throughout America to be not unlike the rabble of Mississippi, he might go out to rouse it. He is a portent in that the right kind of promise-maker, with strong enough lungs, persistent enough abuse of his enemies, and picturesque enough personality, can sway the masses if they are economically ready to be swayed. The point about Bilbo may be that Huey Long is a menace, since they are so much alike, for Huey is fifteen years younger, possesses lungs and the talent of vituperation, and can make promises as fast as they can be listened to. But happily Bilbo stands somewhat in Huey's way. Psychologists will understand why they detest each other—Huey calls him "just a plain damn fool"—and Bilbo's election is a setback for Huey's plan to conquer the South, defeat Pat Harrison and Joe Robinson, and invade the North after gobbling up Georgia and Tennessee on the way. Huey has countless members of his "Share Our Wealth" movement in Mississippi, but when the issue has to be fought out for supremacy there, Bilbo can raise the rabble as well as he can. So for the present Huey is leaving Bilbo strictly alone, and Bilbo, heavily laden with the dignity of being a United States Senator, is saying nothing whatever. It would hurt Huey's plans to let his "message" to the American people fritter away in a factional feud with Bilbo. But Long has an impetuous tongue and it may escape his control one day at the sight of his little rival, and then the world will be regaled with the finest tom-cat fight ever seen in the Capitol. One may pray it will happen, not for the sheer bizarre amusement or it, but because it would do something, at least, to hamper Huey. This suggests the interesting conclusion that if there must be rabble-rousing, it is better to have two masters in the field than one.

If the Court Turns Thumbs Down

By HENRY HAZLITT

IN two articles in The Nation of March 30 and April 6, 1932, the present writer maintained that the devaluation of the dollar, on net balance, would be far preferable to the continued policy of deflation that otherwise seemed inevitable. The proposal at that time was nowhere being seriously discussed; and in the atmosphere of the Hoover Administration, when so few things seemed possible, the scheme appeared even to myself remote and academic. I remarked apologetically that for its practical realization we should have to assume a few political "miracles." One of these had to do with convincing the President and Congress of the necessity of the step and of the quick method by which it had to be taken. I continued:

In an American devaluation program we have to assume one more miracle. When devaluation was carried out in France and Germany, bonds were payable in terms of currency, and were automatically scaled down with everything else. But since the scare of 1896 nearly all bonds in the United States have been payable in terms of gold. If you take almost any American bond, public or private, you will find that it is payable "in gold coin of the United States of America, of or equal to the standard of weight and fineness as it existed on"—the date of issuance of the bond. Here is a "sacred" contract, a private contract. Would the courts—would, specifically and finally, the members of the Supreme Court—permit Congress to declare that such a contract could be put aside—that the bond could be paid in currency and not in gold? If every judge thought of economic consequences as Justice Brandeis does, it is imaginable that such gold contracts, after devaluation, might be declared null and void because their fulfilment would be contrary to public policy. It is imaginable that the Supreme Court would hold that just as an individual corporation in bankruptcy must have its debts scaled down, regardless of its previous contracts, so must a nation when it would otherwise face general bankruptcy. It is imaginable, but not probable. For it is in general the pride of the legal mind that it decides on precedent and "principle," and maintains an Olympian unconcern regarding the mere social consequences of its decisions. Only five justices would need to be legalistic to assure that one of the most important parts of the program of devaluation would be defeated.

One is disposed, now that the case is actually before the court, to be more sympathetic toward its dilemma. Judges have always protested that they are not legislators; that it is their function, as judges, to decide not on the economic consequences of sanctioning or upsetting a law, but merely on the interpretation or constitutionality of the law. There have been innumerable guesses as to what the Supreme Court will actually decide in the present case. These guesses need not here be rehearsed, but one thing may be said with some confidence. There can be little doubt that most of the judges, as economic men, want to support the government, would like to see the gold contracts abrogated. They know as well as anybody the crushing and appalling burden it would put on private debtors and on the government to have their gold debts—estimated at some $100,000,000,000—suddenly increased by 70 per cent. They know what this would mean for the government's credit, for future taxation, and in terms of wholesale bankruptcies. They know that under present conditions it would merely throw huge unearned windfall profits into the laps of creditors, who would chiefly turn out to be a new crop of speculators and gamblers.

But how can they decide against the gold clause, and save their faces, as judges? The gold clause is too explicit to be interpreted away. It does not just say "dollars." It does not say legal tender. It does not say gold coin of the current weight, or of the weight that Congress in its infinite wisdom has most recently fixed. It says gold coin of the precise weight and fineness that existed on the day that the contract was made. And the judges know, and the government knows, that this clause was inserted by borrowers solely for the purpose of assuring lenders against precisely the sort of change that Congress has made; otherwise there would have been no point in inserting it at all.

The dominant opinion, at the moment of writing, is that the court will somehow find a way, not too humiliating, too inconsistent with its usual ways of reasoning, or too dangerous as a precedent, to hold that the gold clause can be abrogated. But even if there is one chance in ten of the court's deciding the other way, there is too much at stake for Congress not to have some measure immediately in hand for counteracting the potential damage. In my article of April 6, 1932, I suggested that one possible measure would be a special tax:

If the devaluation amounted to 33⅓ per cent, for example, the federal government could place a tax of 33⅓ per cent on all receipts—whether of interest or principal—representing the fulfilment of gold contracts made before the date of devaluation. Such a tax would be no more "discriminatory" than the excise tax on tobacco; it would take away nothing but windfall profits. And though it would not help to relieve the burden on those saddled with gold debts, it would at least secure social justice by preventing gold creditors from profiteering. It would, incidentally—for such a tax could be deducted at the source—bring in very heavy federal revenues.

Proposals similar to this have now been brought forward. Representative Dies is reported to have prepared a bill providing for a tax equal to 40 per cent of the principal and interest on private obligations payable in gold.

I now recognize, however, that this plan would not be adequate. What is necessary is that private debtors be relieved of the burden of having to pay the gold debts, or of the fear of that burden. This can be achieved very simply. It would merely be necessary to make the special tax on gold payments greater than the percentage of devaluation. For our present 41 per cent of devaluation, for example, we could place a tax on gold payments of 50 per cent. The result would be that only an occasional crank, bent on cutting off his own nose for the sake of injuring a corporation, would demand gold payment. If he did not demand it, he would receive $100 new dollars for every $100 of old debt. If he did demand it, $169 new dollars would be set aside for him for $100 of old debt; but under the 50 per cent tax $84.50 would be deducted and only $84.50 forwarded.

It may be said that if the Supreme Court throws out the gold-clause repudiation it would throw out this too, under the "due process" clause or on the ground that it was an obvious dodge. But this is to assume that the Supreme Court would be on the warpath rather than, as I prefer to believe, hopefully on the lookout for some reconciling formula. The Supreme Court has supported obvious dodges before. A significant case is that of the federal tax of 10 per cent placed on the notes of state banks. This was decided in 1869. "That the tax was so excessive as to in-dicade a purpose on the part of Congress to destroy the franchise of the state bank [Chief Justice Chase] held was a matter which the court could not consider. "The power to tax may be exercised oppressively upon persons, but the responsibility of the legislature is not to the court but to the people, by whom its members are elected." (Charles Warren: "The Supreme Court in U. S. History"; Vol. II, p. 508.)

It seems possible not only for Congress to have such a measure ready, but to adopt it immediately and allay the present uneasiness. Even if it is itself eventually rejected by the court, which does not seem likely, precious time will have been gained for a more permanent solution.

Party Regularity in 1936?

Washington, January 21

THE election of Senator Cutting of New Mexico is to be challenged after all. Notice of contest was filed with the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections by Cutting's opponent, Dennis Chavez. It was quite the most upsetting political development of last week, for it throws into doubt the President's entire informal alliance with the Progressives. Some of them, at least, believe the President himself has thrown down the gauge and could have prevented the contest if he had so willed. The basis of the contest is not yet known, as particulars had not been filed at this writing. Time must elapse before the issue can be decided, since an investigation will have to be held in New Mexico. The contest came as a surprise, for it had been understood that the Democratic leaders in the Senate did not wish to unseat Cutting. Thus the decision for a fight was not made in the Senate, which means that Farley had a hand in it. And Farley could not have acted without authorization from the President.

Now a great deal can be read into this situation. It might even mean that the President has decided to run in 1936 without the help of Progressive leaders. It might mean that the pressure from Democrats in New Mexico and throughout the Southwest was so strong that Farley and the President felt they must heed it. Or it might simply be a personal punishment of Senator Cutting as a man whom the President has grown to dislike. The first of these readings is the hardest to believe, for the President will not be strong enough in 1936 to win without Progressive votes, even if he might think he could dispense with alliances with Progressive leaders. But there would be a certain allure-ment in the idea of making the victory of 1936 a purely Democratic triumph, with no debts owing outside the party. The present Administration is an informal coalition, with Ickes as the symbol of it in the Cabinet, and with many non-partisan appointees in the huge army of New Dealers brought into Washington. Purely party consideration would insist on the coalition ending as soon as it could be managed, so as to give all the jobs to worthy Democrats. But however alluring, the idea does not now appear sound. It is one thing for the President to decapitate Cutting, but it would be incredible to see him break with Norris or La Follette. He needs Norris's loyal support in his power policy, and he will need La Follette more and more as the outstanding radical in the agricultural Northwest. But the break with Cutting is not easy to justify. Two years ago the President was trying to give him the Interior portfolio, as weighty an assignment as he had to offer. Beyond the fact that Cutting voted for the bonus, there is nothing in his Washington record to explain the change in the President's attitude.

If it were true that the President is now steering into strictly partisan waters, Secretary Ickes would have to ask himself about his own future. It may be far-fetched to dwell for a moment on the troubles he is now enduring, and to speculate whether they have anything to do with his being the one coalitionist in the Cabinet—cynics call him the last liberal. One of his petty annoyances is the torpedo fired at him about the activities of his two subordinates, Burlew and Glavis. This was fired from the White House. It did not explode, but it churned up an ominous channel. The President was able to say he had nothing to do with it. So was Mrs. Roosevelt. The charge against Burlew was that as "bottle-neck" man in the Interior Department he was wielding an insidious influence against certain New Deal enterprises. Whoever else may be convinced that this is so, Secretary Ickes is wholly satisfied with his subordinate and considers him the ablest individual in the department. The charge against Glavis is that in investigating certain Interior matters he overheard a telephone conversation with someone of the White House secretariat. But Ickes is content to have Glavis go on investigating affairs of the Interior Department, the chips to fall where they may, since the Secretary is solemnly, even tediously, determined to have everything in his vast domain strictly honest. A further difficulty for the Secretary is the Moses matter. Now this is an instance where he is not acting on his own behalf—he hardly knows Moses—but is gallantly accepting the brickbats as vicar of his chief. He himself does not say so; he is much too good a sport for that. But the situation needs further deciphering. If there is no White House drive against Progressives, the troubles of Mr. Ickes are not remarkable. But if Cutting is to go and if Progressives are to be shaken off in 1936, Mr. Ickes may reasonably expect still more troubles.

The Moses episode, so far as the public can see, is a simple case of the President not liking the man. Moses has had the poor grace to attack both the Lehman and the Roosevelt Administration, publicly and privately, while being an employee of both. This, politically speaking, is bad manners. He is being punished as though manners were an important signal ability. Further, the Moses affair makes the Cutting affair look like personal punishment. But this is the most unsatisfactory of all interpretations to recommend, since it would suggest that after two years of patience and good-humor the President had grown fussy about criticism, and was beginning to feel the strain of office.

To come back to Cutting, a good deal of whispering went on in New Mexico, which now is being disseminated in the East. It is worth stating that during the campaign Senator Byrnes, chairman of the Senate Committee on Campaign Expenditures, sent an agent to New Mexico to make an investigation. He did so without the authorization of his full committee, though what the agent reported was duly laid before the committee. His account contained a certain amount of the New Mexican tittle-tattle, but no real evidence of corruption. The Senate committee considered it carefully and finally decided unanimously not to make an investigation. Senator Byrnes is a loyal Administration man, and one must suppose that this agent, chosen to do the Administration the service of measuring up the election, would have supplied genuine evidence of corruption if it existed.

Huey Long became the first to speak in Cutting's behalf on the floor of the Senate. The large Louisianian nose is sharp. It smelled out the chances for Huey to strike at the White House and make friends with a Progressive at the same time. Last week he was talking about running for President in 1936 with a Progressive as vice-president. And last week, for his part, the President promised second place on the Democratic ticket to Garner, which is certainly a deep and unnecessary tribute to pay to party regularity.

The fears here about the Supreme Court decision on the gold clause subsided last week as quickly as they had risen the week before. The sudden calm was almost as strange as the sudden alarm. The first explanation at hand is that the Administration made known, somewhat tardily, that the gold content of the dollar would not be changed no matter what the court ruled. This intent was demonstrated by the drastic use of the exchange-equalization fund to maintain the decreed level of the dollar abroad, the first really extensive use of the fund yet made. Besides, Washington has more than one way to meet an adverse ruling. It could clap an excise tax on all profits made by collecting gold bonds at $1.69 to the dollar, which would solve the domestic problem. Or there might be a still simpler procedure. The government might pay its bonds in gold coin as required by contract, then seize the gold from the payee the instant he received it, giving him paper currency in exchange, since the possession of gold coin is illegal. No doubt still other devices have been proposed in addition to the major action of amending the Constitution or enlarging the Supreme Court. Thus the calm of last week was psychological. The possibility of evading the court made it less to be feared. Whatever its function in the American system of government, this was seen to be one of preserving institutions, not destroying them.

R. G. S.

In the Driftway

IF there are no young children about, the Drifter has a few words to say about the much-mooted subject of spinach. For himself, he finds that when it is picked fresh and cooked dry—with most of the sand washed off—it is quite edible, although turnip greens are much better and young beet tops best of all. But a correspondent in Switzerland who will hardly suffer the detested weed on his table sends a recipe for second-day spinach that sounds rather fetching. It is a Swabian dish and is called spinach pudding. You mix cooked spinach—that has been returned from the table uneaten the day before, doubtless—with eggs, butter, flour; lay it on a couple of milk-softened rolls in a pudding dish and boil for two hours. The proportions are properly given in the document received by the Drifter. But it does not really matter. If you put in plenty of butter and eggs, and if your rolls are nicely baked from fine white flour and your milk sweet, then obviously baking them together, even with spinach, would make a very palatable dish.

ALL this is merely a preamble to another document culled by Alice Stone Blackwell out of Harriet Beecher Stowe. It concerns pie. Obviously New England pie, since it was in New England that pie-making first became an art; and obviously in the early days of our New England fathers, because only then were there stomachs big enough and tough enough to receive a daily quota of pie with safety. Hear Mrs. Stowe:

The making of pies at this period assumed vast proportions. Pies were made by forties and fifties and hundreds, and made of everything on the earth and under the earth.

The pie is an English institution which, planted on American soil, forthwith ran rampant and burst forth into an untold variety of genera and species. Not merely the old traditional mince pie, but a thousand strictly American seedlings from that main stock evinced the power of American housewives to adapt old institutions to new uses. Pumpkin pies, cranberry pies, huckleberry pies, cherry pies, green-currant pies, peach, pear, and plum pies, custard pies, apple pies, Marlborough pudding pies—pies with top crusts and pies without, pies adorned with all sorts of fanciful flutings and architectural strips laid across and around, and otherwise varied—attested the boundless fertility of the feminine mind when once let loose in a given direction.

The Drifter had some difficulty in digesting even the idea of this much pie. But a note tacked on to it by Mrs. Blackwell sent him reeling from the table. "The surplus pies," Mrs. Blackwell explained, "were stored in a large, cold northern chamber, where they remained safely frozen, and were drawn upon for the use of the family all winter. Pies baked at Thanksgiving often came out fresh and good with the violets of April."

A BENIGN Providence has seen to it that in general we no longer have large cold northern chambers to store hundreds of pies in, and the chances of the human race for survival are correspondingly bettered. But let no one think that in a day of small apartments and scant storage space, the hiving instinct has failed us entirely. The Drifter has an amiable young friend with a still younger and equally amiable son. "I don't much care about leaving him a fortune," the young father explained. "Or rather, I don't much mind not leaving him one, as I shall not. But I should like to leave him a cellar. I think it would be fine if I could accumulate about 5,000 bottles of really good wine for him. I've arranged for cellar space in a cave under the city—I can't tell you just where—and there I am laying away his inheritance." The Drifter has gradually recovered from his astonishment at this surprising statement, but further to confound his readers he will add that the charmingly romantic and old-fashioned idea came from a metropolitan who is at home nowhere but in New York City, and who is thoroughly au courant with the latest political and literary chit-chat. The cold-pie chamber may have vanished, along with most of the pie, especially at breakfast time. But the cold-pie idea is with us still. Let the revolution be ever so imminent, we still manage to expect next April, and to act accordingly.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Salvemini and the Casa

[Professor Salvemini of Harvard has kindly turned over to The Nation for publication the following correspondence between himself and the Graduate Club of Italian Studies at Columbia. It will be recalled by our readers that the three officers of the club in a letter published on November 21, 1934, denied The Nation's charges of fascist control in the Italian Department of the university and asserted that "it is part of our program for this year to invite Professor Gaetano Salvemini to speak on some phase of contemporary Italian history." Three and a half weeks after writing this letter the Graduate Club dispatched the invitation. The correspondence printed herewith carries the story from that date until now.]

DEAR PROFESSOR SALVEMINI:

The Graduate Club of Italian Studies together with the History Graduate Club of Columbia University extend you a very cordial invitation to speak at a joint meeting, the week of January 5-11, 1935, on the subject Italian Nationalism from 1870 to the World War. For the past two years we have been working on a series of papers on Italian Nationalism from the French Revolution to Fascism. The series was opened with a general discussion of nationalism in history by Professor Carlton J. H. Hayes, of the History Department of Columbia University.

In view of the recent exposures in The Nation in regard to fascist activities at Columbia University, we think that some explanation is due you in extending this invitation. First, and above all, we do not want you to feel that you are being invited now on account of the statements in The Nation. There is no afterthought connected with this invitation. Our regard for you as an eminent Italian scholar and historian is too great. We want you to know that it was our intention to have you come last year, and our invitation was delayed only because we wanted to complete the series of papers on nationalism on which we were then still engaged. Last year no outside speaker was invited. This year we opened our discussions with a lecture on Italian Lyric Poetry during the Napoleonic Era by Paul Hazard. We have also invited Professor Arthur Livingston to discuss Pareto with us, as well as Professor Irwin Edman of the Philosophy Department of Columbia to discuss the subject of Nationalism in Philosophy.

We sincerely hope that you can arrange to accept our invitation. If the dates mentioned are not suitable will you kindly suggest to us when you will be free to come. We assure you that we all look forward to your coming.

M. F. GRILLI,

For the Graduate Club of Italian Studies
and the History Graduate Club

Casa Italiana, New York, November 28

DEAR MR. GRILLI:

Your invitation to speak at the joint meeting of the Clubs of Italian Studies and of History of Columbia University was gladly received. I have no doubt that—as you have taken the pains to explain—this invitation is not an afterthought connected with the recent exposures in The Nation in regard to fascist activities at Columbia University. Since, however, these exposures are now matter of history (we historians are more concerned with facts than with intentions), the general public which does not know the inner details of events might give to

1935—TENTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE VIKING PRESS

CURTAIN CALLS

John Mason Brown, connoisseur of the theatre, urbane lecturer, and critic of the N. Y. Post, is as much at home in the playhouses of past centuries as he is at last night's premiere. In this book he brings certain illustrious dead into imaginary communion with certain illustrious living.

Interpreting each one's day and dramatic philosophy, he has written subtle, challenging letters purporting to come from Mrs. Siddons to Katharine Cornell, from Peg Woffington to Ina Claire, from Kit Marlowe to Eugene O'Neill, from Richard Brinsley Sheridan to Noel Coward, from Inigo Jones to Robert Edmond Jones.

... a daring tour de force. That he has brought it off magnificently these expert witnesses testify:

John Corbin in the Sat. Review of Lit. "It stands at the summit of contemporary dramatic criticism."

Wm. Soskin in the N. Y. Amer. "I hope to read more of his ghostly communions with the flesh-and-blood of the contemporary theatre. They deserve the status of an institution."

Herschel Brickell in the N. Y. Post: "He wears his erudition lightly... I enjoyed it heartily and so will you if you like good writing and good thinking about the theatre."

Bernard Sobel in the Mirror: "Here, snugly encased in beautiful prose, humor, humanity and erudition, is a whole course in the drama... what a grand book is this."

Richard Lockridge in The Sun: "Admirably done... I am somewhat annoyed with him for having said, so sharply well, all of the things I would have liked to say myself."

Those to whom the theatre is a living art will take a special and genuine delight in this delectable volume. $2.00. The Viking Press.

LETTERS

FROM

GREENROOM

GHOSTS

by JOHN MASON BROWN

this invitation from your club and to my eventual acceptance of it an interpretation that would not be very flattering either to me or to Columbia University.

Furthermore, I gather from your letter that the headquarters of your club are at the Casa Italiana, and hence that the meeting at which I am invited to speak will take place in the institution of which Professor Prezzolini is the director. In view of these facts I think that to avoid misunderstandings my acceptance of your invitation must be subordinated to one essential condition, and this is that Professor Prezzolini as the director of the Casa Italiana extends to me personally an invitation to attend the meeting of the two clubs at the Casa Italiana. Without such an invitation I do not think it convenient to cross the threshold of that institution.

I venture to suggest also that in view of President Butler's letter to The Nation, Professor Prezzolini ought to inform President Butler of this invitation, so that in the case of unfavorable comments or misinterpretations there should be—as you Americans say—"no passing of the bucket."

Cambridge, Mass., December 6 GAETANO SALVEMINI

MY DEAR PROFESSOR SALVEMINI:

We appreciate very much your willingness to address us. However, we regret that Professor Prezzolini will not satisfy the conditions laid down in your letter.

M. F. GRILLI,

For the Graduate Club of Italian Studies
Casa Italiana, New York, December 19

MY DEAR PROFESSOR SALVEMINI:

In view of the fact that we could not meet your conditions in extending our previous invitation to speak to us, and since, as a result, we feel our freedom to invite other speakers in the future to be uncertain and subject to misunderstandings, the Graduate Club of Italian Studies of Columbia University has decided to sever all connection as an organization with the Casa Italiana and will henceforth hold all its meetings somewhere else on the Columbia University campus.

Since our position as liberal American students interested in the study of Italian culture is now clear and unequivocal, the Graduate Club of Italian Studies has again charged me to renew its invitation to you to speak to us at a joint meeting with the Graduate History Club (whose separate invitation has already been issued to you), at a date convenient to you and on the subject, as suggested in our original invitation, Italian Nationalism from 1870 to the World War.

We are confident that you will arrange to accept this invitation and therefore we look forward to your coming with a great deal of pleasure.

New York, January 9

M. F. GRILLI

A Denial from Ferrero

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I beg you to publish some rectifications to the article by President Butler published in The Nation of November 14, 1934.

I have never been asked to give a lecture at the Casa Italiana. I was invited to be a guest there while I was in the States in the spring of 1931, but I did not accept this invitation. I lunched once at the Casa Italiana, but not as guest of the Casa. I was a guest of Mr. Prezzolini, who asked me as a personal friend and not in the name of the institution he is in charge of. At the lunch were five or six professors of Columbia University, but no member of the board of the Casa Italiana. Of this board I never saw anyone except Mr. Prezzolini, whom I knew when he was still in Italy.

GUGLIELMO FERRERO

Geneva, Switzerland, December 1, 1934

The OPEN ROAD in SOVIET RUSSIA

Ninth Season

The Soviet Union is drawing thousands of visitors:
Because it is the most interesting country in the world today.

Because government administration of all enterprise makes travel cheap . . . on a dollar basis.

Of the thousands who go, there are a few hundred who seek more than surface impressions and who therefore require more than the standard services. Through long-established connections with Soviet institutions, plus its own independent representation, The Open Road affords them special opportunities and advantages.

Group tours, and service to independent travelers—
Detailed advice on application to 18th floor.

THE OPEN ROAD
56 West 45th Street New York
Cooperating with Intourist

Contributors to This Issue

LESLIE FORD is the pseudonym of a well-known author.

HENRY HAZLITT, a former editor of The Nation, is on the editorial staff of the New York Times. He is the author of "The Anatomy of Criticism."

DOROTHY DUNBAR BROMLEY is the author of "Birth Control: Its Use and Misuse."

MARK VAN DOREN has published this winter his first novel, "The Transients," and a new volume of verse, "A Winter Diary, and Other Poems."

ANITA BRENNER is the author of "Idols Behind Altars."

ARTHUR LIVINGSTON, associate professor of Romance languages at Columbia University, has translated many of Pirandello's plays and stories.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN is a member of the Department of Education of Brooklyn College and the author of a biography of Samuel Butler.

R. P. BLACKMUR contributes reviews and criticism to various literary periodicals.

EDA LOU WALTON is associate professor of English at Washington Square College, New York University.

MARY MCCARTHY frequently reviews books of fiction for The Nation.

Labor and Industry

The Newspapers and Child Labor

By DOROTHY DUNBAR BROMLEY

ON December 12 Elisha Hanson, counsel of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, talked over the radio on "The Purity of the Press." "It is to the everlasting credit of the news associations and the press of this country," he declared, "that their work cannot be defiled." The gentleman's claim is a trifle comic in view of the concerted and prejudiced attacks which the A. N. P. A. and many of its member papers, under Mr. Hanson's guidance, have made upon the child-labor amendment during the past year.

The attitude of many of the country's papers toward the amendment underwent a sea change as soon as the newspaper code came up for discussion. From the beginning the publishers argued that the freedom of the press would be abridged should regulations be imposed that would "unreasonably raise the cost of production or unreasonably decrease the return from publishing." The publishers themselves were to determine these limits. President Roosevelt spoke to the point when he said, in signing the newspaper code in February, 1934, "the freedom guaranteed by the Constitution is freedom of expression, and that will be scrupulously respected, but it is not freedom to work children or do business in a fire trap or violate the laws against obscenity, libel, and lewdness." At this time he asked that a further report be made on working conditions among newsboys.

The publishers were quick to assume a sanctimonious air. "The financial end of this question," said Mr. Hanson at the June, 1934, hearings, "does not concern us for a minute. It is not a commercial proposition. It is not child labor, not by any stretch of the imagination." The same argument was elaborated by H. W. Stodghill, president and circulation manager of the Louisville Courier-Journal (Ambassador Bingham's paper), and chairman of the welfare committee of the International Circulation Managers' Association. "There is a question," he said at the hearings, "as to whether the work of the newspaper boy is child labor or play by contrast with the errand boy, the messenger boy, the boy that works in a mill. I say it is play." Mr. Stodghill dwelt on the comparative lightness of the newsboy's work, the many benefits offered by his own and other papers in the way of swimming pools, and other social-welfare features.

Compare, now, the publishers' claims with the findings of the Children's Bureau, whose investigators visited seventeen different cities and questioned 1,259 street sellers and 1,830 newspaper carriers under sixteen years of age. While Mr. Stodghill had presented figures showing that the average carrier earned $3.47 and the average street seller $3.22 a week, the investigators found that boys under sixteen earned much less than these amounts. Indeed, 17 per cent of the street sellers under sixteen were earning less than 50 cents a week, and two-thirds of this group less than $2. Among the carriers, 27 per cent earned under $1 a week and 75 per cent less than $3. In many localities competition was keen and there was a superfluity of young boys in the field.

Although conditions in some cities were found to be better than in others, the hours which the newsboys worked were hardly conducive to health or to a spirit of "play." One-third of the street sellers were under fourteen, and many of these young boys worked until eight o'clock in the evening and later in the winter. In one small city thirty-six boys out of fifty-eight who were interviewed worked at selling their papers until ten and later. A twelve-year-old boy had the day before worked from the close of school until five o'clock and again from half-past nine until two in the morning. Another twelve-year-old had sold from four o'clock till midnight. Still another was on the streets from eight Saturday morning until two Sunday morning, with one hour out for meals, while on school days he sold from four in the afternoon until midnight and again on Sunday night, earning all told $2.75 a week.

While the carrier boys do not put in such long hours, the Children's Bureau found that about three-fourths of them start work before six in the morning. The "little merchant" system, furthermore, is a doubtful blessing, since it obliges the boy to solicit accounts, keep books, and collect as well as deliver. The majority of the newspapers, as Mr. Stodghill's own report showed, hold the carriers responsible for the full amount of their bills, and if the boys do not succeed in collecting them, that is their hard luck. One indignant mother, a poor colored woman who testified at the hearings, bewailed the fact that her son was all the time wearing out shoe-leather and yet never got any money for himself. The training in "salesmanship" which is supposed to be so valuable comes close to begging in many instances. One of the model newsboys who was brought to the hearings ended up his fifteen-minute sales talk lamely with the plea, "Now won't you sign this blank and help me win a prize?"

The champions of the newsboy's right to work at any age claim that practically all our eminent citizens got their start selling papers. Some of them may have, but it seems that a good many criminals got their start the same way. According to Warden Lewis E. Lawes, 69 per cent of the inmates of Sing Sing Prison sold newspapers in their youth. The most damaging attack on the newspaper publishers' exploitation of newsboys has come from within their own ranks. The Daily News of New York says bluntly, "When our fellow-publishers talk of freedom of the press they mean freedom to hire children to deliver newspapers before light on winter mornings, because children are cheaper." The New York Post "wants to see child labor ruthlessly rooted out of our country's economic and social system." Similar courageous expressions of opinion have come from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, the Milwaukee Journal, the Raleigh News-Observer, and a number of independent small papers. But the straw that must have come near to breaking the publishers' collective back was the editorial pronouncement which appeared in Editor and Publisher on June 30, after the hearings. "The fourteen-year limit that is now proposed," this journal said, "against which the circulation departments are crusading, is a sensible and fair proposal. . . . Joining hands with the exploiters of child labor in this country, with demonstrations in favor of a complete let-down of law in regard to child life, is not the way out for the American press."

While the child-labor amendment has had the consistent support of the Scripps-Howard papers, until recently of the Hearst papers, and of a fair number of dailies scattered over the country, a shocking number of papers have changed their views since the agitation began over the newsboys. In 1922 the New York Herald Tribune came out strongly for the amendment, but in the spring of 1934, when it was being considered by the state legislature, this influential paper maintained a studied silence. The New York Sun was also for the amendment in 1922, but in 1934 it conducted a sharp campaign against it. Altogether some sixty newspapers in the country which had supported the amendment recently as 1933 had a change of heart in 1934, while a still larger number evaded the issue.

More than a few leading journals have devoted a disproportionate amount of editorial space to attacks on the amendment. The Baltimore Evening Sun, between March, 1933, and March, 1934, printed fourteen adverse editorials; the Hartford Courant, eighteen in the course of ten months; and the Indianapolis Star, fourteen editorial attacks in nine months; yet the amendment was not at the time up for consideration in any of these states. In Massachusetts, where it was brought up and was defeated, the Boston Transcript came out with five blasts in two months, and the Springfield Union with nine adverse editorials in four months. In Kentucky, where the amendment went down to defeat, Ambassador Bingham's two papers, the Louisville Courier-Journal and the Times, printed between them forty-nine adverse editorials from October, 1933, to April, 1934, and broadcast unfavorable propaganda over their radio station. The Courier-Journal also supplied its newsboys with form letters which were to be distributed to subscribers. "Dear Subscriber," the letter ran, "reformers are attempting to prohibit through the NRA and through a proposed amendment to the Constitution boys under eighteen years of age from being gainfully employed. . . . I want to ask you to write a note on my behalf to General Hugh S. Johnson. . . ."

These form letters are an instance of the misrepresentation and distortion of facts which have crept into news columns all over the country. The impression has been given, either explicitly or implicitly, that the child-labor amendment, if ratified, would automatically deprive every boy under eighteen of the right to work. A reading of the amendment should show the editorial writers that it merely empowers Congress "to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of persons under eighteen years of age." No one in his right mind believes that Congress would enact a law prohibiting the employment of persons under eighteen in healthful daytime occupations or making it illegal for parents to require their children to work on the farm or in the kitchen.

The most unfortunate "playing-down" of news favorable to the amendment occurred in connection with two letters which President Roosevelt wrote indorsing it. The first of these, addressed to Mrs. LaRue Brown of the Massachusetts League of Women Voters, read, "Dear Dorothy: Of course I am in favor of the child-labor amendment. . . ."

The letter was released to the Associated Press in Boston on the evening of February 6 and sent out by them only on the New England wires. It was not put on the national hook-up until twenty-four hours later when an inquiry was made by the National Child Labor Committee about the reason for its suppression. The omission was said to be due to bad editorial judgment, nevertheless it may have worked great injury to the cause. The amendment was at the time up for consideration in five states, and the Texas legislators, who voted it down on February 8, might conceivably have been influenced by the President's declaration if they had heard of it.

On November 8 President Roosevelt addressed a second letter of indorsement to Courtney Dinwiddie of the National Child Labor Committee, which was released for publication on November 19. The New York Herald Tribune devoted a column to this letter on page 7 of its suburban edition, but dropped it out of the city edition, although the item was not removed from the index. The New York Times gave it a short write-up, which was buried in the city edition in the financial section on the page of "unlisted quotations." The Sun did not mention it. Only the World-Telegram, the American, and the Daily News gave it adequate display. No mention of the letter appeared under any Associated Press line, although two weeks later, on December 3, the President's indorsement was mentioned in a Washington A. P. dispatch discussing the amendment's chances.

At the present time it appears that the fight in behalf of the newsboy has been lost. At the June hearings the NRA authorities proposed a revision of the publishers' code which would have prohibited the employment of boys under fourteen either as carriers or street sellers (except boys over twelve who already had routes), and would have prohibited carriers being employed before 6 a.m. It was hoped that the Administration would see fit to impose this change, despite the publishers' selfish objections. But nothing was done. Now the Code Authority has proposed for the approval of the publishers substitute provisions which allow boys of twelve to work indiscriminately as carriers, and boys of ten now employed in cities of 50,000 or less to continue as carriers. These rules, furthermore, would allow carriers under sixteen to begin work as early as 5 a.m. These new provisions would seem to constitute the "complete let-down of law in regard to child life" which Editor and Publisher deplored in its editorial of June 30. The Daily News in commenting says, "Such a system of newspaper child labor is the kind of thing Dickens used to write about—and which Dickens was thought to have largely killed off with his writings."

Still more important than the immediate fate of the newsboy is the fate of the child-labor amendment. In 1933 under the impetus of the New Deal it was revived and ratified by fourteen states in quick succession, but since the newspaper campaign against it got under way in the latter part of 1933, not a single state has ratified it. To date twenty states have voted on it favorably, and it must be indorsed by sixteen more before it will become law. In 1935 it will be considered by twenty-four state legislatures. But public opinion in a number of these states has already been poisoned by newspaper campaigns. Should the amendment be defeated and should the NRA expire in 1935, we may look for a recurrence of child labor in its worst form in sweatshops and mills. The newspapers will then have to take the blame for having killed cock-robin.

Books and Films

All Too Historical

Another Caesar. By Alfred Neumann. Translated from the German by Eden and Cedar Paul. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

MUCH of this novel sounds like the novels of Captain Mayne Reid, who never let any information escape his reader if he could help it. When Herr Neumann, for instance, has got Louis Napoleon to that point in his career at which Miss Howard, his English mistress, is about to enter it, he lets us have the following facts full in the face:

Howard is one of the great names of England. The head of the Howard family, the Duke of Norfolk, is the first of the dukes and the hereditary Earl Marshal of England; while the Earls of Suffolk, Carlisle, Nottingham, and the Lord Howard of Glossop represent in the peerage the younger line. In this connection we think also of John Howard, the famous eighteenth-century philanthropist and reformer of prisons. Another Howard whose name is famous was Frederick Howard, major of hussars, killed at Waterloo, immortalized by Byron (himself a relative of the Howards) in the third canto of "Childe Harold."

Now it may seem strange, but I was not thinking also of John Howard as I approached that priceless third sentence. If I was thinking about anything it was the name Glossop. Yet I do not remember thinking about even that, though it occurs to me now that the syllables must have sounded amusing. I had long since been rendered incapable either of thought or of amusement by a historical novel which did not know how to arrange its history, so that, for example, on the three-hundredth page before this one I had been compelled to learn that:

The election of Gregory XVI was the great challenge, the declaration of war. This took place on February 2, 1831, after the conclave had lasted sixty-four days. The revolutionary central committee fixed the central Italian rising for February 5. Modena started two days earlier, on February 3 [yes, that would be the 3rd]; thereupon the notorious Duke of Modena, a Carbonaro, but really a Habsburg provocative agent, bombarded the house of the insurgent leader, who was his personal friend, with grape-shot; shot the place to pieces, arrested the wounded Carbonaro chief and his staff, and sent for the executioner. The news started the flames of revolution in Bologna, Parma, Reggio, Ferrara, and Ravenna, on the 5th; the movement spread like wildfire through all the States of the Church, through the Legations, the Delegations, through Romagna and Umbria.

Neumann's novel is as dull as that. Not that those facts are dull in themselves; but Neumann does nothing more with them than I have indicated. They mean nothing to the reader; they are never alluded to again; they were never needed or desired in a work presumably occupied with the story of one man, Louis Napoleon, nephew of the Emperor and one day to be Napoleon III. There are thousands of facts just like them in the book—copied, I suspect, directly from notes which the author once took with the idea that he might give them life if occasion arose; but having more the air of annotations which some assistant professor will compose in future years for a school edition; supposing the novel breathes that long, which of course it will not, since it is already dead.

Even the hero is dead. Louis Napoleon himself was never very much alive, but I can imagine something better being done with him than the thing Neumann has done. Neumann has understood the pathos of his hero's position, and has gone to enough trouble to erect a theory about his character; but he has presented him in a series of episodes and conversations, many of them prematurely and febrilely climactic, which is never more than a temporal series. The events of Louis's life and the aspects of his strange, weak, stubborn, waxy character do not compose. They remain as stringy and indigestible as Modena and Glossop, and as far apart as history is from fiction. At least bad history, which I take this to be because it is so singularly uninteresting. History is interesting and so is fiction; but Herr Neumann's kind of historical novel is as near to nothing as the human mind can come.

MARK VAN DOREN

Man's Fate on the Pampas

Don Segundo Sombra: Shadows on the Pampas. By Ricardo Güiraldes. Translated by Harriet de Onis. With an Introduction by Waldo Frank. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

WALDO FRANK says in his introduction to this story from the Argentine that it "occupies a place in Argentinian letters not unrelated to that of 'Huckleberry Finn' in ours." It is the story of an orphan boy, he points out, on his own in a frontier day. Other critics remark that it is more like a Western thriller, since it is a story about cowboy life, and they compare Güiraldes to Jack London. To me it suggests irresistibly "Moby Dick" because of its underlying theme—the pursuit of some enormous mystery, and against that the shaping of human lives in a noble pattern, on a grand, exciting scale.

These different aspects of the book have a common denominator, the thing sensed in it by everybody who reads it. It is unmistakably an American book. It has the feel of space, endless and generous and dangerous; the vigor and nobility of youth; the casual ruthlessness, the horseplay, and the enormous hopefulness of the primitive. Its thread of mysticism—the inarticulate emotions of a man riding alone at the head of thousands of cattle, across hundreds of miles—is also the sense, the excited awe, of explorers, prospectors, whalers, migrants, and pioneers.

Don Segundo Sombra, the hero of the book, rides into the life of the boy who tells the story when that boy is a small-town tough, escaping from two pious and petty "aunts" to go fishing and to hang around saloons. He has become a shrewd little guttersnipe and spends his time clowning maliciously, picking up spare pennies however he can, or brooding uncomfortably by the river. Sly subtleties in public places have made him well aware that there is a shadow on his birth. His aunts are not exactly fond of him. Yet an "uncle" whose ranch he once visited gave him two ponies and a poncho, so that when Don Segundo Sombra, the almost legendary gaucho, rides into his town at dusk one day, a complete vision of escape flashes into his head. He departs, with his ponies and his poncho, to lead a brave man's life, the gaucho life of Don Segundo Sombra.

What he pursues when he rides out to find Don Segundo Sombra is this: "I stood still and watched the silhouette of horse and rider strangely magnified against the glowing sky. It was as if I had seen a vision, a shade, a something which passes and is more a thought than a living thing; a something that drew me as a deep pool draws down within it the current of a river." So he attaches himself to the gaucho, watches him, listens, obeys. And together with him rides from ranch to ranch, from round-up to fair, to make a marvelously colorful and dramatic tale.

Güiraldes says Don Segundo Sombra was a real person. Frank says he met him when he was in the Argentine. But in the story Don Segundo Sombra is also a complete ideal, like our own frontier heroes. He is courageous, silent, modest, witty, and completely sure of himself. Of course he can rope, saddle, ride, break horses, dance and sing, and tell stories better than anybody else. But he was something more than these things. He was gaucho inside as well as out, and therefore, says the boy who took him as a model, "only Don Segundo seemed to escape the fatal law that events play with us and make us dance to every vagrant tune." As he broke green horses, as he dominated broncos, so he dominated life itself. He had "the strength of the pampas." The silent land gave him "something of its greatness and its unconcern." And because he had somehow eliminated fear, "the result was that while the rest of us were heading toward death, he seemed to be on the way back."

Don Segundo Sombra as a complete personification of young Argentine, young America, and manhood making its own fate is probably the triple reason that the book has long since become a classic in the Spanish language, one of those literary mountain peaks at once a widely popular story and a book to be studied in school. Mrs. de Onis has made a superb translation. It is informal, colloquial, and yet true. The decorations by Howard Willard are slight, but they bring out the gay and picaresque plot of the book.

ANITA BRENNER

Stories by Pirandello

Better Think Twice About It and Twelve Other Stories. By Luigi Pirandello. Translated by Arthur and Henrie Mayne. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

THIS is by far the most readable and charming of the many Pirandello volumes that we have had. The translators have made it a point to bring together here stories that catch Pirandello in his fairly rare moods of unmixed joy and good nature, when he forgets, and allows his reader to forget, the cosmic horror of never knowing who one really is, and so permits himself to enjoy to the full the mirth that is inherent in his many ingenious situations. It is a side of Pirandello that is too seldom stressed, and his popularity among English readers should gain immensely from it. Here as usual we find many subjects that have been treated also in dramatic form. The Other Son and the inimitably sportive The Jar (which may be seen occasionally in operatic form at the Metropolitan) figure among the one-act plays. Better Think Twice About It appears as "Pensaci, Giacomino" among the better of the three-act comedies (the motif of the aged schoolmaster who marries a girl-wife to get even with the government, which will have to pay her pension). The Call to Duty is none other than "Man, Beast, and Virtue," which Brock Pemberton naughtily slipped over on a Broadway Sunday-night audience as "Say It with Flowers" (in the story it is said with handkerchiefs). What, among the novelties, will make this volume unforgettable will be, I venture, The Quick and the Dead. That surely is one of the best short stories ever written. It is perfection itself, and not a word, not an undertone, could by any stretch of the imagination be altered in it (the sea captain who, by an act of God, is left with two wives, sets up two homes in the same town, alternating voyages between them, and has two sets of "legitimate children," one child every five months). The Madonna's Gift, in its pathos, is in the more familiar Pirandellian vein (the saint mistaken for the thief), while The Captive, too, has a typical thrust of irony (it is better to be rid of life than to be compelled to live it). Chants the Epistle has its taste of bitter-sweet, with the emphasis this time on the side of the sweet (there is error in translation in the title: in Italian, as in other languages, in nouns made up of a verb plus an object, the verb is in the imperative; "Canta l'epistola" is "Chant the Epistle"). It's Nothing Serious is perhaps not altogether in tone in this collection—a mere banality, a man who marries a halfwit in order to escape matrimony. Novel, instead, will prove a little rosary of charmingly fanciful animal stories—The King Set Free, The Crow of Mizzaro, Black Horses. The translators of this collection are finding some delicious bits in the fourteen volumes of the "Tales for a Whole Year." One looks forward with anticipation to others.

ARTHUR LIVINGSTON

A Poet Turns Novelist

The Transients. By Mark Van Doren. William Morrow and Company. $2.50.

HAVING read many poems by Mark Van Doren, I felt that he was more interested in what grass does, how animals move, how wind blows than in what people do, what people feel. There are no people in his poems; if there are it is mainly for gardening or looking at non-human things. There is a great intimacy with the inanimate, the subhuman, the small, the far. There is always the watching eye that looks and looks until the watcher becomes the watched; the profound absorption in appearances that becomes identification, a blood knowledge as incommunicable as sleep. There is silence and fear and the burden of time flying. The eyes, the nerves, and the pulse are merged in something beyond the seen that is timeless, that simply is. This is rest from the messy incompleteness of the brain's and the heart's futile strivings, which are not so much fled from as coldly ignored.

But a novel, I thought, must be about people, unless it is about machinery, which this one surely won't be. It will be set in village or country, mostly outdoors. Nature will be more important than human nature. There will be detail of movement and pattern of activity but a certain blankness of final impression. It will have the quality of loneliness beneath the sky and of silence. I was fascinated by my idea of what the novel would be like, and I continued to be fascinated by what it turned out to be. It was what I had thought, but a great deal more.

There are four main characters, two mortals and two immortal beings from another world, transiently clothed with humanity. There are three episodes, the love of each mortal for an immortal, the love of the two immortals for each other. They are here for a short time only. They may remain and become human or return to their former state, of which they remember only that it is pure being, bodiless and perfect, knowledge and happiness instantaneous and eternal, needing no organs and no expression. The woman wants to stay, but the man, though he loves her, loves more the impersonal serene existence, wise, painless, and beautiful. He has observed that human life consists mainly of hurting and being hurt. He escapes from her, and during this escape each meets and is loved by a mortal. But later she finds him again and seeks to bind him to earth.

Although the episodes interlock, each has a special quality and completeness. The first, the love of the girl Madge for the strange creature John Bole, who is arrested for hitchhiking and lodged in the one-room jail attached to her father's house, seems to me extremely beautiful. Madge, a girl of potential character, a slangy little thing, interested in parties and boy friends, becomes through her love for Bole an authentically tragic figure. And this is done realistically and simply, for her English grows no better while her spirit is tempered and purified by her suffering. She loves Bole and follows him, knowing that he must shortly leave her.

The love of Stephen for Margaret, the woman immortal, is in another key, for Stephen is a spoiled child of fortune, though a charming one. He can command a perfect setting for his idyl, and tries to imprison her in it. He loves her with wonder and humility, yet his love has not the poignancy of Madge's. He suffers but he will recover. Margaret vanishes and he does not find her again, but he does not have to see her walk away with his rival as Madge does her lover. For Margaret, after leaving him, finds Bole on the road with Madge and quietly takes him away. Her victory, however, is only over Madge. She must now conquer Bole for herself, wean him from his adoration of an imagined principle of life to actual living. Her struggle to do this constitutes the last episode.

The language and the setting are simple. The other-worldliness is all in the feelings and behind the feelings of the beings involved. There is homeliness in the speech and air of the first episode. This is New England; these people are Yankees, Madge, her father and mother. They talk of the strangeness of Bole as he might be talked of in any village kitchen. The author's long habit of looking has flowered in one of the most pictorial of novels. It is a series of scenes that remain in the memory, and these scenes have the emphasis on movement that one finds in the poems, greatly heightened in meaning. In the poignant scenes of Madge's two visits to Bole in the jail, one remembers, as though one tasted their salt, her tears on his cheek. When he eats a farewell breakfast with her and her mother, her resolute turning away of her face as she serves him, the prodigiously achieved flippancy of her speech produce an effect of intolerable tension, which is later released when she slips through a back window to join him. Many such instances might be cited. The two women, one mortal, one wishing to be, have much simplicity and womanliness in common, and John, the immortal, is a good deal like many mortal men. He loves women well, but fundamentally he loves something else better, though he doesn't quite know what it is; kind, charming, and ruthless, he will take all that they have to give him on the way there, enriching them with a pain that is almost understanding, while himself shrinking from giving or receiving pain. The existence he longs for is a dissolution in still air, a spirit of peace and vacancy in the quiet of country afternoons, on sunny hillsides, something that the watching eye and receptive heart will feel as perfection, and Margaret must make the decision to follow him there or not.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN

A Psychogenic Goodness

Heaven's My Destination. By Thornton Wilder. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

PERHAPS the great bulk of the immediate readers of this romance will be among the subscribers to the Book-of-the-Month Club, of which it is the January selection. There is a flier from the News of that club, written by Henry Seidel Canby, to which it is therefore pertinent to refer. Dr. Canby compares "Heaven's My Destination" with "Don Quixote," "Pilgrim's Progress," Sinclair Lewis, Ruth Draper, and an unwritten book by Voltaire. But it is "Don Quixote" without the tolerance and gaiety, "Pilgrim's Progress" without Bunyan's passion or allegory; it is the Sinclair Lewis of "Free Air" not "Arrowsmith"; it is Ruth Draper without the irony or taste, Voltaire with neither wit nor intellectual rage. Dr. Canby teaches us that when applied with a ladle rather than a juster measure comparisons are indeed odious. For the rest, there are matters more naturally within the book itself which may be made to characterize it more firmly, if on another level, than Dr. Canby's encomiums.

Superficially, as every reviewer has noted at length, Mr.

Bargains in Books

Offerings of America's Oldest Mail-Order Book House

Up to 75% OFF former prices

To clear out the small quantities which remain on hand, the following titles have been marked down as much as 75% off original prices. Each is brand-new, perfect in every way, a permanent addition to your library. Orders accepted subject to prior sale.

1. THE WORKS OF FRANCIS RABELAIS. Edited by Albert Jay Nock and Catherine Rose Wilson. The Urquhart - LeMortoux translation. "In all probability it will remain for many years the definitive edition of Rabelais."—Sat. Review. 2 vols., total of 952 pages, 84 illustrations. Formerly $15.00 Ass'n Price $4.95
2. LYTTON Strachey's PORTRAITS IN MINIATURE. A later volume, in the same vein as "Books and Characters." "A delight to devotees of belles lettres!"—Forum. 214 pages. Formerly $2.50 Ass'n Price 98c
3. Catherine Carswell's THE LIFE OF ROBERT BURNS. "A definitive biography of and monument to Scotland's greatest poet."—Horace Gregory. 411 pages, 4 photographs. Formerly $3.75 Ass'n Price 98c
9. WRITE IT RIGHT. By Ambrose Bierce. A little blacklist of literary faults, by America's foremost master of style. Useful, witty. Interesting to those who like to speak, write and think precisely. Ass'n Price $1.00
10. THE FRESCOES OF DIEGO RIVERA. 139 full-page reproductions. Portraits, sketches and frescoes in Mexico City and Chapingo. Formerly $10.00 Ass'n Price $2.69
11. THE ANATOMY OF ART. By Herbert Read. Illustrated. The answer to the question, "What Is Art?" Formerly $3.00 Ass'n Price 98c

LIMITED QUANTITIES OF EACH TITLE

4. Catherine Carswell's THE SAVAGE PILGRIMAGE: A NARRATIVE OF D. H. LAWRENCE. "Will doubtless have to be consulted by all future students of the man."—American Mercury. 296 pages. Formerly $2.75 Ass'n Price 98c
5. Ozenfant's FOUNDATIONS OF MODERN ART. The aesthetics of the most advanced schools of art. 352 pages, 175 illustrations. Formerly $5.00 Ass'n Price $2.49
6. NEW DIMENSIONS: THE DECORATIVE ARTS OF TODAY IN WORDS AND PICTURES. By Paul T. Frankl. Chapters on fabrics, modern furniture, lighting, city architecture, etc. 88 pages text. 122 pages of photographs. Formerly $10.00 Ass'n Price $1.89
7. MODERN ARCHITECTURE. By Henry-Russell Hitchcock. The growth of modernism traced from 1800 to the present. 252 pages. 59 illustrations. Formerly $5.00 Ass'n Price $1.69
8. MODERN EUROPEAN BUILDERS. By F. R. Yerbury. 150 full-page plates from specially taken photographs, a collection of the finest examples of the new art of Europe. Formerly $5.00 Ass'n Price $2.69
12. THE REAL ARABIAN NIGHTS. Complete and unexpurgated. In 8 beautifully illustrated vols. Formerly $66.00 Ass'n Price (the set) $14.88
13. DANTE'S DIVINE COMEDY. The famous Henry F. Cary translation. 130 full-page Gustave Doré illustrations. 652 pages. Large clear type. Handsomely, durably bound in 10 buckram, size 6 3/4 x 10". Formerly $10.00 Ass'n Price $2.98
14. SCULPTURE. By A. M. Rindge. From prehistoric and Egyptian times to the present, with emphasis on the contemporary. 300 illustrations. Formerly $6.00 Ass'n Price $1.69
15. FUNDAMENTALS OF MUSICAL ART. By Edward Dickinson, Litt. D., Editor-in-Chief. Introduces reader to the immense range and wealth of musical knowledge. Complete in 20 vols. Formerly $40.00 Ass'n Price (the set) $6.95
16. THE WORK, WEALTH AND HAPPINESS OF MANKIND. By H. G. Wells. First Edition. In 2 large, fully illustrated vols. Boxed. Formerly $7.50 Ass'n Price (the set) $1.98

Satisfaction Guaranteed—Or Your Money Back

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION, (Est. 1884)

367-373 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $..... Please send the books encircled below:

☐ Please Send Free 36-Page Catalog No. 257-N

1	2	3	4	Name
5	6	7	8	Address
9	10	11	12	City
13	14	15	16	State

Wilder has purged his style and altered his subject; there is neither verbal sophistication nor ritual sonority of theme; there is, rather, a lively, entertaining novel of picaresque incident presenting the twenty-fourth year of the life of George Brush in plain but highly literate idiom. Brush is a Middle Westerner traveling in schoolbooks; he is also a primitive American Christian and a disciple of Gandhi. The combination of occupation and scene with a radically dissociated personal point of view puts him in constant conflict with everyone he meets. To the ordinary American, either pretentiously hard-boiled or inarticulately simple, with whom he mostly deals, he seems either a pig-headed religious freak with no sense of reality or a high-minded prig with a passion for butting into other people's business. Mr. Wilder has chosen, quite rightly for certainty of immediate effect and interest, to represent his theme in terms of humorous incident. Thus we see Brush made the victim of practical jokes, arrested for misunderstandings, and married, because of a principle, to a woman he does not love. The sense of reality is secured by showing, with the heightening power of humor, the reaction of "normal" people to a personality they take to be absurd. The clinching irony lies in the author's objective rendering of the different incidents; by the objectivity the "normal" people gain a new proportion in the absorbed light of their victim's personality. There are few authors with both enough skill and enough purpose to make such comment either possible or relevant. But even the reader who fails to apprehend either the purpose or the skill can yet, if he merely lets himself go, enjoy the immediate value of the achieved effect—which represents, I suppose, a triumph of craft.

Fundamentally, in the important aspects of his work, Mr. Wilder has not altered much; he has merely matured his technique, dropped meretricious ballast, and shifted his angle of vision. That his substance remains constant is perhaps indicated by the quotation from his own "The Woman of Andros" on the title page: "Of all the forms of genius, goodness has the longest awkward age." Certainly it is with the representation of goodness, conceived in terms of the Christian insight and posed in conflict with the world, that Mr. Wilder has always been concerned. Goodness, not intelligence (as with James), not passion (as with Balzac), not the rational life (as with Mann) is the predominating theme. It is goodness, too, taken not merely as a quality or a resource but as the final vocation of life, and it is the special goodness of the Christian insight; which is to say that, as with the great novelists, the theme is made omnivorous and inclusive.

Every artist may be granted his theme with the proviso that he represent it to the limits called for. In Mr. Wilder's case there are two difficulties which interfere with complete initial assent. There is the difficulty of Christianity and there is the difficulty of the limit of the form of Mr. Wilder's imagination. Christianity is no longer, in the phrase of Ramón Fernandez, quite to our spiritual baking—not in the Catholicism of T. S. Eliot, in the Tomists, or in Mr. Wilder's humaner form. As a fundamental, governing assumption in the affairs of our own day it is hard to swallow; so that when George Brush is presented as a heresy—an exaggerated instance—of Christian goodness, neither the heresy nor the implied corrective in the off-stage figure of Father Pasziewski (who, hearing of Brush and his goodness, prays for him on Fridays) can be easily digested as matters of dramatic belief. Thus, too, some of Brush's opponents, particularly the unregenerate Harvard intellectual, seem set up like ninepins solely for the purpose of being knocked over. The reader has, for more than immediate satisfaction, to perform an operation which he is not equipped for: he has to provide the substance of the spiritual reality of which Mr. Wilder supplies only the outward sign. However successful superficially, which is a great deal, goodness which is merely imputed has not enough authority to substantiate a theme.

It requires, for natural unbelievers, either the persuasion of communicated passion in the phrase or deliberate representation. Dostoevski's character Alyosha—with whom Dr. Canby might profitably have compared George Brush—gains the complete assent of the reader as to his profound Christian goodness because he is so thoroughly represented both in conflict and alone. Dostoevski employed an imaginative form of large enough scope to require complete representation; Mr. Wilder does not, employing rather the mode of the rigidly selected item, the hint, the indication, the light touch. If I may draw an analogue from the art of painting, Mr. Wilder uses the mode of outline and inner markings where Dostoevski uses the mode of total visual effect. So far as literature is concerned, the difference between the two modes is this: where Dostoevski depends the least on an assumed fundamental agreement with his readers, exactly at that point Mr. Wilder depends the most. Since with Mr. Wilder the agreement does not widely exist, the reality, not of the theme, but of his special instance of it, seems at a critical point without the authority of art, and merely psychogenic, a matter of intention. Thus Mr. Wilder achieves a success which is secondary and provisional when on every other ground it ought to have been primary and certain.

R. P. BLACKMUR

Case History

We Are Betrayed. By Vardis Fisher. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

THIS is by far the most interesting volume in Vardis Fisher's tetralogy, of which two volumes, "In Tragic Life" and "Passions Spin the Plot," have already appeared. The hero, Vridar, is grown now, married to a girl from his own Antelope Hill country. This section of a morbidly fascinating case history is concerned with the young man's college years, with his brief experience in a training camp during the World War, and with his violent and varied post-war disillusionments. "We Are Betrayed" is better written and more important in subject matter than the earlier volumes largely because the main, and almost only, character is now adult. He is no longer dwelling on the petty though terrible sex experiences of his early youth, but is examining himself as an adult and as he reflects the lives of others. This volume, therefore, gives the first hint of universality of theme. It remains, nevertheless, the study of a morbidly sensitive, frightfully egocentric personality. Through his intense desire to be utterly honest with himself and with all his friends and associates Vridar succeeds, in his passionate self-absorption, in treating those he loves more cruelly than might the most villainous of men. This book is an account of how the man and the artist together kill the woman loved.

One gets no clear character portrayals in such a book as this—actually no one exists except Vridar. Nor is this volume, any more than the others, truly a novel. Every sensation of the author has been set down, and since his is so violent and absorbed a mind—a mind certainly a little mad—they are all set down with great intensity. We see Nelo, his sweetheart and wife, his college professors, his family, his soldier companions, his friends, his intellectual mistress, through his eyes. One suspects that Nelo might have told a very different story about herself. One realizes that many of these people must have seen in Vridar the fool, the madman, the destroying, self-centered person he obviously was. The author, to give him full credit, is not unaware that he is showing us a character by no means so noble as this suffering hero with the tremendous passions obviously believes himself to be. No writer could put Vridar down on paper and not see his faults. But in this case the novelist—or biographer—is more concerned with writing a completely “honest” account of a life than with the effect his protagonist produces on the reader.

There is more invention in this volume than in the earlier ones. Vridar, loving Neloia with a Lawrencian blindness, and choosing deliberately to leave her for the impossible Athene, symbol of his mind and its needs, is drawn in good measure from life. But one doubts whether he drove Neloia to suicide in quite the manner he describes. These last chapters are exciting, well constructed. The only difficulty is that one has been borne through the book on great waves of agony and as a result the final climax hardly surpasses the many preceding ones.

We leave the hero reading Marx (“Except for the faint light of Marx, I’ve found nothing yet in books to sustain me”), and perhaps some humility, some realization of himself as one of many, will result. So far, he has been the complete romanticist, Byronian in his frenzies, the modern Faust fully equipped with a Freudian psychology.

Mr. Fisher has provided us with absorbing reading, particularly as he has analyzed his hero’s most intimate acts and thoughts, but he has so far not succeeded in creating literature. He writes with power, but the difficulty is that power forever turned on at full force loses some of its effectiveness. There is little variety in mood, little selection, little change of tone or tempo throughout the book. If Mr. Fisher could learn restraint in the use of the power he obviously possesses, if he could introduce more variety into his tone, if he could give to a wider range of characters as much reality as he gives to Vridar, he would be a novelist to reckon with.

EDA LOU WALTON

Pass the Salt

Lightship. By Archie Binns. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.50.
Lost Horizon. By James Hilton. William Morrow and Company. $2.50.

Mary Peters. By Mary Ellen Chase. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

February Hill. By Victoria Lincoln. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

Shipmates. By Isabel Carter. William R. Scott. $2.50.

EVERY year at the holiday season the critical brothers fall victim to an epidemic of list-making. Probably every critic on every daily and every weekly in the city of New York, and doubtless elsewhere, composes his or her list of “My Favorite Books,” “Best Books of the Year,” “Books to Give Your Friends for Christmas.” The value of this annual game is, I think, greatly overrated. Lists can be made which are serious, disinterested estimates of a year’s literary activity, but too frequently they become mere exhibitionistic frolics in which the critic has all the pleasure of airing his prejudices with none of the pain of defending them. This year, early in the game, The Nation published its own list, which was, I truly believe, compiled in the sober spirit I mention above. Whatever its spirit, it evoked what amounted to a howl of protest from the daily papers. Critics were vociferously hurt to find that The Nation (and for that matter, the New Republic) had failed to include their favorite novels. One commentator, dashing into the fray with her own list, announced that The Nation’s selections in fiction would spoil anybody’s Christmas dinner, to which The Nation can only reply that its selections were not intended to be taken as an apéritif.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

“THE ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES OF THE NEW DEAL is a tremendous little book. It’s a call to the American people which, I think, great multitudes will hear. I predict it will be discussed by the Brain Trust, the President and his Cabinet, and the Congress in Washington.”

—LOUIS ADAMIC.

THE ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES OF THE NEW DEAL

by BENJAMIN STOLBERG and
WARREN JAY VINTON

A sound and clear summary, with no words wasted, with the resonant common sense of a pamphleteer like Tom Paine. Thousands of people have been anxious for just such a book, and this one is, perhaps, as challenging and impressive a document as has appeared in this country for many years.

Just out, $1.00

HARCOURT, BRACE & CO., 383 Madison Ave., N. Y.

F. P. A. comments

"So to bed, and read M. Van Doren's 'The Transients', enjoying it greatly, and a swift moving tale".

Lewis Gannett says

"In 1935 he spins immortality into a strange and engaging novel. He slyly suggests that even among the immortals women are more domestic than men".

• second printing

Mark Van Doren's book
The Transients and published by Morrow

However, in the midst of all this excitement The Nation found on its shelves five novels of the 1934 season, four of them critics' "favorites," all of them in or near the best-seller class, and all still unreviewed. These were the five: "Lightship," "Lost Horizon," "Mary Peters," "February Hill," and "Shipmates." In exhuming them now, when most of them are already on their way to oblivion, The Nation is not writing a codicil to its list. This review is really nothing more than an explanatory footnote.

These five neglected novels have very little in common. Three are sea stories, one a tale of adventure, one a bawdy romance. There are but two qualities they share, and the first is a splendid, sickening mediocrity. They are not bad books; they are, for the most part, competently written. They are the work of patient craftsmen who have learned how to write a smooth, grammatical sentence, how to manipulate a conventional plot, how to make a character look vaguely like a human being.

James Hilton, for example has sat at the feet of more masters than I can name, and as far as I can judge from "Lost Horizon," he will never be more than an obedient disciple. From Somerset Maugham and Lord Dunsany he has taken the old stunt that involves two former Oxford men who meet in a club in a distant spot and fall to discussing the adventures of a mutual friend. When the strange story ends, there you are, back in the security of the British club, and you wonder: was it real, or was it but a winter's tale told near a comfortable fireside? For the rest of his plot Mr. Hilton must have turned to Sax Rohmer, for throughout the novel you have the uneasy feeling that at any moment, out from behind a tapestry in the luxurious Tibetan monastery, will step your old acquaintance, Dr. Fu Manchu. In the same fashion, Mr. Binns, Miss Chase, and Miss Carter, authors of the sea stories, have all come to realize that a disaster at sea can give a reader—or a movie-goer—a sound emotional wallop, and someone has unquestionably told Miss Lincoln, progenitrix of "February Hill," that you can always get a laugh out of a dirty joke.

But beyond these few simple, traditional devices, the authors of the five novels have learned and felt little. In "February Hill" Victoria Lincoln has created two characters, a wicked old woman and a wicked young child, who, while not deeply realized, are at least memorable. Of the other characters in the novels this cannot be said; two weeks after the books have been put aside their names will be forgotten. Of Mary Peters and her mother, Sarah, one knows nothing but the constantly iterated fact that they are "brave women." The heroine of "Shipmates" has not much more than a continual giggle to distinguish her from the rest of the human race. It is the same with "Lost Horizon" and "Lightship." The essential mediocrity of all the books reveals itself most strongly in their presentation of character. The situations are there, but the people, weakly sketched, are not large enough to fill them.

In a second respect are the novels alike, and it is this common quality which probably accounts for their popularity. They are all escape novels. Whether the action takes place on a nineteenth-century vessel or a modern lightship anchored off Puget Sound, whether in lonely Tibet or strike-ridden Fall River, it is never at any time concerned with problems which are to contemporary human beings real and pressing. The action of all seems to take place in some kind of vacuum where satire is never sharp and pain is suffused with a pleasurable melancholy. If one wishes to be melodramatic one can call them anodyne, narcotic, but such epithets give them a dignity and a power that they do not in themselves possess. They are, in essence, pure, old-fashioned treacle, and if they were taken as pre-Christmas nourishment, I hope they were accompanied by a side-dish of bitter aloes and Attic salt.

MARY MCCARTHY

Shorter Notices

Memory of Love. By Bessie Breuer. Simon and Schuster. $2.

Here is an extremely interesting first novel. A number of well-known writers have, as usual, written extravagant blurbs for it, and it will probably suffer from being overpraised. It is the story of a love affair between a virile but weak man and a strong, confused girl, a love affair that begins in simple lust and ends in high, almost Platonic passion. The character of the man is badly conceived, so much so that he seems more a woman's dream of a forceful male than a living member of the masculine sex. The writing is often strained and perfervid. Yet, for all its faults, Miss Breuer has managed to condense into her short book such a terrific sense of the agonizing, yearning power of half-fulfilled love that it is more affecting than a dozen well-executed novels. Miss Breuer's intensity of feeling is real, and if she will rid herself of a certain fake intensity of style, her next novel will lack the blurry quality that defaces "Memory of Love."

Via Mala. By John Knittel. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.50.

This vast and sluggish novel of 667 pages deals with life and crime in a Swiss Alpine canton. Its publishers boast that it has already gone through several editions abroad, though how this was accomplished is a problem more fascinating than the central problem of the novel. Mr. Knittel's book occupies itself with the ancient but perhaps burning question: Is murder ever justifiable? His villain and central character, Jonas Jauretz, is a drunken owner of a sawmill, who abuses his family in a violent but unconvincing fashion. His maltreated relatives finally take matters into their own hands and murder him. The rest of the novel is devoted to the state of their consciences after the fearful event. The characters whom Mr. Knittel manipulates through this drama of primitive passion are unreal in conception, jerky in movement. The few chunks of modern political philosophy which are tossed at random into the book are altogether infantile, and the prose reads like a bad literal translation of a foreign novel. One may commend Mr. Knittel only for his energy in putting together such a tremendous opus.

Pitcairn's Island. By Charles Nordhoff and James Norman Hall. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

The Tale of a Shipwreck. By James Norman Hall. Houghton, Mifflin Company. $2.50.

"Pitcairn's Island" completes the trilogy of high adventure of which "Mutiny on the Bounty" and "Men Against the Sea" were the first two volumes. Here we are told what happened to Fletcher Christian and his mutineers after they left Tahiti for the second time, to be seen no more by their former associates. Only one survived to tell the story of how they landed on a little paradise, where food and water was abundant, where the climate never harassed them, where there were no dangerous beasts, where the scenery was all that could have been asked for. And as did their Biblical ancestors before them, they lost their Eden because of the greed and anger in their own hearts. Like the best romances, that is, "Pitcairn's Island" has a moral. The story of the Bounty began in violence, and with violence it came to its end. For with the death of Christian and Young, it may be said to have ended, although their children survived to be discovered by Europeans and to be betrayed by Christian missionaries, the familiar fate of the South Sea islands. But this pathetic ending to the tale was not told until Mr. Hall wrote his "Tale of a Shipwreck." He went to Pitcairn's Island to see for himself what was left of the little society which Christian had founded. He, too, was shipwrecked on the way back and had to make a portion of his passage in a small boat, just as Bligh had done. This is a fitting epilogue to as grand a tale of sea romance as we have had in a long time. Whether it is "true" or not, in the sense of whether or not Mr. Nordhoff and Mr. Hall have correctly interpreted the facts that have come down to us about the Bounty mutiny and its consequences, matters less than that their account is spirited, direct, passionate, and always interesting. It has the truth of art; the reader could not ask for more.

Background for Venus. By James Laver. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

This new novel by the author of "Nymph Errant" is mildly entertaining and quite unimportant. The fashionable art world of London is its background; its hero is a gifted young artist who sells himself out to the fleshpots and thereby destroys himself. Its plot is intricate enough for any taste, and it plays melodrama against a rather crude satire in the accepted modern fashion. Unfortunately, Mr. Laver's wit is not sufficiently sharp nor his emotions sufficiently profound to lift a mediocre tale into high comedy or into tragedy. Yet the novel is so unassuming that one cannot be angry with it for its shallowness. One can only think, a shade regretfully, of what Evelyn Waugh would have done with the plot.

Films

Blood and Glory

IT would undoubtedly surprise the founders of this commonwealth very much to hear their descendants loudly applauding two recent Hollywood pictures which are nothing more or less than testimonials to the glory of British domination. Yet this is the curious spectacle that may be witnessed this week at two New York theaters not hitherto open to the insinuation of Anglophilia. "Clive of India" at the Rivoli celebrates the founding in the eighteenth century of that empire which is being so stoutly defended today in "Lives of a Bengal Lancer" at the Paramount. It is not easy to offer an explanation for this sudden devotion to the cause of British imperialism on the part of Hollywood producers. There is of course the possibility that the warnings which Mr. Hearst used to issue on the subject of British propaganda in this country were not properly heeded. But in the absence of any evidence of this sort one must look elsewhere for an explanation. Perhaps one need look no farther than the mind of the average American motion-picture audience, to which one empire is probably the same as any other. It is probable, in other words, that nothing more portentous lies behind these pictures than the inveterate human attraction for destruction, carnage, torture, and bloodshed. If the story of British rule in India has so suddenly become a popular film subject, it may only be because it is so rich in opportunities for playing on the more ferocious modes of heroic conduct. For the heroic note, which reappeared last season with such biographical pictures as "Catherine the Great" and "Viva Villa," has apparently come to stay: the current Broadway screen is gory with the blood of heroes of all nationalities. Nor is it altogether surprising that, in a period of tension like the present, screen audiences should like to relieve their feelings now and then by a few orgies of blood and glory.

At the same time not all spectators will be so easily able to suspend their intelligences before such spectacles; and for these people everything in the two films just mentioned is likely to be vitiated by the essential phoniness of their assumptions. For them Lord Clive will appear less the romantic hero

~~~~~ Not Even Supposed to Exist! ~~~~~

The SEX LIFE of the UNMARRIED ADULT

Edited by Ira S. Wile, M.D.

The contributors include Dr. Robert L. Dickinson, Margaret Mead, Prof. Ernest R. Groves, Mary Beard, Prof. Ernest W. Burgess, Horace M. Kallen, Prof. Robert Morss Lovett, Lorine Pruette, Morris L. Ernst, Prof. N. W. Ingalls.

"A much needed, candid, and sane discussion of one of the most important social and moral problems of the day. The book should create a real stir."
—HARRY ELMER BARNES.

$2.50 at all bookstores, VANGUARD PRESS, Dept. L, 100 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C.

□ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says □

ACCENT ON YOUTH. Plymouth Theatre. Hopeful message for the middle-aged in a lively comedy about playwright in love with his secretary. Witty and amusing.

ANYTHING GOES. Alvin Theatre. Victor Moore as Public Enemy No. 13 in a No. 1 musical revue, with Ethel Merman at her best.

LIFE BEGINS AT 8:40. Winter Garden. Disputes with "Anything Goes" for first place among the revues.

MERRILY WE ROLL ALONG. Music Box Theatre. One of the outstanding hits and very good indeed if you don't mind having your serious plays use a little staycomb in their hair. By George Kaufman and Moss Hart, who excoriate cheap success without forgetting to put in a few wisecracks where they will do most good.

ODE TO LIBERTY. Lyceum Theatre. Gilbert Miller's characteristically suave production of a rather trifling French play in which Ina Claire tames a fugitive Communist through love—of the profane variety.

PAGE MISS GLORY. Mansfield Theatre. Dorothy Hall in a rough and ready satire on beauty contests which isn't too particular how it gets its laughs, but gets them anyway.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE. Henry Miller's Theatre. Much like the above but about a movie star this time and perhaps a trifle less mechanical.

POST ROAD. Masque Theatre. Novel and exciting crook melodrama which begins as a quiet domestic comedy but has lots of surprises up its sleeve.

RAIN FROM HEAVEN. Golden Theatre. Perhaps the best—and certainly the most substantial—of S. N. Behrman's excellent comedies. With Jane Cowl as a charming embodiment of urbanity and tolerance in a world seemingly about to lose both.

REVENGE WITH MUSIC. New Amsterdam Theatre. Charles Winninger, Rex O'Malley, and Libby Holman in a lavish and generally entertaining operetta with lots of comedy and some good dancing in a more or less Spanish manner.

ROMEO AND JULIET. Martin Beck Theatre. Swift and beautiful production with Katharine Cornell as Juliet, Basil Rathbone as Romeo, and Brian Aherne as Mercutio.

SAILORS OF CATTARO. Civic Repertory Theatre. The third and much the best offering by the Theatre Union, which goes in for plays with a revolutionary purpose. This one is all about a mutiny on board an Austrian man-of-war, and it is first rate as a play, quite aside from the red-flag waving.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR. Maxine Elliott's Theatre. Tense but grim drama about a fiendishly perverse child, who is played with extraordinary force by Florence McGee. One of the most-discussed plays of the year.

VALLEY FORGE. Guild Theatre. Maxwell Anderson's entertaining drama about George Washington, with Philip Merivale as the Father of His Country. The whole thing seemed very pleasantly theatrical to me, but there are many who take it more seriously without liking it any the less.

□ PLAYS □ LECTURES □

THEATRE UNION'S NEW PLAY

SAILORS of CATTARO

"The third and much the best offering by the Theatre Union."

—Joseph Wood Krutch, The Nation.

CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE, 14th Street and 6th Avenue
Prices 30c to $1.50. Evens. 8:45; Matinees Wed. and Sat. 2:45

For information on reduced rates for Benefit Theatre Parties call Watkins 9-2050.

"A genuine contribution to the American theater."—Gabriel, Americas,
HERMAN SHUMLIN presents

The Children's Hour

By LILLIAN HELLMAN

MAXINE ELLIOTT'S THEATRE WEST 11th STREET
Evenings 8:30—50c to $3. Matinees Wed. and Sat.—2:40—50c to $2.

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

MAXWELL ANDERSON'S play

VALLEY FORGE

with PHILIP MERIVALE

THEATRE, 52nd Street, West of Broadway.
Evenings 8:40. Matinees, Thurs. and Sat. 2:40.

S. N. BEHRMAN'S play

RAIN FROM HEAVEN

with JANE COWL
and JOHN HALLIDAY

GOLDEN THEATRE, 45th Street, West of Broadway.
Evenings 8:30. Matinees Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

(in association with Charles B. Cochran)
for a limited engagement

ELIZABETH BERGNER in

ESCAPE ME NEVER

by MARGARET KENNEDY

SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway.
Evenings 8:30. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

THE SCHOOL for ADULT JEWISH EDUCATION

Leo W. Schwarz and Jacob J. Weinstein, Directors

COURSES FOR SECOND SEMESTER, BEGINNING JAN. 30

Jewish Labor Movements—Elsie Gluck

Racial Theories and the Jews—Otto Klineberg

The Jews of Soviet Russia—Joshua Kunitz

Main Currents of Jewish Thought in Modern Times—Koppel S. Pinson

The Economic Factors in Modern Jewish Life—Nathan Reich

Crises in Jewish History—Leo W. Schwarz

The Modern Hebrew Renaissance—Shalom Spiegel

For rates and catalogue address Secretary

63 Fifth Avenue New York, N. Y.

Auspices of MENORAH GRADUATE SOCIETY

□ BOOKS □

The SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE • By I. E. Hutton, M. D.

"Dr. Ira Wile describes the book as a clear, succinct, non-emotional, authoritative and conservative exposition of the practical factors involved in making marriage successful on the sexual level. That describes the book exactly. . . . It is primarily concerned with the conduct of the honeymoon and with the technique of the sexual performance."—Dr. Morris Fishbein.
Price $2.00 (postage 15c extra) Recommended by Physicians

EMERSON BOOKS, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York City

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation that Hollywood makes him out to be and more the ruthless opportunist, forger, and taker of bribes that he actually was. The little band of intrepid British warriors in the other picture will hardly be distinguishable from any band of marauders in an alien country. And these disturbing reflections will seriously hamper any response of a purely emotional or dramatic order. It will be difficult to feel properly sympathetic toward Lady Clive (Loretta Young) when her husband (Ronald Colman) is off fighting for his "honor," to admire the rigorous patriotism of the Lancer colonel who makes his son suffer the penalty of breaking discipline, or to work up the necessary resentment against the Indian prince who tortures the two young officers (Gary Cooper and Franchot Tone) in the same picture. "Lives of a Bengal Lancer" is the better film only in the sense that in covering more ground it provides a more considerable distraction for the eye. An expensive display of Hollywood incoherence, it is at least colorful, noisy, and varied in movement. So much cannot be said for "Clive of India," which is a niggardly production in every respect. The Indian background is skimmed for the sake of interminable marital dialogues in a London drawing-room. The horrors of the Black Hole of Calcutta are not even indicated, and the attack of the battle elephants at Plassey is a grave disappointment.

Between these two films and the film that has just opened at the Cameo there is an almost absolute difference. "Chapayev" is also a hymn to action; its hero is a warrior who thinks nothing of risking his life for a cause. But the action is so indissolubly related to a clearly defined theme that both the emotions and the intelligence of the spectator are engaged from beginning to end. The action, in a word, has some meaning for the mind. This is not to suggest that like so many recent Soviet productions "Chapayev" is another sermon on the Lenin mausoleum. Its meaning is projected entirely in terms of individual character. Chapayev, who was one of the best-known leaders of the red forces during the civil war in 1917, is presented "in the round"—undoubtedly the most successful achievement in this kind of characterization that the Soviet studios have yet managed. As an impetuous and strong-willed hero he exercises all the seduction that this type of individual always exercises in history and in the theater. He is even endowed with a generous overflow of rich peasant humor. But he is also made to illustrate the consequences of this sort of temperament when it is not subordinated to some outside authority. Like all true tragic heroes, Chapayev suffers from an excess of self-confidence; and he comes to disaster when he refuses to heed the orders of the commissar from Moscow—the remote and abstract symbol of authority in the film.

It is not possible to enumerate all the things in this picture which contribute to making it one of the most magnificent that have ever come to us from the Soviet Union. The performance of Babochkin in the title role should become a classic model of what acting on the screen can be; and the same might be said for most of the other players in the film. As for the handling of the war scenes—the "psychological attack" of the White Guards in particular—it illustrates to what extent successful pictorial design on the screen depends on sharpness of thematic intention. The vigorous aesthetic pattern in the attack scene, for example, is based exactly on the collision of psychological forces in the story. In the Soviet Union the picture has taken on the importance of a political event—and for obvious reasons. But for the rest of the world it may serve to demonstrate how every quality of an artistic work derives from its possession of a clearly recognizable and intelligible theme.

WILLIAM TROY

[The dramatic column is unavoidably omitted from this issue because of the illness of Joseph Wood Krutch. It will appear next week as usual.]

The Nation

FOUNDED 1863

Vol. CXL

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1935

No. 3631

Contents

|                                                                                       |     |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS                                                                  | 141 |
| EDITORIALS:                                                                           |     |
| More Trouble for Ickes                                                                | 143 |
| The Letter to Mr. Biddle                                                              | 144 |
| Picketing Playwrights                                                                 | 145 |
| Two Years of Hitler                                                                   | 145 |
| Hunting for Hawaii                                                                    | 146 |
| ISSUES AND MEN, ON A "POLLYANNA OPTIMISM." By Oswald Garrison Villard                 | 147 |
| CARTOON: SITTING UP AND TAKING NOURISHMENT. By LOW                                    | 148 |
| THE HITLERITES ON HITLERISM. QUOTATIONS FROM THE NAZI PRESS. Compiled by John Gunther | 149 |
| "THERE GOES GOD!" THE STORY OF FATHER DIVINE AND HIS ANGELS. By Claude McKay          | 151 |
| TAXATION IN THE NEW SOCIAL STATE. IX. WHO WILL PAY FOR THE NEXT WAR? By Hugh Dalton   | 154 |
| RICHBERG MISINFORMS THE PRESIDENT. By R. G. S.                                        | 156 |
| IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter                                                       | 157 |
| CORRESPONDENCE                                                                        | 158 |
| CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE                                                            | 160 |
| LABOR AND INDUSTRY:                                                                   |     |
| Labor Ends the Automobile Settlement. By Charlton Ogburn                              | 161 |
| That Automobile Strike. By Samuel Romer                                               | 162 |
| BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS:                                                                  |     |
| Body's Freedom. By Helen Neville                                                      | 164 |
| All There Is to Say. By Louis M. Hacker                                               | 164 |
| A Mind Divided. By Mark Van Doren                                                     | 165 |
| The Sophistries of Sokolsky. By Arthur Wubnig                                         | 165 |
| Mr. Belloc's History. By H. B. Parkes                                                 | 166 |
| Drama: Elisabeth Bergner. By Joseph Wood Krutch                                       | 167 |
| Films: "David Copperfield." By William Troy                                           | 168 |

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

THE SINKING OF THE MOHAWK off Sea Girt, New Jersey, only a couple of weeks after the Havana grounded on a Bahaman coral reef and four months after the Morro Castle disaster, provides a final indictment in the total charge of criminal negligence against the Ward Line. In these three wrecks 181 lives have been lost. In each case carelessness in the ordinary performance of duty has been coupled with evidence of low standards of construction and maintenance. The Mohawk, it is true, was owned by the Clyde-Mallory Line and chartered to the Ward Line to fill the vacancy left by the stranded Havana, but the companies are affiliated and the guilt, if guilt is proved, will be attached to both. But the question of individual or corporate blame is a small one beside the larger issue of the standards of ship construction and maintenance which should be established by law for all lines. We do not need to await the end of the inquiry to set down certain known facts and conclusions—one of which is that a generous share of blame for at least two of the recent disasters belongs to the United States government. If the hull of the Mohawk had been adequately divided into watertight compartments, she should not have foundered as the result of her collision with the Talisman. The International Convention for Safety of Life at Sea in 1929 adopted safety standards among which were provisions that the hulls of passenger ships should be so subdivided that when any two compartments were flooded the ship would have enough reserve buoyancy to remain afloat. This country is the only major maritime nation that has failed to ratify the convention which our delegates approved. While all our recently built transatlantic ships conform to the highest standards, a coastwise line may use its own special hull designs, which need not conform to the requirements internationally agreed upon. Immediate ratification of the international convention by the Senate may save many lives in the future even though it cannot wipe out past tragedies.

THE JAPANESE INVASION of Chahar is ominous, not as a further attack on China, but as an indication of a Sino-Japanese alliance directed against the Chinese Communists and the Soviet Union. Nanking's assertion that a clash involving several thousand Chinese and Japanese troops was purely a "local affair" merely demonstrates to the world what impartial observers had long surmised: that Chiang Kai-shek has completely sold out to Japan. Rumors of an impending Japanese advance into Chahar have been circulating for many months, yet last November Chiang transferred 145,000 northern troops to central China. Of the troops dispatched no less than 50,000 were taken from the forces of Sun Cheh-yuan, military chieftain of Chahar. This action appears to have been part of a concerted move to place north China completely under Japanese control. A reorganization of the local government was carried out in December in which all officials suspected of harboring anti-Japanese sentiments were removed from their positions. At the same time a virtual reign of terror was launched against individuals and groups in the community who were believed to be anti-Japanese. Among those arrested were several of China's most distinguished educators and a large number of students from the Peiping National University. Particularly prominent was Professor Feng Yu-lan, dean of the Liberal Arts School of Tsing-hua University (the institution maintained by American Boxer-indemnity funds), who was arrested and taken to a military prison at Paotingfu because he was reputed to have delivered lectures favorable to the Soviet Union. In addition, two well-known generals who had achieved renown for their activities in the defense of Jehol in 1933 were wounded by members of Chiang Kai-shek's pseudo-fascist "Blue Jackets" and after being removed to a hospital in the French concession of Tientsin, were extradited by Chinese authorities on charges of Communist activity and executed.

THE PARTICULAR SECTION of Chahar which the Japanese have taken over is important only as a stepping-stone to further advance into Inner Mongolia. Should the Japanese follow up their present drive by occupying Kalgan, they will not only be in a favorable position to strike at Russia through Outer Mongolia but—and this is of immediate importance—will be able to prevent the establishment of communications between Soviet Russia and the newly formed Communist areas in Kweichow and Szechuan. For despite the optimistic bulletins issued periodically by Chiang Kai-shek's press agents, it is evident that both Nanking and Tokyo are seriously concerned over the success of the Chinese Red Army's westward march. Nor does one need to look far to see the basis of their perturbation. In their former location the Soviet districts formed a buffer between the rival forces of Nanking and Canton, and the two armies could be induced to cooperate against them. Once the reds have consolidated their power in the west, Chiang dares not send his picked troops against them for fear the Cantonese may attack his flank. Moreover, large sections of the population which are not Communist by conviction have come to view the Red Army as the sole defense against Japanese imperialism. As every new concession which Chiang makes to Japan serves to enlarge this group, the Japanese have been placed in the paradoxical position of being the true envoys of communism in the East. Unless the United States and the Western powers find some means of checking Japanese aggression, we may be faced with a gigantic social upheaval of which the outcome cannot be predicted.

LLOYD GEORGE'S CALL for a New Deal may land him in the National Government, but not because it intends to scrap its staid conservatism and meekly accept him as a Welsh replica of the Great Spender of the White House. All British developments these days are to be read first as preliminaries to the next general election. The National Government has chosen to remain "national," which means conservative beneath a thin outer coalition garment. But a garment consisting only of the National Liberalism of Sir John Simon and the Labor rags of Mr. MacDonald is embarrassingly transparent. If Lloyd George could be added, the coalition would be one of all capitalist parties against Labor. This year the twenty-fifth anniversary of the accession of the king will be celebrated with an outpouring of sentimentality of which the wedding of the Duke of Kent was a saccharine foretaste. While the mists of sweet loyalty are still in the air the National Government is expected to appeal to the country. But it needs to have a real coalition, and Lloyd George, though he can boast a record-breaking array of enemies, is better forgiven and absorbed than hated and left to exert his brilliant talents in the opposition. He can only be won over if there is some spending, and some no doubt will be ventured. A five-year road-building program already has been promised. But we shall be astonished if there is any on the Washington scale, or to the point of unbalancing the British budget.

CONSIDERABLE CREDIT must be given to the League of Nations for having found a formula for easing the tension in the difficult Abyssinian controversy. Although Teclé Hawariate, Abyssinian delegate at Geneva, was unable to force the League Council to take up his country's protest against Italy, his efforts were responsible for a compromise which is much better than could have been achieved if no League had existed. As a result of pressure at the Council table, Italy has agreed to withdraw its demands for an apology and an indemnity and to negotiate "in the spirit of" the 1928 treaty. While direct negotiations between a large power and a backward country bereft of in-fluent friends are unlikely to produce justice, they may at least prevent a war in which the weaker country would be suddenly absorbed by the larger. The incident is further evidence of the emergency of a new technique in international affairs; the old game is being played under somewhat different and more refined rules.

EXCEPTION IS BEING TAKEN elsewhere in this issue to the President's ruling on the controversy between the Newspaper Guild and the publishers. And as we write, the child-labor amendment is going through its periodical grilling at Albany. It is perhaps pertinent therefore to put the two things together and to remind our readers that the newspaper publishers—who are so very anxious that the question of their employment of labor be removed from the jurisdiction of meddlesome government boards—are the largest and most stubborn employers of child labor in the country. As Dorothy Dunbar Bromley pointed out in last week's issue, the Division of Research and Planning of the NRA proposed as an amendment to the newspaper code that the minimum age of employment for girls in selling and delivering papers be fixed at eighteen and for boys at fourteen, provided that boys of twelve or over already employed in delivery work could continue. It was also proposed to prohibit boys under sixteen from selling or delivering papers at night or early in the morning, before school hours. The newspaper publishers flatly refused this infringement of what they like to call the freedom of the press. The standards finally sent to the employers for approval permit delivery boys to work at twelve years, and provide that those ten years old now employed in cities of 50,000 or less may continue their employment. The minimum age for street sellers is fixed at fourteen years except in cities of 50,000 or less, where it is fixed at twelve. Delivery boys are permitted to begin work at 5 a. m. instead of at 6 a. m. as at first proposed. The thought of a ten-year-old child beginning his working day at five o'clock, with five hours of school ahead of him, is something which even the opponents of the child-labor amendment may find a little hard to contemplate.

WHILE MR. HEARST is conducting his campaign against subversive influences in the colleges, he should take special notice of that radical publication the Literary Digest. In conducting its peace poll of the American colleges, the Digest raises some extremely "un-American" questions. Through its prompting, 5,400 youths—18 per cent of the total—declare that they would not fight even if the United States were invaded. Only 20 per cent of the students replying to the poll subscribed to the favorite Hearst doctrine that a navy and air force second to none would be the best means of preserving peace, while a small majority favored joining the League of Nations. Lest Hearst be discouraged regarding the efficacy of his life endeavor, we make haste to point out that in the gigantic British peace poll still under way the results reveal an even greater international bias. More than 970,000 out of 1,500,000 voters favor remaining in the League, while 93 per cent desire the abolition of private profits in the munitions trade—a possibility not even suggested in the American poll. Although we doubt whether true pacifism can be either engendered or tested by the marking of ballots, we find ourselves heartily in support of the experiment when we read such a statement as that recently made by Sir John Simon—that “the question of war and peace is not one on which the opinion of the uninstructed should be invited.” The instructed, unfortunately, are just those whose opinion cannot be consulted; they lie beneath the sod on Flanders field.

THE REPORT of the Cuban Commission of the Foreign Policy Association just released might well be entitled “Cuba in Chaos.” After years of political and business dictatorship, backed or imposed by American interests, the population has been reduced to an economic level comparable to that of Asia. Out of this misery has grown a militant but thwarted labor movement which has kept the country in a state of constant turmoil. To remedy the situation the commission recommends, among other measures, a reorganization of the island’s economy on the basis of a more diversified agriculture and the development of small independently owned farms. It also advocates the permanent adoption of the principles of sugar control contained in the Chadbourne plan and the Jones-Costigan Act, with further measures to extend these principles by Cuban legislation. It recognizes, however, that no solution is possible without a drastic change in the policy of the United States. While the report hedges somewhat in placing responsibility for the overthrow of the Grau government upon the American State Department, the inference is nevertheless plain. Taken as a whole the report is scholarly and comprehensive, though we share the feeling of many liberal Cubans that its recommendations fall short of meeting the needs of the island.

THE CASE OF WARD H. RODGERS, who was recently convicted of “anarchy” at Marked Tree, Arkansas, and sentenced to six months in jail and a fine of $500, is not an isolated phenomenon. As usual, it marks the eruption of one of the numerous economic volcanoes which underly the surface of American life. The volcano in this instance is the whole plantation system of the South with its thousands of share-croppers existing at a level that makes the “subsistence income” of the social economists look like Coolidge prosperity; and the present eruption may be traced directly to what the AAA has done—and left undone—in connection with its crop-reduction program. Our next issue will contain a comprehensive article on the situation written by William R. Amberson of the University of Tennessee in collaboration with Mr. Rodgers himself. For the present it is sufficient to say that the central issue in Mr. Rodgers’s case is not anarchy but his activity in organizing the Southern Tenant Farmers’ Union, which admits both blacks and whites and which is attempting among other things to prevent the eviction of share-croppers. Literally thousands of these people throughout the South are in danger of losing what little livelihood they have because the planters with whom AAA contracts are made, while accepting government funds, are violating Section 7 of the contract providing that landlords shall keep a “normal number of tenants and other employees.” Mr. Rodgers has now been released on bail and three of the charges have been dropped (including inciting to riot and the use of profane language). But the battle is only beginning. C. T. Carpenter, a lawyer of Marked Tree, is defending Mr. Rodgers and the share-croppers at the certain cost of any future career in that section. Funds both for the defense of Mr. Rodgers and to prevent wholesale evictions are being raised by the Emergency Committee for Strikers’ Relief, 112 East Nineteenth Street, New York City, of which Norman Thomas is chairman. Meanwhile we suggest that newspapers in search of good dramatic American copy might well transfer a few reporters from Flemington, New Jersey, to Marked Tree, Arkansas.

More Trouble for Ickes

OUR article on Justice in the Virgin Islands of two weeks ago has been the detonator to explode the whole question of partisanship in Washington. Secretary Ickes, already on the defensive as a Republican in the Cabinet in control of a great volume of public expenditure, has been pushed back to perhaps his rearmost trench, and the patronage-passers are gloriously in the ascendancy. The part our article played in this is worth reviewing. Mr. Ickes, who is a subscriber to The Nation, was greatly interested when he read our account of Judge Wilson’s conduct in the Virgin Islands, part of his domain as Secretary. He wanted it reproduced for circulation in the department, and it passed to the press department for that purpose. The head of the department had a toothache, and his subordinate issued the article as a memorandum to the press. The rule in the department is that no press release is to be issued without the O.K. of the Secretary himself. Mr. Ickes was in New York that day, and The Nation article became an official release without the O.K. of anyone. Since the article had commented on the appointment of Judge Wilson through Homer Cummings via Jim Farley via Pat Harrison, and was now an official release of the Department of the Interior, it was construed as an attack by that department upon the men named.

Too late the department tried to recall the memorandum, and the storm at once became violent. Senator Harrison angrily promised to deal with Mr. Ickes in the Senate, and rushed to the White House with a protest, emerging to tell the correspondents what a fine man Judge Wilson really is. It became necessary to promise the House, then debating the work-relief bill, that Mr. Ickes would not be allowed to spend the four-billion-dollar fund. All the old grievances against Mr. Ickes flared up. Mr. Ickes returned from New York and promptly issued an explanation and an apology to Cummings, Farley, and Harrison, and there for the moment the matter rests. But explosions of this nature almost always produce changes in the landscape. A minor one, we hear, is that Governor Pearson of the Virgin Islands, a Pennsylvania Republican named by Hoover, will be either investigated by Congress or replaced by a worthy Democrat, or both. Judge Wilson might also have to go, to keep the victory of patronage-passing from being too one-sided. But the major change may prove to be in the position of Mr. Ickes himself. The resentment against him is really not because of his enthusiasm for an article in The Nation, but because he is grit in the oil which keeps party politics running smoothly. This frustrates and infuriates the politicians. Despite his shortcomings we regard Mr. Ickes as a great asset to the Administration, the outstanding symbol of its bipartisanship. If he should have to go—and perhaps his days are numbered—it will not be for his faults but for his virtues.

The Letter to Mr. Biddle

THE President's letter to Chairman Biddle of the National Labor Relations Board was both a left-handed rebuke for its intervention in the Jennings case and the formulation of principles to guide the board in cases arising from labor tribunals set up under codes. As a rebuke it adequately scored Mr. Richberg's revenge against Mr. Biddle for having had the courage to override him, the President's Number One adviser, in assuming jurisdiction in the newspaper case. Mr. Richberg has shown that he is stronger at the White House than Mr. Biddle, at least when he is heavily reinforced by the organized newspaper publishers of America. Unfortunately, he has shown as well that he is stronger than simple concepts of accuracy and of the basic democratic principles of government. For the President's letter is deceptive and dangerous. It is deceptive because it gives a false impression that labor boards under the codes are functioning and should be left alone, and so advertises the President's and Mr. Richberg's shocking ignorance of, or indifference to, the history of labor adjudication under the codes. A substantiation of this charge will be found in our Washington letter in this issue. It is dangerous because it attempts to set up procedure which would permit no appeal from code tribunals on findings of fact, and no appeal on the interpretation of law save to the President himself, who thus would assume both the judicial and the executive function of government. The letter does leave the NLRB the right to inquire into the constitution of a code tribunal if appealed to, and to decide whether Section 7-a has been correctly interpreted by such a tribunal. But it is then to make recommendations only to the President, and he becomes Judge, a minor matter perhaps but ominous if it reveals a new attitude on his part toward his future under the New Deal.

Now we do not challenge the authority of the President to limit the jurisdiction of the NLRB. He established it by executive order under Public Resolution No. 44. What he gives in one executive order he can take away in another. But his letter was not an executive order; it was a "request." The President asked the board to reduce its own jurisdiction. If the board does so it will be conniving with the President in limiting the rights which labor was guaranteed under the law, and the President alone will not have to take all the blame. But the board did not at once resign, and it has not yet shown whether it will voluntarily reduce its jurisdiction. For our part we see strong reasons for its resigning, though we know that the board was urged not to do so by liberals and organized labor in the hope that the air would be cleared by legislation in the present session of Congress. Resignation last week would have been over an issue to be clearly understood by the simplest of that great army of forgotten men, workers without real collective bargaining. It would have meant that the board refused of itself to deprive labor of rights already enacted into law. It also would have meant that the board refused to acquiesce in a practice which virtually turns labor adjudication under the codes into compulsory arbitration; and that it did not care to see the President assuming the power to be the final judge on questions of law.

Our Washington correspondent believes the President's letter was drafted chiefly by Mr. Richberg, who ought to know that there are no codes whose labor tribunals now bring in "final and enforceable" decisions. It is mendacious to give the impression that the NLRB, if it intrudes, is obstructing the operation of a working system. We are not interested in the technicalities, but we are interested in whether it is possible under the codes for a worker, penalized for union activities, to receive justice. The fact is that not a single tribunal set up by a code has made a single "final" decision which has been enforced by an agency of the government. Further, it is doubtful as a question of law whether any of these tribunals have the power to bring in "final" and enforceable decisions, as the President states. Mr. Richberg thinks the newspaper board has. The newspaper board itself does not know, for it voted on the issue and divided four to four. When Blackwell Smith, general counsel of the NRA, argued before the Biddle board on its jurisdiction in the Jennings case he did not deny the right of appeal to the board; he simply urged that the newspaper board should reach a decision first, which then might be appealed. But this is not the point we wish to stress. What troubles us is that the practice now outlined by the President gives the code boards the power to bring in findings without the right of appeal except on the interpretation of the law. This is close to compulsory arbitration, and it may be that the President knows this better than anyone else and wants it that way. But he would be advised to consult someone besides Mr. Richberg on this point, since the great body of labor opinion is and will remain steadfastly opposed to compulsory arbitration.

The disheartening truth about the President's entire labor policy is that he has stood idly by while collective bargaining was scuttled by resolute obstruction, that he himself has whittled it away, and that he even himself urged labor, as in the negotiations for a steel truce, to accept less than it possesses under the law. It is also disheartening, we admit, that the A. F. of L. is not strong enough to make its power felt, or wise enough to build up its power to hold the gains it has been given under the law. If it were, the President's chief labor oracle would not be Mr. Richberg, and the letter to Mr. Biddle would not have been written. But the question is not whether labor is strong or wisely led. The question is what kind of civilization the President is building. If the New Deal is to be an economic democracy, the President, while he would be wise in not becoming himself the leader of labor and in not anticipating a nationwide labor strength which does not exist, would not frustrate and humiliate publicly a board of law and seek to reduce its competence. He is touching here what should be one of the fundamentals of a new social order, and it can never be firmer than he himself allows it to be. We feel that the letter to Mr. Biddle was petty and mean in trying to give the impression that all is well with the labor tribunals under the codes and that Mr. Biddle has been obtrusive. But we feel it was much worse for betraying how little intention the President himself has of driving straight ahead to the enforcement of the law on collective bargaining.

Picketing Playwrights

LAST week the Theater Guild's public was treated to an unusual and engaging spectacle when it met on the sidewalk two protesting playwrights who were passing out handbills instead of writing letters to dramatic editors. The two in question were Paul Sifton, author of "1931," as well as of "Midnight," which the Guild itself produced four seasons ago, and Virgil Geddes, who puts on his own plays in a Connecticut barn when he is not writing pamphlets against Eugene O'Neill. Each playwright was the meat in a sandwich bearing the legend "The Guild Is Unfair to New Playwrights," and each was provided with handbills explaining their case:

It is generally presumed by theatergoers, critics, and playwrights that the Theater Guild encourages the development of new writers. . . . A glance at the Guild's publicity will show that it has constantly salved its conscience by buying script after script and then inferentially promising them as parts of its program. It makes no consistent effort to produce these plays. . . . How is the American theater to grow in quality and importance if the Theater Guild is allowed to continue its policy of making gestures to fresh talent without putting this talent before its audiences by way of production?

Just what the public thought of this new kind of picketing it would be hard to say, and the Guild itself has made no official answer, though its unofficial one probably is that it does not know what the protesters are talking about. A check of its record shows that during the present and the preceding seven seasons it has produced fifty-three plays. Of these, twenty-seven were by American writers, and eight of the twenty-seven were by dramatists whom the Guild was introducing for the first time to a New York audience. It is true, we believe, that it recently paid Mr. Sifton $500 for a six months' option on a play which it later released to him before the option had expired. It is also true that it still holds a similar option, several times renewed, on a play by Mr. Geddes. But it is, after all, only following an established theatrical custom. A producer undecided about a certain script sometimes keeps the author dangling without any recompense as long as possible, but it is generally considered fairer to make him an advance against possible royalties and to forfeit the sum if the play is not produced within the specified period. This procedure is called "taking an option," and no promise to produce is made or implied; if it were there would be no point in securing the option. Doubtless the Guild would be willing to release Mr. Geddes if he should find someone else anxious to produce his play, and, in fact, it did once release him only to take the script back again when the second manager also failed to act. Meanwhile it probably feels that it is at least doing him no harm by paying for the privilege of holding a play which no one else seems to want.

Various questions are nevertheless involved in the dispute. Some of them are almost too large to open because they could not possibly be answered by anyone not ready to announce a solution of the whole problem of the commercial theater and to define the extent of its duty to risk in probably unprofitable productions the profits which it must make if it is to operate at all. There remain, however, two separate and smaller questions: Does the established custom of taking options tend in general to work unnecessary hardships on the dramatist; and has the Guild been guilty of a specific injustice in its dealings with these two particular writers or with other "new playwrights?"

Many new playwrights would undoubtedly answer the first question in the affirmative. It is a well-known fact that manuscripts often languish for years in the offices of one manager after another, and that the dramatic author must put up with delays usually unknown to the novelist, who may generally expect a prompt yes or no from every publisher to whom he submits his work. But it is, on the other hand, rather difficult to see how the situation can be avoided so long as play production depends upon so many factors. Mr. Sifton's rejected play dealt, we believe, with Nazi Germany, and it is not unreasonable to suppose that the flat failure of another Guild play on the same subject, coupled with the equally flat failure of still another put on by a different producer, led the directors of the Guild to decide that the public was not interested in dramatic treatments of the theme.

As to the individual grievances of Mr. Sifton and Mr. Geddes, it is hard for an outsider to judge. They have every right to appeal to the public, but that public, however sympathetic it may be to new talent, is hardly in a position to know whether or not it would like to see the plays which the Guild has considered. Evidently the Guild believes that the public would not, and there the matter must rest until the Guild changes its mind or until the two playwrights find some other means of getting their work before the public.

Two Years of Hitler

NO single event since the World War has had such profound influence on the world as Hitler's assumption of power on January 30, 1933. An overwhelming majority of Germans will insist, in most cases quite sincerely, that the two years which have elapsed since that date have brought a unity, a spiritual and moral awakening, unprecedented in German history. Regarding the first of these assertions there can be little doubt. The two years have been utilized to achieve a consolidation of power and a "coordination" of all existing social institutions which have apparently made the Nazis secure from internal attack for a number of years to come. True, a certain amount of open opposition has been encountered, particularly from the churches, but in each case Hitler has had his way without making any substantial concessions. The one serious setback suffered on the political front was the internecine strife which led to the blood bath of June 30 and the subsequent disarming and virtual disbandment of the once powerful Storm Troops. Even this appears to have been accomplished without appreciably weakening Hitler's hold on the masses of the German people.

On the economic front the evidence is somewhat contradictory but distinctly less favorable to the Nazis. While they boast of having reduced unemployment from approximately 6,000,000 in February, 1933, to 2,350,000 in November, 1934, the actual gain, after making allowance for the number absorbed by work camps or otherwise employed at subnormal wages and the women and young people arbitrarily removed from the register, is believed to be less than half as large. It is true that the index of industrial activity has risen from 65 to 86 during this period, but this has been due largely to the expansion of the iron-and-steel industry and other enterprises engaged in "preparing for armament equality." Moreover, there are many indications that re-employment and increased business activity have been bought at a price which threatens to be exorbitant. The expansion of credit necessary to finance Hitler's rehabilitation program has tended to boost German prices above the world level, with catastrophic effect on the Reich's balance of payments. For the twelve months of 1934 German exports were 15 per cent less than in 1933, while imports—despite rigid restrictions—increased 5 per cent, transforming a favorable trade balance of 667,000,000 marks in 1933 into a deficit of 283,000,000 in 1934. This contrasted with a favorable balance of 1,072,000,000 marks in the year prior to Hitler's accession to power. Even after making allowance for the relief gained through the moratorium on foreign debts, the deficit in Germany's balance of payments for 1934 is estimated to be more than 600,000,000 marks, which can be met only by a ruthless reduction of industrial costs or further restriction of imports. Of the two possibilities, the drift is clearly toward self-sufficiency, with an accompanying reduction in living standards.

At home the price of Hitler's program of public works and war preparation has been paid primarily by the working class. Nominal wages have remained stable or declined slightly, in the face of a rise in the cost of living which is shown in official figures to be over 5 per cent and is reputed to be nearer 15 per cent. Total payrolls have not increased as rapidly as employment, indicating a decline in per capita wages.

It is not surprising, however, that Hitler's main defeats should have been encountered in the international sphere. Ballyhoo and pageantry were never calculated to be particularly effective when dealing with rival powers. The vote in the Saar plebiscite stands as the one conspicuous success achieved outside the boundaries of the Reich, and this was doubtless due to the thoroughly German outlook of the Saarlanders. Even in Austria, which is only slightly less German, the Nazis have fumbled every opportunity which has presented itself. In addition, they have alienated the countries which were formerly friendly to the Reich's desire for treaty revision. Alarmed by reckless Nazi statements regarding the necessity for expansion to the East, the Soviet Union has been forced into a defensive agreement with France. The recent Franco-Italian pact completed the disintegration of the former revisionist bloc and left the Reich even more isolated than in 1917.

Let no one jump to the conclusion, however, that foreign hostility is likely to weaken Hitler's hold on the German people. Dictators long since discovered that the best way of strengthening their position at home is through the unscrupulous exploitation of anti-foreign feeling. The spectacle of declining exports may yet force a shift in policy, but it will not provoke an uprising against Nazi rule. This does not mean, of course, that the Germans have an insatiable appetite for such inanities as are quoted elsewhere in this issue. High-powered political evangelism may serve as the stock in trade of a party struggling to achieve power, but it becomes merely ridiculous when utilized by a party in power to cover up its shortcomings. The so-called spiritual awakening is, after all, little more than a frenzy of nationalistic emotion which can scarcely be expected to endure. Already we find Hitler depending less on propaganda and more on the army as the basis of his rule. This tendency may be interpreted as a first sign of approaching decay, but for the time being it represents unquestioned power.

Hunting for Hawaii

WE have discovered a game especially designed for unhappy Americans who sit in the dentists' waiting-rooms confronted with one extraction and a half-hour of leisure. It is called Hunting for Hawaii and can be played by one or more people with almost any magazine. In last week's issue of The Nation Leslie Ford outlined the campaign of publicity masquerading as non-advertising matter by which the Pan-Pacific Press Bureau, in behalf of the Hawaiian sugar planters, is attempting to defeat the Jones-Costigan Act by asserting that Hawaii is part of the United States. We had just sent the magazine to press with its burden of exposure and were attempting to forget about Hawaii and the chicanery of sugar planters when we sank into a waiting-room chair and picked up House and Garden for January. Hawaiian Adventure in Houses and Gardens ran the title of the leading article, by Margaret McElroy. We quote three sentences:

... I saw a decorating idea on the outside of the hotel that could well be transplanted to houses in other sunny portions of the United States. ... Two pages of this smart Hawaiian furniture will appear in the next issue of House and Garden. ... Decoration in Honolulu—this westernmost city of the United States—is as varied and exciting as the gardens.

It should be added that the February issue did contain two pages of smart Hawaiian furniture. It also contained a smart full-page advertisement, in gorgeous colors, outlining the delights of a Hawaiian vacation. In Harper's Bazaar for January Robert Mack describes the "Tang of Hawaii" in glowing sentences. In fact his language is so other-worldly that this sentence in his penultimate paragraph seems somewhat incongruous.

Although [these islands] are part of the United States, none of our jangle is evident.

It is a very short article, although the photographs are large and beautiful. In the same issue is a quarter-page advertisement of Hawaiian pineapple juice, not in color.

House Beautiful for January contains an article by George Tichenor called Invitation to Hawaii, in which he, too, ingenuously refers to "the Hawaiian Islands—the southernmost point of the United States." Our game was interrupted at this point, but we hope we have indicated its fascination. We urge our readers to take it up—and to the one who collects the largest number of statements (not labeled advertisements) that Hawaii is part of the United States we will present a large Hawaiian pineapple handsomely engraved.

Issues and Men

On a "Pollyanna Optimism"

THE writer of this series has again been accused, in one of the numerous letters that come to him in praise or criticism of his writings, of indulging in a "Pollyanna optimism." He has been urged to "wake out of his Rip Van Winkle sleep" and realize some of the hard facts of life—"that there is no Santa Claus, and that babies do not come by means of storks." Well, the complaint is not new; curiously enough, I am always being accused of being either a complete and hopeless pessimist or a doddering and rapidly aging optimist. I never seem to occupy any middle ground in the estimation of my critics.

None the less, I want once more to subject myself to denunciation as an impossible optimist by pointing out as a basis for cheer and encouragement, certain facts, certain events that happened within one week, in a stupid and almost hopeless world, which ever since 1914 has seemed bent upon suicide. Here they are. President Roosevelt sent a message to Congress asking adoption of his plan for permanent unemployment insurance, old-age pensions, and benefits to needy mothers and children. On the same day Prime Minister Bennett of Canada, through the Governor-General's speech from the throne, announced in Ottawa that reform measures would be submitted to the Canadian Parliament "as part of a comprehensive program designed to remedy the social and economic injustices now prevailing, and insure to all classes and parts of the country a greater equality in the distribution of the benefits of the capitalist system." The measures proposed relate to unemployment, sickness, and old-age insurance for the worker, minimum-wage and maximum-hour laws, taxation more in conformance with ability to pay, protection of the investing public against exploitation, safeguarding of the consumer and primary producer against unfair trading practices, and regulation of "concentration in production and distribution in the interest of the public."

In addition, on the same day Lloyd George, with the support of Philip Snowden, started his campaign for a New Deal in England. He began by saying: "I take my hat off to the American President because he is a man of rare courage." He added a little later: "President Roosevelt started out with recovery but soon learned that a new order is necessary. Premier Bennett of Canada has made the same discovery." Now I ask—in my best Pollyanna manner—whether three such happenings on a single day do not afford ground for the belief that we are progressing. Of course I realize just what kind of politician Mr. Lloyd George is and always has been, and I find I have a good deal of sympathy with the London Daily Herald, which sees little that is radical and only a "small and modest program of reform" in Lloyd George's utterances. They are somewhat ambiguous, these proposals, but can anyone deny that they lead in the right direction? I am realistic enough, too, to know that Premier Bennett has been frightened into his reform plans by the evident threat of a Liberal success in the coming parliamentary elections. But again I say it is extraordinarily stimulating to see the head of the Conservative Party in Canada taking over a large part of Roosevelt's New Deal, about which our American conservatives have been so exercised, and proposing to enact it into law for the benefit of the people. I don't care a fig for the Premier's motives, nor shall I stop to measure exactly the amount of progress and social justice that his program promises. I am content to record that he is orienting Canada along new lines and bringing some cheer to the masses.

And similarly as to President Roosevelt's proposals. I know that they are less than half a loaf. To all social workers and students of our present conditions they are disappointing. The idea of suggesting only a $4,900,000 appropriation for unemployment insurance in the fiscal year 1936 and on the same day asking of Congress an immediate appropriation of $5,000,000 for the construction of a giant dirigible to cross the Atlantic, when we know how easily these dirigibles can be wrecked! All in all the Roosevelt security program is one of the weakest ever presented in this field in any important country. And yet I am thrilled by it; I am full of enthusiasm and unashamed. For it is a great entering wedge. It establishes the principle of the responsibility of the state for these things. When I look back on all the years that some of us have been advocating the assumption of this responsibility, I feel I have a right to cheer. I never expected to live to see this beginning made in even one field; to have it undertaken in three fields at once is astounding, indeed. It is all the more so if one remembers that there was nothing whatever in President Roosevelt's electoral campaign or in the Democratic platform of 1932 to give us the slightest expectation that he would lead the country in this direction. As one who has always asked for a full loaf in the field of human justice, I propose to have a thoroughly good time when I get a fraction of that loaf, for I know how stupid are nations, how timid are our political leaders, how foolish and worse our big business rulers.

Was it merely an accident that three such programs came out in these countries on the very same day? I don't think so. I believe that these are signs of the turning of the tide. It is certainly proof that three great democratic countries have come to realize that at least in some degree they have got to put their houses in order if they are going to head off the twin menaces of fascism and communism. There is only one way they can do it, and that is by proving that democracy contains within itself the power to remove the monstrous mass of special privilege, injustice, and economic inequality which has produced such gross evils as to make many men doubt the ability of the democratic system to grapple with modern capitalism and the machine age. Not rejoice at this? Why, anyone who doesn't is no friend to democracy or humanity.

Bruce Garrison Villard

A Cartoon by LOW

SITTING UP AND TAKING NOURISHMENT.

Copyright by the Inter-Europa Press.

The Hitlerites on Hitlerism

Quotations from the Nazi Press

Compiled by JOHN GUNTHER

Religion

CHRIST cannot possibly have been a Jew. I don't have to prove that scientifically. It is a fact.—DR. GOEBBELS, Minister of Propaganda.

Hitler is a new, a greater, and a more powerful Jesus Christ.—ALOIS SPANIOL, leader of the Nazis in the Saar.

The Pope is a Jew whose real name is Lippmann.—Völkische Beobachter, official Nazi newspaper.

Though their historical forms come from the Orient, all religions are derived from German monotheism, because the Nordic race originated religion.—PROFESSOR HERMANN HOLLANDER, Nazi theologian.

Adolf Hitler is the real Holy Ghost.—DR. KERRL, chairman of the Prussian Diet.

Roman Catholics are the black vultures of German nationalism and the drummers of discord in the German nation. We will not stop until we have scratched them out of the lives of the German people.—STORM TROOP LEADER AMMERLAHN.

The creator of mankind appeared 2,000 years ago in the form of Christ. Today God reveals himself to the German people again in the form of Hitler.—Welt des Kaufmanns, trade paper.

In its newly begun chapter of history, the German people has elected Adolf Hitler as its champion before God.—DR. FRANK, Reichscommissar for Justice.

Art

When I hear the word "culture," I pick up my revolver.—HANS JOHST, president of the poet's academy.

Morals

National Socialism welcomes everything that tends to maintain the race on a healthy Aryan standard. It is quite immaterial whether the children are legitimate or illegitimate.—Deutsche Textil-Arbeiter, trade journal.

The Germans have no feeling of guilt or that they are born sinners. Even if the German sins he does not lose direct connection with God.—PROFESSOR FREDERICK HAUER, of Tübingen University.

I treasure an ordinary prostitute above a married Jewess.—DR. GOEBBELS, Minister of Propaganda.

Phonetics

Generally speaking, the Nordic race alone can emit sounds of untroubled clearness, whereas among non-Nordic men and races the pronunciation is impure, the individual sounds are more confused and like the noises made by animals, such as barking, snoring, sniffing, squeaking.

That birds can learn to talk better than other animals is explained by the fact that their mouths are Nordic in structure—that is, high, narrow, and short-tongued. The shape of the Nordic gum allows a superior movement of the tongue.—HERMANN GAUCH, in "Neue Grundlagen der Rassenforschung."

Foreign Affairs

Our Brown Shirts saved France from bolshevism, and even now with its Stavisky scandal and Paris street riots, things are not in order there.—DR. GOEBBELS, Minister of Propaganda.

No land in Europe is so dominated by Jews as England is, and yet England hardly realizes it. Queen Victoria carefully guarded the documents that purported to prove her descent from King David. . . . For many years the highest government appointments have been held by Jews. Among the great newspapers in Jewish hands are the Daily Welsh [sic] and the Sunday [sic].—Der Stürmer, Nürnberg.

Germany must no longer be the world's spittoon.—PRINCE AUGUST WILHELM, grandson of the ex-Kaiser.

Anthropology

If non-Nordics are more closely allied to monkeys and apes than to Nordics, why is it possible for them to mate with Nordics and not with apes? The answer is this. It has not been proved that non-Nordics cannot mate with apes.—HERMANN GAUCH, op. cit.

War and Peace

From St. Stephen's Church in Vienna to the Strasbourg cathedral in Lorraine, from the ancient church of the Teutonic Knights in Riga, the chimes do not ring out in unison with these bells of the German cathedral of Aachen. The work is not yet finished. The eagle does not yet stretch its wings from Aachen to Vienna, from the gates of Burgundy to the German sea in the Near East, from the Alps to the coast. But the work will be finished.—VON LUNINCK, provincial governor of the Rhineland.

The true citizen of the Reich believes with fiery zeal and faith that the German Reich has been recreated in its purest and most perfect form, and that we Germans will once more place our seal and stamp on the peoples of the world.—JOSEF WEHNER, in "Das Unsterbliche Reich."

For the church, the word "peace" does not necessarily mean the opposite of "war." We have been too much a church of peace.—REICHSBISHOP DR. MÜLLER, head of the German Christian Church.

Pacifism is cowardice on principle—not a theory of life but a defect in character.—The late CAPTAIN RÖHM.

It must be thoroughly understood that our lost lands will never be won back by solemn appeals to the good Lord, nor by pious hopes in the League of Nations, but only by the force of arms. . . . Almighty God, bless our arms!—ADOLF HITLER, "Mein Kampf."

Philology

The name "Goebbels" calls to mind a magnificent trait in German life—hospitality and generosity. "Goebbels" is a diminutive derived from the verb "geben" (give). . . . It is remarkable that the name "Göring" includes the syllable "ker" or "ger," which means the lance of the great God Thor.

"Röhm" comes from the ancient "hroum" or "glory." "Frick" comes from an ancient German word meaning "security." The name of the new Minister of Justice, Frank, means "free and capable."—E. SCHMIDT FALK, in the Völkische Beobachter.

History

Frederick the Great was the first Nazi.—DR. SCHACHT, president of the Reichsbank.

Result of new research: Jesus was Aryan on both parents' sides.—New Nazi pamphlet, "Die Herkunft Jesu."

An Adolf Hitler comes only once in history.—DR. FRANK, Reichscommissar for Justice.

Jews

The Jew means the same to the white races morally as plague, consumption, and syphilis mean to humanity hygienically.—WILHELM KUBE, one of the pioneers of the Nazi movement, in Westfälische Landes-Zeitung, May 21, 1934.

You must follow the example of Dr. Goebbels when a Jew chances to address a remark to you. First, act as if you do not hear him and gaze over his head as if looking for the distant land of Canaan. If he repeats the remark, look him straight in the eye and say nothing. If that is not sufficient and he addresses you a third time, inspect him slowly from head to foot as if he were a strange and curious animal.—Instructions in Der Angriff, official Nazi organ.

The Jews are a nation of outcasts. Crime is their calling.—Der Stürmer, Nürnberg.

References have been cropping up from time to time charging that the British Foreign Minister, Sir John Simon, is Jewish. This must stop. Simon is not a Jew.—Order of Ministry of Propaganda.

It [Judaism in theaters, etc.] was pestilence, spiritual pestilence, worse than the Black Death.—ADOLF HITLER, "Mein Kampf."

Pedagogy

Throwing the grenades was rather fatiguing, but it amused us very much. The lesson lasted an hour. We were given wooden imitations of hand grenades weighing 800 grams. We were told just how to handle them and how best to throw them from all positions.—Letter from a member of the Hitler Youth in Dortmund General Anzeiger.

"Attention! Eyes right! Forward march!" A four-year-old boy was leading two three-year-olds in the correct formation of the Storm Troops. . . . In German youth the spirit of the soldier, always latent, has awakened.—Frankfort Nachrichten.

We begin with the child as soon as he is three years old. As soon as he begins to think, he gets a little flag put in his hand, then follows the school, the Hitler Jugend, the S. A., and military training. We do not let him go; and when all this is past, then comes the Arbeitsfront and takes him up again and doesn't let him go till the grave, whether he likes it or not.—DR. ROBERT LEY, chief of Nazi trade unions.

Medicine

If what we have done here is insanity, then insanity becomes me.—GENERAL GÖRING to a conference of the foreign press.

Sport

The German chess league sends its patron, Dr. Goebbels, reverent greetings and vows its cooperation in the creation of the German national community.—HERR ZANDER, chess leader.

The idea of German gymnastics is aimed not only at the growth of the individual but deliberately at the culture of pan-Germanism.—FOREIGN MINISTER BARON NEURATH.

Science

Mathematics is a heroic science which reduces chaos to order; National Socialism has the same task and demands the same qualities; thus the spiritual connection between them.—Conference of Berlin Mathematicians.

The centrifugal handwriting of the Aryan race and the tendency to write up the page is a sign of creative and expansionist force. . . .—General Anzeiger, Berlin.

Proper breathing is a means of acquiring heroic national mentality. The art of breathing was formerly characteristic of true Aryanism and known to all Aryan leaders. . . . Let the people again practice the old Aryan wisdom.—Berlin Weltpolitische Rundschau.

Economics

Economic life is derived from labor and not from capital or credit. Certainly not from credit. If it was derived from credit, why, then, did God hand Adam a spade when he turned him out of the garden of Eden, and not a home-loan bank?—STAATSKOMMISSAR DR. LIPPERT.

Justice

If any persons offer resistance to the national revolution, these fools and criminals will be extirpated.—DR. WAGNER, former Bavarian Minister of Justice.

The consideration of political factors ought to be the essential condition in every trial.—DR. ALFRED ROSENBERG, head of the foreign-affairs section of the Nazi Party.

Women

The absence of all-round abilities in women is directly to be attributed to the fact that woman is vegetative.

Actually in their deepest consciousness these emancipated females want nothing else than the chance to live at the expense of man.—DR. ROSENBERG.

Miscellaneous

The idea of National Socialism is an accomplishment of the human soul that ranks with the Parthenon, the Sistine Madonna, and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven.—DR. ROSENBERG.

Dr. Ludwig Cohn, after twenty-five years of service in caring for the blind in Lower Silesia—Dr. Cohn has himself been blind since early youth—has been dismissed from his post because he is not an Aryan.—Breslau newspaper.

"There Goes God!"

The Story of Father Divine and His Angels

By CLAUDE McKAY

THE most African characteristic of Harlem, after the color of its people, is the multitude of amazing cults. Native African churches (so-called), groups of Negro-Jews, and a host of straight Christian and revival sects pullulate in Harlem. To say that there is a cult to every block would be no exaggeration.

It is through religion, more than any other channel, that primitive African emotions find expression in our modern civilization. Indoors and along the pulpit pavements of Harlem, black men and women, some singularly robed, ecstatically prance and reel and writhe with a fervor that is tolerated simply because their exhibitions bear the label of religion. No Negro cabaret or Negro theater could permit the display of such very African antics.

Returning to Harlem after three years spent in North Africa, I had a queer, topsy-turvy sensation when I mingled with folk who were so similar physically to those of North Africa (and from the same cause—miscegenation) but in spirit so different, though they have precisely the same strenuous preoccupation with religion. My arrival in Harlem coincided with a big religious parade. The streets were massed with marching people, led by bands of music, shouting, singing, bearing banners proclaiming, "Father Divine Is God," "God Almighty Is Father Divine." Automobiles loaded with enthusiastic disciples were bright with pennants praising Father Divine. Spectators jammed the pavements. Excited black and brown faces, framed in apartment windows, beamed down on the scene. Suddenly an airplane droned through the clouds, and looking up the people shouted: "God! God! There goes Father! Father Divine is God! The true and living God." Never had I seen such excitement in Harlem except in the days of Marcus Garvey's Back-to-Africa movement.

Father Divine is God! With that one phrase Father Divine stands out above all the other leaders and their cults. God, who was invisible to all before, is now personified in him. He has created "Kingdoms" of Heaven in Harlem and elsewhere. "He is sweet, so sweet," chant his "angel" followers, "God, so sweet, Father Divine." According to them Father Divine is the source of all things. He gives his "angels" work, health, food, happiness, prosperity—everything. Accepting nothing, he gives all, being God.

Father Divine was a name unknown to the large public a little more than two years ago. As the leader of a holy-rolling kind of black-and-white cult, he was known only in Sayville, Long Island. There Father Divine had acquired property, upon which he had built a house. The house was called a "kingdom." He had lived there for about ten years. Actually he was supposed to be in retirement after many years of preaching. But some of his faithful white and colored disciples, mainly from New York, continued to visit him, eating, sleeping, and worshiping in his house. As their numbers increased, their presence disturbed the respectable white residents, and Father Divine was prosecuted for maintaining a public nuisance. That colored and white persons of both sexes were united under a Negro leader seemed particularly to incense the presiding judge. In his preliminary examination of Father Divine he laid special emphasis upon that fact.

Meanwhile the case had attracted wide attention, especially among Negroes, because of its white-with-black feature. A clever Negro lawyer with some political influence offered his services free to Father Divine. In Harlem his followers organized large protest meetings. At one of these meetings, held at the Rush Memorial Baptist Church, a leading disciple exhorted the assembled congregation to hold together and be not dismayed, for their Father Divine would sentence the judge to death if the judge dared to sentence him to prison.

The court was unable to elicit anything about the antecedents of Father Divine, since he insisted that he had been divinely projected into existence and had no record of his life. Thereupon the judge committed him to jail, to obtain further information and to have his mental condition determined by a psychiatrist. When the case came up for final trial, the judge sentenced Father Divine to a year in prison and $500 fine. Curiously, three days after the sentence the judge died suddenly. He was very old and had been stricken by heart disease. To the Divine disciples the hand of their Father had struck the judge dead. They even reported that Father Divine had said that he regretted having to make an example of the judge. The news spread through the country.

Father Divine's attorney appealed the sentence. The verdict was reversed by the Brooklyn Supreme Court, which ruled that the presiding judge had injected prejudice into the minds of the jurors. Upon being released, Father Divine entered into his apotheosis. Overnight his following had developed into a vast army. The man who had retired to Sayville emerged as God. He came to New York again and thousands flocked to the Rockland Palace to hear him speak.

"Peace!" he cried to them; "Good health, good appetite, prosperity, and a heart full of merriness. I give you all and everything." And his people responded: "God! It is wonderful! I thank you, Father." Such is the essence of the Divine message and the response it calls forth. And so greatly grew that response that Father Divine alone could not handle it as he had done at Sayville. More and greater "kingdoms" had to be created. Father Divine declares, and his followers believe, that he is in all of them at the same time. "I am here and I am there and I am everywhere," he says. "I am like the radio voice. Dial in and you shall always find me."

Fifteen Divine kingdoms are maintained in New York City alone. In fine buildings all. The finest is the former bath premises in 126th Street, now known as the Faithful

Mary Kingdom. Other kingdoms are in Jamaica, Brooklyn, and White Plains, in New Jersey and Connecticut. From Washington, D. C., to Seattle, Washington, centers have been established by Father Divine enthusiasts. Headquarters Kingdom, where Father Divine has office and residence, is in 115th Street. In whichever "kingdom" he eats, Father Divine himself serves his flock. The food goes through his hands before it is served. He pours and passes the coffee and cream in the grand style of a maître d'hôtel. And he has more dignity and naturalness doing that than when he is haranguing an audience.

The kingdoms are sanitary and apparently well managed. They pay their way. The secret of their financing is Father Divine's. Rooms are rented to individuals at a dollar a week, but there is more than one person to a room. In the restaurants meals are served for ten and fifteen cents. The food is good and plentiful. A good piece of meat and two vegetables cost ten cents; a piece of cake or ice-cream, five cents; coffee or soft drink, three cents. There are separate kingdoms for men and women. For in the kingdoms sex is proscribed.

The decorative motif of all the kingdoms is the apotheosis of Father Divine. His enlarged photographs dominate the walls. Large posters with black and red lettering proclaim his virtues: "Father Divine is God." "Father Divine is the living Tree of Life, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." "We all may take of the words of Father Divine, eat and drink and live forever." Other posters make a queer mélange of social and religious statements. They reveal that Father Divine is aware of social problems and that he has a special approach to them. Framed newspaper clippings advertise Father Divine's letters to firms doing business with him, from which he solicits jobs for his people. Also displayed are letters to the mayor referring to Father Divine's secret service, which is investigating racial and color discrimination and segregation in New York City institutions. One poster reads:

We the Inter-racial, International, Inter-denominational and Inter-religious Coworkers . . . as being called Father Divine's Peace Mission Workers . . . do demand the release through commutation of the life sentence of the Scottsboro boys, and other means of releasing the nine boys. And also we demand freedom, and extermination of the mistreatment of the Jews in Germany and all other countries, and we demand the equal rights and religious liberty according to our Constitution.

I thank you, Father.

Enthusiastic masses of colored people, with a sprinkling of whites, West Indians, and Latin Americans, make up the kingdoms. Women predominate, forming about three-quarters of the whole number. It is largely a middle-aged crowd. No prayers are said at the meetings. Praise has taken the place of prayer in Father Divine's religion. He often quotes: "Prayer is the heart's sincere desire, unuttered or unexpressed." And instead of praying, his people testify, praising and thanking him. Of music and singing and dancing there is no end—a riotous, prancing, antic performance that "it is wonderful" indeed to see and to feel. Loosely the women fling themselves about, with a verve and freedom that would startle a cabaret. They toss up their skirts and contort their limbs, dancing and singing to Father Divine:

I don't know why, I don't know why,
I don't know why you love me so . . .

You put your arms around me and you took me in . . .

With nervous, petulant gestures they turn from the men, the forbidden, and dance extravagantly with one another, colored with colored and colored with white. After they are exhausted from singing and dancing in chorus, they give individual testimony—amazing testimony, whether openly given in the kingdoms or privately related.

At Headquarters Kingdom I saw a little, wiry black man cleave through the jam to reach and kneel a moment against the back of Father Divine's chair. Standing up again with uplifted hand he cried: "Peace—O Father, thank you, Father, for what you have done for me. Father, I used to think I was smart. But I was all wrong and bad. I used to take the Jew man's furniture and then change my address and sell it. But Father, you showed me where I was wicked and I don't do that no more. And I mean to pay back all what I stole. And Father, I used to make the women pay. I was a mean feller, Father. Until I find one woman what was different and wouldn't pay off. And I wanted her, Father. And wanted her that bad I couldn't help falling for her. But I had to take it the way she wanted to give. And she made me go housekeeping together like an honest couple and I changed my ways and worked like a man. Then we both heard about you, Father. And we came to you. And you stopped us from living in sin, thank you, Father, it is wonderful. Peace. And you put me in one kingdom, Father, and put her in another. And you did right, for Father Divine is always right. But, oh, Father, she been coming to my room every night in my dreams. It was powerful awful, Father, and I was afraid and asked you to guide me. I concentrated on your spirit, Father, and last night when I was dreaming she come again and all at once you just descended into the room like a lightning bolt between us. Oh, thank you, Father. It was wonderful."

"It is wonderful!" everybody echoed and joined in singing: "All hail the power of Father's name, let angels prostrate fall."

From a mulatto young woman standing behind Father Divine's chair escaped a frightening yell. "Father, you did call me," she cried, "call me all the way from Seattle. Father, let me confess the truth that I had sinful thoughts about you, sinful, deceitful woman as I am. I imagined that you were just another colored minister. I said, Father can't be so different, he is just another one. For I have lived my life, Father, as a sample and example of a free woman among men and counted my victims. All the long way from Seattle I came, Father, thinking evil. And when I entered your presence and tried to fix you, you fixed me instead. You saw straight through me, Father, the lust that was in me, and you drove it out of me into the Gadarene swine. And, oh, Father, you were God in the place of the man I was looking for. You put your spirit in me and made me pure, one of your 'angels,' Father. I thank you, Father. It is truly wonderful."

California and other points west have supplied most of the white followers. An old man in his sixties said that he had left California doubting that Father Divine could be more than a prophet, because there is a passage from the Bible which says that no man can look upon God and live. But as soon as he saw Father Divine he was convinced that he was in the presence of God. And he immediately experienced a transformation from a mortal to an angel. He lives now in one of the kingdoms.

The skeptic part of Harlem's population, whatever its opinion of Father Divine, is excited over his success and the financing of it. Unlike other evangelists Father Divine never collects any money at his meetings; he delights in making a mystery about the source of the funds he uses to run his Divine Trust of large, well-appointed kingdoms, cheap restaurants (where hundreds of hungry out-of-work persons are fed free daily), and the splendid buses and automobiles which convey his disciples from kingdom to kingdom. He waxes sharply waggish when inquiries are made. He told a group of white parsons, professors, and students that he got his money from the Treasury in Washington, just like other people. At his meetings he jokes with his followers about "people who want to know where I get my money." "They want to know how I get my money. But you all know I take absolutely nothing." "Right, Father! Yes, Father!" the people cry. "I give everything, because I am omnipotent. I give you plenty of good food, clothes, shelter, work. And you are fat and merry." "Yes, Father! Thank you, Father!" the people shout. "It is wonderful!"

Graciously granted an interview, I could not ask Father Divine how he got his money. His white secretary had explicitly stated to me beforehand: "Father Divine does not accept money from his followers. Rich people interested in his work have offered large sums of money which Father Divine has refused, because he does not want to be limited in the conception of his work." The secretary also intimated that inquiries about the source of his income were annoying to Father Divine. I said that primarily my interest was in Father Divine's work.

In his sumptuous living quarters, African in the gay conglomeration of colors, Father Divine in a large easy-chair appeared like a slumping puppet abandoned after a marionette show. He seemed to have shrunk even smaller than his five feet four, which is not unimpressive when he is acting. He pointed to a seat near him, and said he thought he had said enough at his meetings to give me an idea of his work and mission. I told him that I was interested mainly in his ideas about social problems and inter-racial relations and would like a special pronouncement from him as a Negro leader and pacifist. Father Divine replied: "I have no color conception of myself. If I were representing race or creed or color or nation, I would be limited in my conception of the universal. I would not be as I am, omnipotent."

I said that I accepted his saying that he was above race and color, but because he happened to have been born brown and was classified in the colored group, the world was more interested in him as a Negro. And I asked him what was his plan for the realization of peace and understanding between the masses and the classes. Father Divine said: "I am representative of the universal through the co-operation of mind and spirit in which is reality. I cannot deviate from that fundamental. The masses and the classes must transcend the average law and accept me. And governments in time will come to recognize my law."

I drew his attention to an editorial in the Daily Worker referring to the demonstration against war and fascism, in which the Communists had paraded in company with Father Divine at the head of thousands of his people carrying banners bearing Divine slogans. The editorial was an explanation to critical readers of the necessity of cooperating with Father Divine and his followers, "carrying such strange and foolish placards." Father Divine said that he was always willing to cooperate in his own way with the Communists or any group that was fighting for international peace and emancipation of people throughout the world and against any form of segregation and racial discrimination. But what the Communists were trying to do he was actually doing, by bringing people of different races and nations to live together and work in peace under his will. He had come to free every nation, every language, every tongue, and every people. He did not need the Communists or any other organization, but they needed him. For he had all wisdom and understanding and health and wealth. And he alone could give emancipation and liberty, for he was the victory. I thanked Father Divine for the interview, and he dismissed me with the gift of a pamphlet.

The followers of Father Divine are always ready to testify to his divinity, the glory of the kingdoms, the sweetness of the fellowship, and the wonders of his works. But ask a pertinent question about the Divine finance and immediately they clamp their lips. That is something as taboo with them as it is with Father Divine.

Some cabalistic thing, such as exists in a secret society, may be at the bottom of this. The Divine disciples are called "angels." And Father Divine has said, "Denial of money is Angelship degree." Even those who have ceased to be followers will not discuss it. There is a story of a Negro petty shopkeeper who disappeared taking $1,500 of his own money. Investigating, his wife discovered him in one of the kingdoms, but without the money. Finally he was persuaded to return home. But neither he nor his wife will discuss the incident or what has become of the money.

Perhaps a clue to the Divine method of finance may be found in Faithful Mary. She was the first disciple of Father Divine. At all his big meetings she sits at his right. In striking contrast to him, her brown-moon face shines with a disarming other-worldliness. She is middle-aged, a fine-fleshed, compact, and balanced motherly woman. She testifies that she had been insane from drink for ten years, had been discharged from hospitals as an incurable. She was living soddently in the gutters of Broome Street in Newark, eating out of garbage cans, when she heard about Father Divine. She concentrated upon him, believing that he was God. He lifted her up and cured her. And now she belongs to God. Faithful Mary's sincerity strikes you; her story is convincing.

Father Divine's little white secretary, who unlike Father Divine does talk about the material side of the Peace Mission, had this to say of Faithful Mary: "She is blessed with the love of the people and they give her great gifts. They have given her houses to be converted into kingdoms, clothes, and automobiles. The largest kingdom in 126th Street was given to her." If Father Divine as God takes absolutely nothing, his first disciple, Faithful Mary, is not like him. And she declares that she belongs to God.

"It is truly wonderful," even as the "angels" of Harlem sing-song, this frantic, prancing expression of black emotionalism in the heart of the great white city.

Taxation in the New Social State

IX. Who Will Pay for the Next War?

By HUGH DALTON

London, January 3

WILL there be another great war? The answer lies with the peoples of the world, in particular with the peoples of the greatest powers. H. G. Wells recently said that if the American, the British, and the Russian peoples thundered in unison, "There shall be peace; woe to the peace-breaker!" there would be no war. Other nations, the vast majority if not all of them, would take up the cry. The power behind peace, both moral and material, would be overwhelming. No gangster government in any continent, no money-grubbing war-mongers in any nation, would risk being overwhelmed. Peace would be secure in our generation and, if our children willed it, in theirs.

I agree with Wells. If another great war comes, it will come because we shall have been too indolent, or too preoccupied, or too mentally immobilized through the influence of false theories to summon up our courage and to speak straight to those who plot against peace. If war comes again, it will come bearing all the newest gifts of science in its hand. Past wars will seem by comparison like innocent children's games. "If that is what the future is going to be like," said the wife of a college president who entertained me in the state of Ohio last spring, "I hope I shan't be here." So might we all hope. Nor let the citizens of the United States count on being able to sit safely between two wide oceans in a future war. Science is fast destroying height and distance. Death will fly fast through the stratosphere in another war. New York will have drawn close to Europe, and the Pacific slope to Asia and the innumerable isles, possible aircraft bases, that lie between.

If another great war comes, how will it be paid for? This is a melancholy minor question for economists to discuss, if on the major question peoples and politicians have given the wrong answer. Every war is paid for while it lasts by applying human labor and ingenuity, land and machines and stocks of goods, to the great purpose in hand. There is a vast diversion of productive forces and of new production from peace aims to war aims. A planned economy springs up, well or ill organized, with one simple object—to win the war. This economy is far simpler in conception than any planned economy of peace time, which must have, whether in Russia or under the New Deal, a multiplicity of objects to be jointly pursued and justly balanced, one against another.

In terms of production, then, the answer to the question is elementary. War is paid for by labor and materials diverted from other uses. The cost of war, objectively, is the mass of useful things, including personal services, which, had there been no war, would have been produced, but whose production war prevents, plus that mass of useful things, including human beings, destroyed by the actual processes of war itself. The cost of war, subjectively, is that immeasurable aggregate of human toil and deprivation, of fatigue and hunger, of freezing cold and blistering heat, of "agony and bloody sweat," of terror and hatred and moral degradation, which war scatters both among combatants and non-combatants, if indeed this latter historical distinction is not already trampled under foot by the march of science.

But round the garment of production there runs an elaborate financial frill, a decorative pattern of exchange, money, credit, taxes, and the like. With the advance of what we call "civilization," this decoration becomes ever more elaborate. We have left far behind the chaste simplicity of the self-sufficient family homestead. We practice, though often with political reluctance and deliberately imposed obstacles, division of labor, not only nation-wide, but world-wide. The "funds," as we call them, for the conduct of war are obtained partly by open taxation, partly by hidden taxation—through inflation of the currency and the depreciation of money by governmental action—partly by loans. Loans, again, are in part genuine, based on real savings, and in part a pretense, based on inflation of credit and currency. Loans, moreover, are in part internal, raised within the belligerent country, and in part external, raised in other countries, whether classed as "allies," "associates," or "neutrals," willing to lend and trade.

When the war is over, it is already paid for, objectively in terms of material damage and lost production, subjectively in terms of human values. But it is not yet paid for in terms of finance. If ghosts of dead men haunt the battlefields and the hearts of the survivors, so ghosts of dead deeds, of past financial transactions, haunt our economic life and our national budgets. Every belligerent nation staggered out of the last war loaded with debts. All carried increased, and some prodigiously increased, internal debts. Some carried new external debts for services rendered. Some, as part of the price of defeat, carried new external debts, for disservices rendered. These last were called reparation debts. And in every country, victor, vanquished, and neutral alike, some men had grown rich, and some exceedingly rich, through their financial operations during the war. These men were called in England war profiteers.

These debts have dragged us down into the deep depression of the post-war years. Internal debts, in the countries of Continental Europe, have been burned away by inflations. But these have burned away much else as well—the patient savings of a whole generation, the liquid capital which is the life blood of any national economy, and finally, as in Germany, human liberty itself. In England we have escaped inflation only to suffer deflation instead, advised by bankers posing as inspired oracles. Englishmen so far, less wisely than Americans, have had more confidence in the social wisdom of bankers. Deflation has increased intolerably the burden of our internal debt. All our amortization payments out of taxation and all our conversion operations, large though these have been, have hardly offset the adverse effect of deflation on our annual burden. During the war and in the early years of peace the British Labor Party advocated a frontal attack, without repudiation or social injustice, on our national debt. We proposed, first, a special levy on war fortunes; next, and more far-reaching, a general levy on a graduated scale on the capital value of all fortunes in excess of £5,000, the proceeds to be applied to debt redemption. We claimed that if conscription of life was justified to wage the war, conscription of wealth was justified to wipe away the war debt. Our plan was pronounced by experts to be practicable, and won much support from economists both inside and outside our party. We fought two elections, in 1922 and 1923, principally on this issue. But we were defeated, largely by deliberate misrepresentation of our purposes. Many who opposed us then recognize now, too late, that we were right.

External inter-governmental debts resulting from the war have had many unfortunate international repercussions both in politics and economics. Finally they have perished in the world economic crisis. Elsewhere I have written recently of their fate as follows:

The crisis is washing them all away. The "solemn engagements" of the Germans at Versailles in 1919, of Mr. Baldwin at Washington in 1923, of the French and Italians to the British government in 1925 and 1926, all these and many others like them are swirling down the stream, following, after an interval of some fifteen years, the promissory notes of the last of the Romanovs, which the Bolsheviks, from the first hour of their arrival in power, bluntly refused to honor. As regards war debts to foreign governments, we are all Bolsheviks now. Neat schedules of payments, running on till 1984 or even longer are now only scraps of paper. But for the crisis, and the increasing burden on unbalanced budgets of these tributes fixed in terms of money, this strange system of one-way traffic between state treasuries might have endured a little longer. It is better that the end should have come now. From the hour when the Hoover moratorium, nominally for one year only, was offered to a panic-stricken world at the time of the German credit crisis in 1931, it was obvious that the system was doomed.

However it may be with war debts, the ravages wrought by the war and its distortions of our pre-war structure of demand, supply, and markets are still deeply disturbing the economic life of the world. They are an important part of the causation of the depression, which still holds us in its grip. We are still facing many unsolved problems which derive from the last war.

So much for the past and present. What of the finance of a future war? Of the nature of such a war I have said something already. Some prophesy that it would be short, conducted principally from the air and ending in the early collapse, amid scenes of unparalleled slaughter, destruction, and confusion, of what is pallidly described as the "morale" of one or other of the contending nations or groups of nations. Such prophecies have been made before and have been wrong. The last great war was expected by some high authorities, both military and civilian, to last only a few weeks. It lasted for four and a quarter years in its main theaters. The "morale" of both sides seemed almost indestructible, and they remained almost till the end very evenly matched. It had been prophesied by others, claiming to be economic experts, that a great war must be short because the "fabric of credit" was so delicate that it could not stand the strain. This prophecy, too, was childish wrong. We cannot count, even in the conditions of almost incredible horror which science has made probable, on a short war. The chief hope, indeed, of shortening it—if we must, at least for the sake of argument, abandon the greater hope of preventing it—is to concentrate an overwhelming force, economic and financial as well as military, against any nation which breaks that universally binding treaty obligation, under the Kellogg Pact, to seek the solution of all differences with its neighbors, of whatever kind, only by peaceful means.

The chance of revolutionary upheaval, in the defeated country even if the war is short, in many countries if it is prolonged, will in my view be vastly greater in the next war than it was in the last. And of the outcome of such an upheaval only a Communist doctrinaire would dream rosy dreams. Beyond the bloody chaos would be only a grim question mark. It is fully possible that civilization as we know it would literally perish and only a handful of survivors continue to exist in a disordered primitive misery. Even if the disaster were far less catastrophic than this, the niceties of finance would vanish into history. The decorative pattern of which I have spoken would be roughly broken up.

The question is sometimes put whether we could not cool men's ardor for war by making war unprofitable for any man, by giving notice that in another war there would be no war profiteers, that all should share and share alike in ill fortune, that conscription of wealth should be part of the initial policy of every belligerent. I have little hope of such a simple solution. It is a false simplification of complex reality to suppose that most men have any ardor for war, until it comes, and patriotic passion enters into them. It is, still more emphatically, a fallacy to suppose that a large number of men plan war in order to enrich themselves. Most men, including so-called "statesmen," drift carelessly into the rapids that suddenly plunge downward into war. They do not steer their boat skilfully or turn aside in time. Their fault is not deliberate wickedness but lack of foresight.

But there are some men and some social groups standing in a separate category. Armament firms are such a group. Concession hunters in weak countries are another. These men pursue a policy which increases the risk of war. The state which desires peace must put its thumb on them. Armament makers live by selling armaments. They make most profit not necessarily when their own country is at war, for then they might be taken over and controlled in the national interest, but when other countries are at war, or when there is a keen fear of war leading to big orders for armaments. And disarmament, even a small instalment of disarmament, may ruin them. All the world owes a great debt to Senator Nye and his colleagues for their most revealing inquiry into this most subversive private industry. The British Labor Party stands for its suppression. Whatever armaments are needed should be manufactured in the states' own arsenals and dockyards, yielding no private profit to any man. The economic causes of war are a much larger field of study. I hope that in the United States and in other countries that study will be eagerly pursued, and that the results of it will lead to bold and decisive action by governments before it is too late.

[The tenth and last article on Taxation in the New Social State will be A Program for the Future, by Professor Paul Studenski, who planned and edited the entire series. It will appear in an early issue.]

Richberg Misinforms the President

Washington, January 28

A CERTAIN amount of sympathy is due the President for the inaccuracies in his letter to Chairman Biddle of the Labor Relations Board. The President cannot be expected to know even the simple fact of how many labor tribunals are set up under the codes. If someone tells him that out of 550 codes "a very small number—probably less than five—contain provisions for the consideration and final adjudication of complaints of violation of labor provisions" he accepts the statement as true. In this case the informant was Donald Richberg, who really ought to know. The letter shows convincing signs in other parts of having been drafted by Mr. Richberg. Now Mr. Richberg, who goes up and down the country talking authoritatively about labor policy and the NRA, ought not to say "probably" about anything so vital as a labor board, and should know all about the fewer than five boards he mentions. Since he has a definite theory that the Biddle board had no right to take jurisdiction in the Jennings case, he at least ought to make sure that the law on the matter is clear enough for the NRA and its boards to agree on it.

Newspaper correspondents have been harrying NRA authorities to find out which five boards or fewer the President was referring to. And NRA authorities—without mentioning names—are completely in the dark. They have no idea what the President meant or what Mr. Richberg could have had in mind in so informing the President. For the fact is that there are twelve codes which provide for such boards. There are, in addition, four boards created by the President, longshoremen, steel, petroleum, and textiles; and a fifth board like them is the automobile board, usually considered a Presidential board, though the order creating it was actually signed by General Johnson. In addition there are seven boards established by administrative order, that is, by the NRA itself, and there are three bipartisan code authorities. So there are twenty-seven boards in all, twelve of them set up under the codes. The code boards are worth listing:

Bituminous coal, Newspapers, Construction, Infant's and children's wear, Household goods, storage and moving, Electro-stereotyping, Photo-engraving, Printing-ink manufacture, Textile-print roller engraving, Trucking, Importing, Cigars.

The greater part of these twelve are unimportant, and Mr. Richberg may have meant "less than five" important boards. But this still does not make the letter into good sense. There are just two important boards, bituminous coal and newspapers, but they do not live up to the description in the remainder of the President's letter. The President, in telling the Biddle board to keep hands off, wrote:

Whenever, in an approved code of fair competition, provision is made for the consideration and adjudication of complaints of violation of the labor provisions of the code, and where a committee, board, or other tribunal has been established under the code to which an appeal can be taken and which is empowered to make a final and enforceable decision of such complaints . . .

The letter certainly leaves the impression that there is a working system of boards rendering "final and enforceable decisions" which must be permitted to function. In the bituminous-coal board the labor machinery defined by the bituminous-coal code (drafted by employers and employees in conjunction) in the main perpetuates the machinery existing before there was a code. It consists of six regional boards made up of one representative of each side and an impartial chairman now appointed by the NRA. Relatively few disputes ever reach the regional boards, since most are settled in direct negotiations at the mines. Appeal may be taken from a regional board to a national board consisting of the six regional chairmen. In about fifteen months the national board has held two meetings. All its decisions have been accepted, and the NLRB has never once contemplated dealing with coal cases. Here is a system of voluntary arbitration which, being between two parties of approximately equal strength and accepted in good faith, is working. But since the Biddle board has never "horned in" here or even thought of it, the President could only be referring in his letter to the Newspaper Industrial Board.

The affairs of this board are incredibly tangled. It is not, to begin with, a board operating under a code in the writing of which employees had any voice. It was drafted by the publishers, and the bipartisan industrial board, which according to the President is "empowered to make a final and enforceable decision," has spent most of its life in deadlock. It is deadlocked over the fundamental question whether the board has jurisdiction over Section 7-a disputes, the employees naturally maintaining that it has. It is deadlocked on its own powers to bring in a "final" decision. The employees maintain that since they were not consulted in drafting the code they are entitled to appeal. Richberg agrees with the publishers that there is no appeal. But the general counsel of the NRA, Blackwell Smith, who argued the Jennings case before Mr. Biddle and his colleagues, did not support his stand. Instead, he argued that the NLRB should not intervene until the Newspaper Industrial Board had come to a decision, when it could review the case on appeal. The board deadlocks on nearly everything as a kind of conditioned reflex. So resort must be had to a neutral chairman. Under its rules the board should maintain a panel of five of these; at present it has one, Judge Fred C. Gause of Indianapolis, and never has had more than three.

This board, which the President gives us to understand should be allowed to work without the interference of the NLRB, has had before it thirty-five cases. Definite action was taken in five of them, in every case by resort to a neutral chairman. Wage rates established by local arbitration were reduced in three cases by the chairman. They were increased in one. The Toniatti case, the only Newspaper Guild case ever decided, is the fifth instance of action. Toniatti was ordered reinstated. But his publisher, Generoso Pope, it must be noted, was not a member of the Newspaper Publishers' Association which drafted the code and named the employer members of the board. The Toniatti case likewise came up after the Jennings case, at the time the publishers were trying to persuade the White House to throw the NLRB out of the picture, and when they had an interest in demonstrating their "fairness" and indeed the very possibility of functioning.

The publishers on this board wish it to be an instrument of compulsory arbitration. Hence they claim the right to cite any of their employees before the board whenever there is a controversy or a dispute. They also claim that in any such case the decision shall be final. The employees hold that since they were not parties to the code, jurisdiction can only be by mutual agreement. But they also hold that the publishers, having set up the machinery and the terms on which it shall operate, are bound to arbitrate if the employees so propose. They believe that the publishers' claim to the right to cite any of their employees is compulsory arbitration.

A further evidence of the paralysis on the board is in the matter of 7-a cases. Here the rules of the board are that the admissibility of evidence requires a majority vote, after the chairman decides whether the facts in the case warrant action. The chairman is a nominee of the publishers' association, so the cards are stacked against employees to begin with in such cases; and even if this publisher-chairman recommends action, other employer members can block it.

This is the confusion as it existed at the time of the President's letter. The NRA at least, and probably the President, was aware of it. For today the newspaper board is being summoned by the NRA, and an effort is to be made to put it to work, which must entail the adoption of new rules. It remains to be seen whether in giving the newspaper publishers their pound of flesh—near the heart of effective mediation as symbolized by the NLRB—the President exacted from them a pledge to accept a reform of their own board. Even if he did, this would not meet the issues raised in the Presidential letter, for he obviously looks toward a system of compulsory arbitration with no appeal save on questions of law, and sets himself up as the final judge.

The question naturally arises as to why the Biddle board did not resign on receiving the President's letter. A good deal of resignation talk was in the air, and I can say that Mr. Biddle himself, at least, did not offer his resignation. He was importuned by liberal Senators and labor officials not to resign. The hope was held out to him that the real and free status of the board might be established by legislation. Certainly Senator Wagner believes that his labor bill will pass Congress. He withdrew one similar to it in the last session at the request of the President, and there is a growing number of skeptics who are not convinced that the President will back the Wagner bill, and who doubt that Senator Wagner will defy party discipline to fight for a bill if the President frowns.

Furthermore, the President has no intention of letting the Biddle board barge into the automobile crisis. His letter does not technically forbid it, but it was a sign that the Biddle board will have to heed. The A. F. of L. has finally withdrawn from the automobile labor board—after a much too long delay—which leaves it without any board for the appeal of collective-bargaining cases except the Biddle board. Continuation of the code is being negotiated and the A. F. of L. might consent to it if the jurisdiction of the NLRB were to be one of the concessions. If the negotiations fail, the Biddle board may be forced to accept the automobile cases whether the President likes it or not. After all, it is a legal board, set up by executive order defining its jurisdiction. The President in writing a letter does not alter that jurisdiction; he can do that only by an executive order. The Biddle board under the previous order has wide powers. It may review cases coming from other boards on the request of such boards, or when such boards have a difference of opinion, or whenever it deems that a review would serve the public interest. The President's letter requests the board not to act in cases from industries which have boards provided by their codes. The automobile board was established outside the code, so even if it existed, the NLRB could still hear automobile cases on appeal and not violate the President's letter. But the automobile board does not exist any more in law, since it was set up for an unlimited time by agreement between two parties, one of whom has now withdrawn from the contract. How, if the automobile workers appeal to the board, it could legally refuse to hear them is difficult to understand. And it might be that the Biddle board would agree to take jurisdiction. It might also be that the President thereupon would issue a full-fledged executive order forbidding a hearing of automobile cases. And then the board might resign, and the country might see what has become of the enforcement of collective bargaining under the New Deal.

It must be said in conclusion that the President probably will take some step this week, perhaps in a public statement or another letter, to mitigate the bad effects of his first letter to the Biddle board. It would be only natural that he should want to do so. He has in this episode publicly bent knees to the newspaper publishers and offended organized labor beyond the safety point of offense even to the semi-impotent. Incidentally he has chosen to play with the publishers rather than with the men who write the news. In a sense this means that he has chosen between the friendship of the editorial writers (though not of Mr. Hearst's) and that of the reporters and interpreters of news. It is not a realistic choice. The men who write the news are more powerful in molding public opinion than those who write the views.

R. G. S.

In the Driftway

OF all the senses, that of smell is the most mysterious and affecting. City dwellers draw deep breaths of fresh country air when they are free from their gasoline-laden atmosphere; the earth after the first thaw sends forth an odor composed probably of rotting damp vegetation but suggesting spring itself; sensitive New Yorkers shrink from the subway scent of garlic; and we are told that members of each race are offended by the smell of another.

* * * * *

THE Drifter is brought to these thoughts by reading in the works of Mrs. M. Grieve, whose "Modern Herbal" has been one of his bibles since its publication. There is probably no one who knows more about plants than she does; in the presence of such an expert, the Drifter puts aside all his prejudices and his tendencies to irrelevance, and merely learns. It pleases Mrs. Grieve to write about flowers of sweet scent and their employment in perfumery. Her pupil thereupon learns that perfume comes from the Latin words meaning "through" and "smoke"; the first perfumes were probably woods and plants burned for worship.

But perfumery for personal use is almost as old. It was old in the heyday of Greece; from Persia, from Arabia, from Babylon perfumes came, and sweet-scented plants were strewn underfoot or dropped from overhead or laid between bed-covers or done up in a little box and worn on a chain around the neck. At the great religious processions and festivals of the ancient Egyptians "all guests were anointed, and during the entertainment fresh flowers were used in great profusion—chaplets of lotus decorated the necks of the guests, garlands of crocus and saffron encircled the winecup, floral wreaths were hung all around the room, and over and under the table were strewn various fragrant flowers."

* * * * *

NOR was this merely a charming way of scenting and decorating a festival. Many scents were thought then and are believed now to have definite therapeutic and otherwise useful properties. We have only to recollect that we use camphor to drive away moths; that mosquitoes abhor citronella, cats love catnip, and—this the Drifter learned for the first time—rats cannot abide peppermint to realize how practical a part scent plays in our lives. Our custom of sending flowers to the sick probably arose not from a desire to beautify the sick chamber, but from a much more ancient desire to drive away pestilential vapors, as, indeed, to a certain extent even in our antiseptic day some of them do. A hundred years ago in England rue was placed in front of the judges in the assizes to protect them from jail fever, and the bailiff in certain English counties now who knows that it is the custom to present his Honor with a bunch of flowers at the opening of court probably is not aware of the time-honored reason for it. Like many other customs which have come down to us from antiquity, the use of sweet flowers and plants has dwindled from a powerful ritual to a pretty gesture. In the sickroom now we believe the bouquet less important than soap and water and iodoform; we wash our clothes and our persons before adding scent (instead of forgoing the washing, as was done in Queen Elizabeth's day, when the use of perfume was at its height in England). The Drifter has long suspected that all this washing, all this deifying of soap and tooth powder, may well be a serious mistake. Suetonius reports that the Emperor Nero spent the equivalent of $100,000 for flowers at a festival, and that on another occasion he caused the entire surface of Lake Lucina to be strewn with roses. With such a powerful adjunct to sweetness, it did not matter whether Nero washed himself or not—although he probably did. What we undoubtedly need in our subways is not more soap but more roses.

THE DRIFTER

Two Fellowships

In the hope of encouraging writers of promise, Houghton Mifflin Company are offering two Literary Fellowships for 1935, each carrying an award of $1,000 apart from subsequent royalties. All applications must be received by May 1 and evidence must be submitted that the candidates are persons of unusual creative ability and personal integrity. They will be expected also to submit samples of past work, published or unpublished. Houghton Mifflin Company will expect to publish the works for which the awards are given, upon their successful completion, on the usual royalty basis. Further information may be obtained by writing to the company at 2 Park Street, Boston.

Correspondence

The Apra Movement of Peru

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Few persons in the United States are as thoroughly qualified as Dr. Ernest Gruening to review a book dealing with Latin America. His conclusions toward the end of his review of my "Fire on the Andes," in which he treats of the Apra movement led by Haya de la Torre of Peru, are most interesting.

But I feel that to make his point he has slightly distorted my position by emphasizing my critical comments on Apra, thus putting me in the position of attacking it while he rises in its defense. He has confused my analysis with condemnation.

As a matter of fact, I stated that Haya de la Torre is the first great popular leader of national scope who has arisen during Peru's independent history, and that Aprismo, whether ultimately successful or not, is the beginning of a new Peru. I did not argue that Apra is a fascist movement. It is the most defined movement of revolutionary nationalism in Latin America, and I pointed out why such movements in semi-colonial countries defy the political tags of more industrialized countries. As I stated, it is a curious but explicable compound of fascist, communist, and democratic principles. It seemed to me more important for the American public to understand its causes, its components, its historical significance, its relation to the social scene and to economic evolution, and the probable results of its success than to praise or condemn it. Whether Haya's compromising of his program, which has alienated a good deal of his popular support and has gained him but little support from the foreign-capital group, the clerics, and the militarists, whom he hoped to appease, and which has caused a deep schism in Apra ranks, is statesmanship or opportunism I leave to the eminent New Dealer who is my critic. That Haya's attitude is not "doctrinaire" I agree heartily. Neither is mine.

New York, January 19

CARLETON BEALS

Are the Japanese Mandates Fortified?

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In your issue of January 2, 1935, you say: "The subsequent fortification [by Japan] of its Pacific mandates in violation of the agreement with the League further destroyed the basis of the 1922 compromise."

I am amazed that you have the hardihood to make such a bald statement without any evidence to support it. So far as I am aware, only two competent and disinterested observers from the United States have visited the Japanese mandated territory recently—one was Junius Wood of the Chicago Tribune, the other myself. I spent six weeks in the mandated islands in October and November of 1933 and devoted considerable time to an investigation of the alleged fortifications, airplane depots, and construction of naval bases. Anyone who has visited these islands and has the slightest idea of shipping necessities knows how preposterous these stories about naval bases and fortifications are. I went wherever I pleased with no restrictions or limitations, took photographs, and no one interposed any objections. I conversed with Japanese officials, merchants, fishermen, missionaries (both Protestant and Roman Catholic), and with the natives on all the islands visited. In this way I learned all that had been done or was being done. I saw for myself the actual conditions.

There is an over-plus of international friction without the gratuitous distribution of misinformation. And there are various things for which Japan may be criticized justly without resorting to fiction. It can be stated without qualification that Japan is obeying literally the terms of the mandate.

I do not know the sources of these stories about the nefarious actions of Japan in the mandated territory. I have invariably found that the people who are greatly incensed concerning conditions there have never been in those regions and can only support their statements by the ambiguous phrase "they say." The Associated Press stories ostensibly emanating from the League of Nations are not put out under the name of any responsible individual, nor are they said to be the findings of any authorized investigator sent by the League of Nations. They are strictly anonymous. In this connection I have discovered that certain widely circulated newspapers are not at all interested in obtaining information from persons conversant with conditions at first hand.

ALBERT W. HERRE,

Curator Zoological Museum,

Formerly Director of Fisheries in the Philippines
Stanford University, Cal., January 11

[While we welcome Mr. Herre's report as that of a first-hand observer and hope that he is correct in his belief that the mandated islands have not been fortified, it is interesting to note that as recently as January 18 the League Council formally asked Japan to explain "the disproportion which appears to exist between the sums spent for the equipment of ports in certain islands and the volume of their commercial activity." If such an explanation is forthcoming at this late date, we shall of course be glad to withdraw our statement.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

No Place Like Home!

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

May I say, for the benefit of your readers in the Northwest, how it feels to come home to "God's Own Country"?

Through the month of December I talked in Canada from Montreal to Vancouver. I addressed twenty-six meetings in all, held under various auspices and in all kinds of halls. Three of the meetings in Vancouver were held in public schools—halls seating from five hundred to eight hundred people, rented for $10 per meeting. During my entire stay in Canada we had no hall trouble and all meetings were held as per schedule.

On January 6, I was scheduled to speak in Seattle for the Friends of the Soviet Union. The local Hearst paper was running a violent anti-red campaign. There was a great deal of nervousness among hall owners, but a hall was obtained and the meeting was held. About three thousand people came out, and we discussed "The Economic Significance of Soviet Russia." The meeting passed off quite without incident. On January 7 I was scheduled to speak on the same topic in Spokane. The local Chamber of Commerce, assisted by the American Legion, closed every hall in the city. The F. S. U. secretary had to call off the meeting. On January 8, at Bremerton, Washington, I was scheduled by the local F. S. U. to speak on "Fascism, Capitalism, and Technocracy," a grotesque enough subject, in all conscience. The Board of Education rented the High School Auditorium, took a $5 deposit on the contract, and then, on the night before the meeting was to be held, called a special meeting and refused the use of the hall. The American Legion was most outspoken in demanding this action.

Out of my first three meetings in the "good old U. S. A." two were canceled on the insistence of the local business interests—an average of 66⅔ per cent.

The Commonwealth Builders, a local organization, has just elected a majority of the Washington Statehouse and Senate, and proposes to transform Washington from a profit to a use economy by parliamentary action. It would seem, however, as though the local business men might still have something to say on that and other subjects.

New York, January 15

SCOTT NEARING

Are Payless Furloughs Pay Cuts?

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

It was stated in your editorial on the LaGuardia administration that the pay cut instituted by the Mayor had never been revoked. The truth is that the reduction in pay instituted by the Mayor was a temporary furlough and that the furlough lasted less than a year, the pay of all city employees having now been restored to the level which obtained before the furlough. Of course there are a few exceptions in the higher brackets, where salaries of commissioners and some others were permanently cut, but it is not fair to describe this reduction in salaries in high places as a wage cut. I think the Mayor has a right to claim that he carried out his pledge not to institute any general wage cuts. It seems to me that a temporary furlough for less than a year, caused by a grave emergency, cannot fairly be called a general wage cut.

New York, January 21

A READER

1935—TENTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE VIKING PRESS

THE JUDGE AND THE PROPHET

Two recently published books have a peculiar appropriateness and importance at this particular time.

"The Curse of Bigness" ($3.50) is a collection of the private papers and important decisions of Supreme Court Justice Brandeis. Thoughtful readers cannot afford to neglect this life-time of wisdom of the distinguished social reformer, people's attorney and history-making jurist.

The Supreme Court is now beginning an unpredictable session, during which it will be called upon to hear test cases arising out of New Deal legislation. This intimate glimpse into the judicial philosophy of one of the Court's pivotal members will be uniquely meaningful to perceptive readers. It is a valuable contribution to a clearer understanding of this present, critical hour in history...

... as Thorstein Veblen and His America ($3.75). In this biography of America's most original thinker, Joseph Dorfman has written the history of the mind of a genius, and a matchless picture of the intellectual background of his time.

The events of each day reveal anew Veblen's uncanny gifts of prophecy. His theories are being analyzed by an ever-growing body of those men who are shaping our modern world. To understand Veblen's theories one must know the man. Mr. Dorfman makes both sharply clear in this biography which explains the man's works in the light of the man. Charles A. Beard calls it "Amazing for its excellence... indispensable to anyone who wants to know the present configuration of American social thought."

THE CURSE OF BIGNESS

THORSTEIN VEBLEN
AND HIS AMERICA

THE VIKING PRESS
NEW YORK

A full, factual account of the Nazi movement

A HISTORY OF NATIONAL SOCIALISM

By KONRAD HEIDEN

Dorothy Thompson says:

"Unquestionably the most valuable piece of work on German fascism which has yet appeared in any language. Especially valuable for the light which it throws upon Nazi origins . . . This is the classic work on the subject, indispensable to all students of contemporary politics, to all journalists writing about modern Europe."

$4.50 at all bookstores

Alfred A. Knopf, 730 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

United Front in California

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The trial of workers of this city for criminal syndicalism is proceeding in an atmosphere of reactionary frenzy stimulated by Hearst, the Bee, the Lions, the Elks, and other antediluvian mammalia. The prosecution argues that the contending forces are the American "peepul" and Moscow. Your editorial paragraph of January 16 argues that the contending forces are the agricultural overlords and the Communist Party. True, the prosecutor wants to outlaw the C. P. But the chief aim of the overlords, who are supplementing the state's salary to the prosecutor, is to smash unionism in the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys by sending to San Quentin Pat Chambers, Caroline Decker, Jack Warnick, Norman Mini, and other leaders and active members of the Cannery and Agricultural Workers' Industrial Union. The issue is one which deserves the support of every friend of organized labor.

May I add that while Leo Gallagher represents most of the defendants, Norman Mini is being defended by Albert Goldman, noted Chicago Socialist attorney, retained by the Non-Partisan Labor Defense. The latter organization has also bailed out Jack Warnick, who is defended by the International Labor Defense, and is raising additional bail funds.

Thus far defendants and counsel have presented a united front against the reactionary prosecution. If the united front continues and is aided, we may have a fighting chance to save the prisoners, head off a new terror wave, and protect unionism. One way to aid is by sending a financial contribution to help defray legal expenses; address James Rorty, Apartment 205, 150 Franklin Street, San Francisco. A strict accounting will be given.

Sacramento, Cal., January 20

HERBERT SOLOW

WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE

The Necessary Quick-Reference
Book for Home and Office Use
A Merriam-Webster

The best abridged dictionary. The largest of the Merriam-Webster abridgments. 1268 pages; 106,000 entries; 1700 illustrations. Thin paper, indexed: Cloth, $3.50; Fabrikoid, $5.00; Leather, $7.00; Pigskin, dark blue or natural, $8.50. Purchase of your book-seller or send order and remittance direct to the publishers, or write for free information.

G. & C. MERRIAM CO.
508 Broadway Springfield, Mass.

Not Even Supposed to Exist!

The SEX LIFE of the UNMARRIED ADULT

Edited by Ira S. Wile, M.D.

The contributors include Dr. Robert L. Dickinson, Margaret Mead, Prof. Ernest R. Groves, Mary Beard, Prof. Ernest W. Burgess, Horace M. Kallen, Prof. Robert Morse Lovett, Lorine Pruette, Morris L. Ernst, Prof. N. W. Ingalls.

"A much needed, candid, and sane discussion of one of the most important social and moral problems of the day. The book should create a real stir."
—HARRY ELMER BARNES.

$2.50 at all bookstores, VANGUARD PRESS, Dept. M., 100 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C.

Radio Censorship

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I am now engaged in the preparation of a survey for the American Civil Liberties Union on the subject of radio censorship. I should be very grateful to any of your readers who may know of actual instances of radio censorship if they would communicate with me at 1359 Broadway.

New York, January 15

MINNA F. KASSNER

Contributors to This Issue

JOHN GUNTHER is the Vienna correspondent of the Chicago Daily News.

CLAUDE MCKAY is the author of "Home to Harlem" and "Banana Bottom."

HUGH DALTON, an English economist and a former Labor M. P., is the author of "Principles of Public Finance."

CHARLTON OGBURN is counsel for the American Federation of Labor.

SAMUEL ROMER is managing editor of the Voice, official organ of the Mechanics' Educational Society of America.

LOUIS M. HACKER has recently published "A Short History of the New Deal."

ARTHUR WUBNIG is a student of economics who has followed closely the history of labor under the New Deal.

H. B. PARKES is a member of the History Department of New York University.

Labor and Industry

Labor Ends the Automobile Settlement

By CHARLTON OGBURN

Washington, January 28

THE announcement of the withdrawal of the American Federation of Labor and of the federal labor unions of the United Automobile Workers from the compromise settlement of March 25 last between the automobile manufacturers and the American Federation of Labor, and from the Automobile Labor Board set up thereunder, has been publicly made by William Green; the notice of the withdrawal had been previously given to the automobile manufacturers and to President Roosevelt.

As a result of the President's successful mediation of a serious conflict between the automobile manufacturers and the labor unions threatening a strike, this compromise agreement was announced on March 25, 1934. Under this settlement an Automobile Labor Board was to be created, one member to be named by the manufacturers, one by the American Federation of Labor, and the third, representing the public, by the NRA. As this settlement was without duration of time, either of the two parties could withdraw by giving notice to the other party. Public announcement of this withdrawal was withheld in the hope that a revision of the agreement could be accomplished which would permit its being reinstated for a fixed time. The formula on which this settlement was based, embodying proportional representation, was accepted by the unions with misgivings but as a patriotic act, because the President as mediator recommended it and because it was a basis on which the issue could be compromised with the manufacturers.

That the elected representatives of the majority should speak for all voters has now been positively confirmed as the labor law of this country by Acts of Congress—to wit, the Railway Labor Act of June, 1934, and the Joint Resolution of Congress, No. 44, approved June 19, 1934—and by the executive order of the President providing for majority rule, as in the order creating the National Steel Labor Relations Board and in the decision announced on September 1 by the National Labor Relations Board in the Houde Engineering case and a number of decisions of the same board and of other boards, based on the Houde decision, all subsequent to the automobile settlement of March 25. It is therefore futile for the A. F. of L. unions in the automobile industry to continue the experiment of proportional representation.

The United States government through the Department of Justice is seeking to have the federal courts enforce the majority rule announced in the Houde Engineering case. Organized labor is firmly and irrevocably committed to the policy of majority rule as essential to collective bargaining, and is strongly opposed to proportional or minority representation because it frustrates collective bargaining. It becomes manifestly impossible for the American Federation of Labor with its right hand to fight vigorously for upholding majority rule in the Houde case and with its left hand to support proportional representation. It is too anomalous a position to be sustained.

Automobile workers should not be the only workers in this country to be denied the benefits of the Joint Resolution of Congress and of the majority-rule decisions made thereunder, which really constitute a repudiation of the principle of proportional representation. Proportional representation should therefore no longer be the basis for the decisions of any labor board. The American Federation of Labor accordingly had no alternative but to withdraw from this settlement and from the Automobile Labor Board. It is unthinkable that the agreement should be in perpetuity, and that the automobile workers should alone have saddled on them forever the principle of proportional representation to frustrate their collective-bargaining efforts. The jurisdiction of the Automobile Labor Board was limited to questions of discrimination, discharge, and representation. It could not hear and pass on all controversies under Section 7-a, as can the boards created under the Joint Resolution.

Furthermore, the Automobile Labor Board on December 7 announced plans for an election in the Cadillac plant with the purpose of establishing "proportional representation for all substantial labor groups" in the plant. This election ordered by the Automobile Labor Board, without authority and over the opposition of the American Federation of Labor unions, precipitated a crisis among the automobile unions. Subsequently, the Automobile Labor Board, without authority of labor and on a wholly impossible basis, has ordered and held further elections in automobile plants, which accomplish no earthly good except to leave the workers without adequate means of collective bargaining.

I may add, furthermore, that the Automobile Labor Board has been extremely unsatisfactory to the unions of automobile workers; a large audience of automobile workers attending the NRA hearings in Detroit on December 16 actually booed the name of the Automobile Labor Board. These workers expected the board under its admitted jurisdiction to pass on the hundreds of cases of automobile workers discharged for union affiliation.

In the cases of twenty-four employees who completely proved that they had been discharged or laid off for union affiliation, the board had to make findings of fact to that effect. Nevertheless, the board did not order the reinstatement of a single one of those twenty-four employees, but either recommended that they be given work or ordered that they be put to work. Generally the jobs given them by their employers were of a less satisfactory kind than the jobs from which they had been discharged. The record of failure made by this board grows out of the chairman's conception of the functions of his office, which apparently is that his duties in industrial relations are such as might be performed by the personnel manager of a plant. His present antagonism to organized labor, despite his long career in it, might have been foreshadowed by his article on Labor in "Social Trends," in which he voiced the prophecy that the labor movement of the future might lie in the company unions. This philosophy has rather unfitted him for dealing in an impartial capacity with organized labor.

That Automobile Strike

By SAMUEL ROMER

Detroit, January 23

IF the United Automobile Workers of America fails to call a general strike of automobile workers in the spring or is defeated in such a strike, it will mean that the American Federation of Labor is through in the automobile industry—that it has proved itself incapable of organizing production labor in an important anti-union industry.

The A. F. of L. organization in the industry is composed of plant unions (federal locals), each separately affiliated to the parent organization but loosely united in a national council called the United Automobile Workers of America. This council functions in a strictly advisory capacity to the national representative of the A. F. of L., meets only at the call of the national representative, and generally is quite powerless. Thirty-five per cent of all dues collected by the locals is remitted to Washington. But neither the locals nor individual members have any control either over the national representative, who has the practical power of an absolute dictator, or over the 35 per cent. Attempts by these locals to band together in an autonomous international union have been frustrated by vague promises of William Green that "you shall become an international when the time is ripe."

Failure to call a general strike this spring will mean that after two years of intensive effort the A. F. of L. admits that the employers are too strong. If the strike is called, however, the likelihood of its success is small. In addition to the usual omniscient spy systems both within and without the shops and the formation of company unions, the organized employers during the past year have made deft use of the Automobile Labor Board and the NRA automobile code to impede and stifle any revolt against their autocratic rule.

Practically everyone in Detroit admits that the Automobile Labor Board is definitely pro-employer and playing the bosses' game. Thousands of workers accept the actions of the board as the Roosevelt stamp of approval upon company unionism; and certainly nothing that has been done in Washington with respect to automobile labor would tend to destroy that impression. The Automobile Labor Board was set up by Presidential proclamation in the spring of 1934 in an attempt to stave off a threatened strike. Until December it was inactive, inefficient, and useless. A study of 195 decisions issued by the board from its inception until January 17, 1935, reveals that in the overwhelming majority of alleged discrimination cases the board ruled either "no discrimination" or "the employer did not err." In those instances where discrimination was so obvious that it could not be ignored, the board did not admit that the employer had used "discrimination" against active unionists in so many words; it merely "recommended" that the employer rehire the discharged worker.

The personnel of the board consists of Nicholas Kelley, attorney for the Automobile Manufacturers' Association, Dr. Leo Wolman, representing the federal government, and Richard Byrd, a Pontiac, Michigan, automotive worker. Mr. Kelley is obviously biased. Dr. Wolman is generally regarded as the brains of the board, and he has been consistent in the tacit and direct promotion of company unions against free trade unions. Byrd, supposedly representing labor, can only rank as Dr. Wolman's office boy. Since his first act was to agree to unanimous decisions, he cannot, even if he disagrees with any ruling, issue a minority report. He has been repeatedly repudiated by every section of organized labor and has devoted his efforts for the most part to a still-born independent union, the Associated Automobile Workers of America.

On its way to oblivion because it was generally ignored by labor, the Automobile Labor Board has played its trump card—and stands a good chance of winning. Using the prestige of the federal government, it has suddenly ordered "collective-bargaining elections" held in the plants. These elections provide for the choosing of representatives by the different departments in the factory to meet in a body with the employers. Both the A. F. of L. and the Mechanics' Educational Society of America, a strong independent union, immediately repudiated the elections and ordered their members to refuse to vote. They pointed out that to place unionists in the running for department representatives would mean that these unionists would have to sit side by side with men representing company unions—a tacit recognition that these company-puppet organizations have a legal right to exist. The attitude of these "collective-bargaining committees" is well expressed by Elmer H. Gustavson, chairman of the committee at the Cadillac Motor Car Company. After a full day's session, for which the men were paid by the company, Gustavson announced that "there are a few inequalities in rates in the plant which the management is as anxious to straighten out as we are. We are working together for the same end." Gustavson revealed the real reason for these elections when he announced that the elected boards throughout the country would unite in a "national automotive employees' association"—an industry-wide company union.

The federal government may deny responsibility for the anti-labor actions of the Automobile Labor Board; it cannot deny its own responsibility in the matter of the NRA code. The automobile code is as rotten an egg as was ever hatched by the Blue Eagle. Not only does it nullify labor's right to organize through the infamous "merit clause"; its wage-and-hour provisions are farcical. At the Detroit hearings evidence was given that under the code the employers could legally make their employees work seventy and eighty hours a week, since the code provides only for a forty-two-hour average over a six-month period. A study made by the M. E. S. A. of wages received by the tool-and-die makers, "the aristocracy of automobile labor," reveals that the average annual wage of a skilled machinist is between $500 and $700.

The expiration date for the code had originally been set for September 4, 1934, but as labor prepared for a showdown, the White House arbitrarily extended it until November 3. As November rolled around, it was again extended —this time to February 2, although labor had been promised public hearings. At this writing, nine days before this date, no hearings have been announced, and it is certain that it will be extended at least another thirty days and may be extended until the expiration of the National Recovery Act. By that time, of course, automobile production will be in the doldrums and a strike will be ineffective. It seems obvious that, in the words of an A. F. of L. official, "the automobile industry is the diapered baby of the Roosevelt Administration." Or vice versa.

Any automobile strike must and will be political as well as economic. As a matter of fact, at a recent meeting of the national council of the federal locals one delegate seriously proposed that a general strike be called in the industry to force the abolition of the Automobile Labor Board.

Last spring the A. F. of L. could have evoked at least a 50 per cent response to a general strike call. But by delay it wasted its opportunity and let a wage increase and the meddling of Roosevelt postpone any possible action until too late. The immediate result was a great dropping away of membership. Thousands of workers tore up their union books, vowing never to reenter union halls. Unversed in trade-union tradition, these workers could only see that they had spent four or five dollars and had got nothing in return. During the past two months the A. F. of L. unions, under the leadership of Frank J. Dillon, have been making strenuous efforts to come back. Assuming a far more militant attitude, they have been organizing on the promise of definite action if the code fails them again. This campaign has met with a certain measure of success. In Flint, where a militant group had united with Byrd in Detroit in an attempt to form the Associated Automobile Workers, the group is back in A. F. of L. ranks convinced that the Associated was merely a masked company union. Ingenious tactics of organization have been resorted to in the face of the widespread fear of discrimination; in the Ford Motor Company, for instance, the men are organizing by number instead of by name. Although in case of a strike the A. F. of L. may be able to stop production entirely through control of key plants, it will not have the sympathy of thousands of workers in the many assembly plants in which the union has not even nuclei. The A. F. of L. strength is evidently concentrated in the Kelsey-Hayes Wheel and Motor Products, two key plants, and the White Motor Company, unimportant in the industry. Union strength in General Motors and Chrysler can only be guessed. A factor which must be considered is that it will cost millions of dollars to run a successful strike. Thousands of workers may answer the strike call; few will stick on the picket line unless their families are fed.

If a strike is called and the mass of workers respond, the horrors of Toledo and Minneapolis will be remembered as a kindergarten tea when the Detroit workers prepare to pull into line recalcitrant sections of the industry. Many of the biggest plants are in small cities, where the company controls the police forces. For instance, in the event of a general strike, it is probable that no more than a minority of Dodge workers will respond. This will mean mass picket lines in Dodge-controlled Hamtramck. The automobile bosses don't fool—the graves of five workers who dared to march to the Ford factory to plead for relief bear mute evidence. The challenge of organized labor will not be met with kid gloves on the part of the manufacturers; arsenals in the factories and machine-guns on plant roofs testify to the preparations on the other side of the fence.

It is unfortunate that the best-organized section of the industry, the tool-and-die makers, will be finishing off its program; a walkout of these skilled men will add little to hopes for success. The Mechanics' Educational Society, which finds its strength among these tool-and-die makers, will thus be relatively unaffected by the smashing of the A. F. of L. if the strike is lost. The M. E. S. A. is today the only successful union in the industry, having gained in prestige and power from two general strikes of the skilled men. It has been able to enforce a forty-hour work week for tool-and-die makers in the industry despite the code. Now an industrial union embracing both the skilled and semi-skilled, it will no doubt attempt the organization of the production workers if the A. F. of L. fizzles. But it will face the same united front of the bosses and the government, offset only by a more militant leadership and the prestige of previous success. I predicted a year ago in The Nation that the automobile worker was marching on the road to organization. He is still marching, but with a decided limp.

"Rioting" in Illinois

THE acquittal of fourteen workers charged with violation of the Illinois Treason Act—more commonly known as the criminal-syndicalism law—at Hillsboro, Montgomery County, has been followed by the prosecution of eight unemployed workers on charges of "rioting" at Carlinville, Macoupin County. Eleven workers were arrested on August 18, at Virden, a historic mine town, because they took the evicted furniture of Galen Sutphin from an alley to the city park, where a miners' mass-meeting was going on. The city fathers, who in oratory had pledged themselves before the surging miners' meeting, as "strong friends of labor," were embarrassed at being exposed as instigators of evictions. On the day of the meeting, when thousands of militant mine folks were in town, nothing was done, but on the following day warrants were issued for eleven of the militant members of the Virden unemployed organization. Eight of the workers were summarily released on bonds varying from $3,000 to $5,000, and the three others on their own recognition. They were told very vaguely that nothing would come of the charge. Once the November elections were over and the county Democratic machine safely in power, the prosecution almost overnight served notices of trial. The defendants, all believing that the charges would not be pressed, had prepared no defense or mass agitation and were caught asleep at the switch. They charge that the Macoupin County state's attorney, M. F. Seyfrit, Democratic boss, tricked them. The trial began on January 18 with hurriedly procured defense attorneys courageously working to save the accused, most of them mere youths, from penitentiary sentences. One of the most prominent defendants is C. H. Mayer, a leader of the Workers' Party, who was arrested with A. J. Muste at Belleville, Illinois, last summer. The prosecution has made no secret of the fact that they are out to "get" Mayer.

Next Week

Saving Cuba

By Carleton Beals

A Review of the Foreign Policy Association's Report, "Problems of the New Cuba."

Books, Drama, Films

Body's Freedom

By HELEN NEVILLE

From body's self the body cries release;
itself to shed
in unbodied space—

but weighed with its blood, dragging a pulse like a chain;
breath drawn up and pressed back
on itself again;

limbs that ebb and flow:
in this wilderness,
the pulse may run, the blood leap, the body
find its egress;

swell to its ends, flooding
sinew and thigh and breast—the body released, to fathom
the body released.

For body's freedom is bodied yet:
the absolute flesh
goes to defeat;

the crescent flesh
weighs like a stone:
the body flies
within the bone.

All There Is to Say

The Economic Consequences of the New Deal. By Benjamin Stolberg and Warren Jay Vinton. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.

IN a very real sense this little book says all there is to say about the New Deal; and it says it with such economy of means, the utilization of such a brilliant and at the same time forthright vocabulary, that one wonders what the rest of us, prosing along in pedestrian fashion, could have been thinking we were up to all this time. Of course. Not patient analysis, not detailed exposure of economic and social errors, but ridicule—a blistering, scornful, and honest contempt—was the rhetorical method that the Washington monkeyshines merited; but only Ben Stolberg, with the competent assistance of Warren Vinton, was capable of employing it. Almost every page—to the penultimate sentence on the last one, “There is nothing the New Deal has so far done that could not have been done better by an earthquake”—contains a wise and dismissing final observation, and proves what many of us knew all the time—that Stolberg not only is our leading pamphleteer but belongs in the company of the select few of all time.

“The Economic Consequences of the New Deal” is a pretentious title for a tract for the times; but the authors do succeed, within the compass of some 17,000 words, in exposing almost all the amazing and disastrous results of the Brain Trust's blunderings. The crisis occurred essentially as a result of capitalist accumulation; no thoroughgoing program of reconstruction, therefore, could work, short of the expropriation of the private owners of the means of production. The New Dealers, however, were no revolutionists but middle-class reformers; they were firmly convinced that the mechanisms of production, distribution, and exchange could be patched up once more. Their proposals were charmingly simple. The nation's consumptive capacity had broken down because of the maldistribution of income: naturally, then, redistribute it. The New Deal has ended by redistributing income upward. Economic and social insecurity was one of the evils of our time: safeguard the adult, the sick, and the old against unemployment, acute and chronic illness, and indigent old age. The New Deal has ended by saddling upon the workers themselves—through its failure to provide for public contributions via taxation to the social-insurance funds—the costs of their own grossly inadequate protection. The capital-goods industries were in a state of collapse: revive them through a public-works program. The New Deal has looked into every ditch and behind every thicket for construction projects that were socially useful and capable of paying for themselves ultimately. The unhappy results of this hunt we all know today. Agriculture was in depression because of overproduction within the price framework: reduce yields until domestic and foreign markets could be restored. The vicious program of destruction of the AAA was launched and scarcity became the keynote of agriculture's planning, but neither the domestic nor the foreign market has been revived.

After two years of pulling and hauling, the New Deal has only succeeded in making the rich richer and the poor poorer; it has fixed more firmly the hold of monopoly capitalism on the productive enterprise of the country; it has made the petty bourgeois—the small home- and farm-owners—more completely the victims of interest slavery; it has underwritten scarcity as the economic method of capitalism; it has gulled and cozened labor so effectively that the conservative labor leaders have virtually surrendered the use of the only effective weapon they ever had—the right to strike. About all these subjects this little book by Stolberg and Vinton has something to say; and often only a single flashing sentence is required to illuminate a whole dreary landscape. It is to be noted that the chapter on labor is particularly penetrating.

One may indicate, however, that the authors have committed one error and have failed to point the moral of one of their accusations. In three different places (pp. 6, 35, 44), in connection with their discussion of agriculture's difficulties, they seem to think that a system of low tariffs would help the farmers. It is true that the American farmer sells in a world market and buys in a protected domestic one, and that to some extent he is therefore at a disadvantage; but it must be recalled that during the whole period 1865-1920, when American agriculture was selling abroad profitably its great surpluses of wheat, meatstuffs, and cotton, the domestic tariff wall was as impenetrable as ever. What is at the heart of the agricultural problem today is the same blight that is destroying the whole capitalist economy—its debts. American agriculture simply has too costly a plant to permit it to compete successfully in a world market with young producing countries—capitalistically speaking—like Canada, Argentina, Brazil, India, and Russia. In 1933, for example, we sold 32 per cent more cotton abroad than we had sold annually during 1921-25, but the value received was 50.5 per cent less! Tariff tinkering is no solution for agriculture's ills: foreign markets can never be recaptured at a profit as long as we continue to operate a vast and inefficient plant; and as for our domestic needs, if we were to conduct agriculture at a high stage of productivity we could dispense with most of the farmers and most of the land in cultivation. But what would that do to existing capital values?

In the second place, I regret the failure of the authors to point out what has become the greatest economic danger inherent in the New Deal's program of scarcity. The New Deal has not merely placed limitations in the way of production; it is openly and wantonly encouraging inefficiency. A large number of the industrial codes under the NRA not only limit production but prevent plant expansion and the installation of new machinery—with the inevitable obstacles placed in the way of the introduction of better technical and therefore more economical methods. In the case of agriculture the use of the device of proration for the purpose of limiting production in cotton, tobacco, and sugar (the Secretary of Agriculture has spoken of asking Congress to extend the scheme to the other cash crops) simply means that farmers will be encouraged to be less efficient rather than more; for what profit will there be in the utilization of the technics of biology, chemistry, and mechanics if the end result is to be not the production of greater crops but simply the same fixed quotas? As a result, we are in danger of losing the few agricultural skills we have acquired so painfully and over such a long period of time. This, really, is the greatest peril that confronts us: that in its efforts to protect the profit system the New Deal is permitting the realization of the possibilities of abundance to escape us. And without abundance not socialism but a new feudalism is bound to be our fate.

LOUIS M. HACKER

A Mind Divided

A House Divided. By Pearl S. Buck. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.50.

THIS second sequel to "The Good Earth" centers its attention upon the third generation of Wangs. The hero's grandfather was a farmer and his father was a war lord, but he himself is our strict contemporary, being one of those educated Chinese youths who are so much in the world's news at present. Not that he is in any sense a typical young revolutionary. He is a type, of course, as all Mrs. Buck's people are and have been, but he is not the type that circulates literature and gets beheaded. He is the type that knows the old world to be dead, and is in the main willing to have it so, but does not know what kind of world should be put in its place. He is the young man whose mind is sensitive, subtle, and divided, so that his characteristic mood is perplexity when faced on the one hand with elders who are satisfied with a convention and on the other hand with juniors who are convinced of a cause. Because he is complex he can decide nothing. But because he is conscientious he sees everything—and therefore is an excellent hero for Mrs. Buck, who appears now more than ever to be quite frankly engaged in a narrative analysis of New China.

Her trilogy has been almost perfectly schematic. Just as Wang Lung loved the land and as Wang the Tiger loved warfare, so Wang Yuan loves the truth. Not only that. Wang Yuan's environment conveniently arranges itself in a pattern whose purpose is to show him the scope of his problem. His days pass partly in the country and partly in the city, partly in the East and partly in the West, for he spends six years as a student in the United States. The older generation subdivides itself for him in the persons of his father, who represents the war lord now about to become obsolete, his mother, who represents the country lady gone peasant again, his adopted mother in the coastal city, who represents the enlightened yet not too egregiously emancipated lady, and his uncle, who represents the rich elder indolently and gracefully content with his good lot. Yuan's own generation separates itself on the male side into his cousin Sheng, who as an aesthete accepts the new freedom without any of its responsibilities, and his other cousin Meng, who as a revolutionist accepts so much responsibility that he is utterly graceless and granitic; and on the female side into four girls—Ai-lan, a beautiful dancing moth who has grown Western wings and has a shallow heart, the revolutionary schoolmate (nameless) who is too intense and mirthless to be felt as a woman at all, Mei-ling, who suits him exactly because she is both serious and feminine, and Mary Wilson, the cool professor's daughter whom he meets in America but cannot accept because she is alien, and because although she is all that a Western girl can be she is not enough.

It is from these specimens that Yuan learns to know himself and his world, and from such a list of them the impression might be gathered that Mrs. Buck's novel was somehow lifeless. But this is not so, for no less than in "The Good Earth" and "Sons" she has revealed here a remarkable ability to breathe the finest, warmest, and most delicate life into the abstractions she has chosen to treat. It is not the kind of life which we ordinarily expect and occasionally get from fiction; it is at once rarer and more general than that, the result in us being a sense of respectful intimacy, of dignified identification, with the whole of an endlessly interesting race. It is perhaps unfortunate that Mrs. Buck should have chosen in the beginning a prose style which now grows a little tiresome in its effect of effortlessness. But that is a minor point in view of all that we have gained from her trilogy—not to speak of what we have gained from her masterpiece to date, the translation two years ago of "All Men Are Brothers."

MARK VAN DOREN

The Sophistries of Sokolsky

Labor's Fight for Power. By George E. Sokolsky. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

IF Mr. Sokolsky's book has not been underwritten by the National Association of Manufacturers, it should have been. "Labor's Fight for Power" is sheer propaganda—crude, stupid, and vicious. What it lacks in subtlety, it makes up in confusion and ignorance. Mr. Sokolsky sets himself a perfectly fictitious problem in reconstructing the history of Section 7-a: Why, he asks with a perfectly straight face, do American workers "prefer" the company union to the trade union? He has his answer pat. Each American worker is a little boss and capitalist in psychic embryo. The company union constitutes a perfect device for achieving "a community of interest between capital and labor." The A. F. of L. unions are rife with labor racketeering. The A. F. of L.'s craft-union policies are "unrelated to the necessities of American labor." At the same time, by seeking to impose the principle of One Big Union, the A. F. of L. steers us straight toward communism.

Mr. Sokolsky accomplishes a truly prodigious feat. He not only gives voice to the idea that American workers have been flocking into company unions of their own free will; he not only proclaims that in the major industries "capital has been able to prove that its own workers are not dissatisfied and that they do not want to join the Federation"; but he does all this without ever breathing a word about the determined fight which the overlords of industry have carried on against the principle of free and secret elections in which workers might indicate their choice between trade and company unions!

From the first page to the last the book is studded with gems of historical insight and logical acumen. The NRA suffers from a fallacy which must lead straight to fascism, for it "attempts to introduce communistic measures in a capitalistic structure." One of the characteristics of Marxism, inter alia, is the "principle of the totalitarian state." We would not have suffered from a depression beginning in 1929 if wage rates had come down fast enough and far enough after 1921. "Organized capital," we are informed, "does not exist in the United States"; our capitalists "are too recent to have become class conscious"; Owen D. Young, although a capitalist, advocates "socialistic measures." Bentham is set side by side with Marx, Veblen, and Lenin as one whose economic theories "vied with the ancient Ricardo, Adam Smith, John Stuart Mill, and Herbert Spencer." Revolution can never come in the United States, because we possess an "automatic process for the redistribution of wealth and economic power," because there "is no army," because in the course of pressure politics "men telephone to Congress," and because "the American is without temper." Do we wish to discover the true "idealists of the world"? Then we must seek for them among "White Russians, émigrés, reactionary Chinese, treaty-port compradores. They believe that men may be hungry and just . . . may starve and yet adhere to that which produced starvation. They have principles and ideals. They know what is right and wrong. They are conscious of historical continuity. Therefore they are the first to die." Before the advent of 1929 "there had been only two or three panics in the United States but they were of a trivial nature." Professor Tugwell's original drug bill flies in the face of the law of supply and demand. The Brain Trust is of one flesh with Hitler and Stalin. Organized labor is the only pressure group in the United States which "has the strength and purpose to fight for what it wants"; moreover, should "all the possible demands of labor be granted, then profits must disappear and communism is inevitable." The rich in the United States "give to charity lavishly, thus taxing themselves for the upkeep of the depressed"; what is more, the capitalists of our country are utterly incapable of resisting "redistributive legislation," for "although the rich seek to avoid higher taxes, they are few in number, rarely vote, seldom know how to influence public opinion, and therefore have no real medium of resistance."

In all this awful cacophony of depraved ignorance one statement rings true: "I uphold the capitalist system . . . the faults are in the operation of the capitalist system, not in the essential structure." The prospective customer may be interested to know that a substantial part of the book is entirely alien to its ostensible themes—the struggle over Section 7-a and the political tendencies of the New Deal. To puff and pad his commodity to its full $2 worth, the publisher has seen fit to introduce one essay which deals with American diplomatic policy in the Far East, and another which expounds the wisdom of flexible as against rigid tariffs.

ARTHUR WURNIG

Mr. Belloc's History

A Shorter History of England. By Hilaire Belloc. The Macmillan Company. $3.

Cromwell. By Hilaire Belloc. J. B. Lippincott Company. $4.

MR. BELLOC'S historical writings have usually been dismissed as literary exercises. It is true that he can be convicted of frequent inaccuracies, and that he has a habit of clinging to his prejudices in the face of all the evidence—notably in his insistence that the dominant strain in the English racial inheritance is that of the Romanized Celts, not the Anglo-Saxon. His activities as essayist, novelist, poet, politician, and student of military strategy have been far too varied to enable him to devote much time to research. Moreover, he writes better English than has usually been considered quite decent among scholars. His style is somewhat archaic and over-inflated, in an eighteenth-century manner; but in spite of its divorce from the language as it is now spoken, it shows a mastery of English rhythms and a respect for the precise meanings of words which make it always, no matter what subject Mr. Belloc may be discussing, a pleasure to read.

The general principles of Mr. Belloc's interpretation of history should not, however, be dismissed so easily. He is prejudiced, but not more so than most academic historians. The official version of English history, as promulgated by such writers as Macaulay, Freeman, Stubbs, Froude, Gardiner, and Green, was Germanophile, Protestant, bourgeois, liberal, patriotic, and optimistic. Mr. Belloc, on the other hand, is a Roman Catholic; he considers that a popular monarchy is more truly democratic than government by parliament; and while his social ideal is distributivism, he believes that what is actually being realized is its antithesis—the servile state. These three opinions are at least as respectable as the conviction of the official historians that the English race inherited from its Teutonic ancestors a genius for reconciling individualism with order, and that the main current of English history was the slow growth of English freedom, broadening from precedent to precedent until it finally reached perfection in the age of Mr. Gladstone.

Mr. Belloc's Catholicism does not noticeably cause him to distort facts; he admits most of the criticisms which Protestants have made against the church. It shows itself chiefly in his insistence that spiritual conditions are prior to material conditions. What he means by this assertion it is difficult to say; he nowhere produces any evidence which illustrates it. Such an attitude virtually makes history chaotic, since if changes in people's beliefs and ideals are not caused by the development of the productive forces and by changes in the relations of production, they can be attributed only to accident. Ideas do not drop from the sky. In point of fact, in so far as Mr. Belloc explains historical processes at all, he attributes them directly to accident. He attaches an overwhelming importance to the Black Death, for example, which he supposes to have caused the destruction of the medieval synthesis, and to Henry VIII's passion for Anne Boleyn, and to the personal weaknesses of the Stuart kings. It would follow from this attitude that it is impossible to forecast the future—an implication which Mr. Belloc would probably refuse to accept—and indeed that there is no particular reason why history should be studied at all.

Mr. Belloc's faith in monarchy is equally unhelpful. It makes his interpretation of the Middle Ages little more than a fascinating series of character studies. Undeniably the best of the medieval kings struggled against the feudal nobles and were, in their day, a progressive force; but they were powerful only because they represented the interests of those social classes—of the bourgeoisie, chiefly—which were opposed to the feudal anarchy. When this attitude is extended to the seventeenth century and the Stuart kings are represented as fighting for the welfare of the entire nation against a small group of rich men, it becomes nonsensical.

Mr. Belloc's distributivism does, however, give him considerable insight into the meaning of English history. It has no visible connection with his other beliefs—a fact which may be proved by the statement that it is identical with the agrarian radicalism of Thomas Jefferson and John Taylor of Caroline. Like Jefferson, Mr. Belloc realizes that the development of capitalism means the servile state, and, again like Jefferson, he regards the servile state as the destruction of human freedom and of all true civilization and not as a necessary transition phase in the progress of the race toward a more genuine and universal freedom. Mr. Belloc, therefore, plots English history in terms of an advance of the servile state. He realizes that the central theme is the development not of freedom and democracy but of the power of the English ruling class. England has for several centuries been governed by a relatively small clique of landowning families, who have from the beginning been in close alliance with the merchants and financiers of the City and who, after a short period of conflict in the eighteen thirties and forties, became amalgamated also with the manufacturers. In spite of certain appearances of democratic control, England is an oligarchy. This is the one cardinal fact which explains its political and social development.

For the origins of the English oligarchy Mr. Belloc, like William Cobbett, Disraeli in his Tory-democratic period, and Karl Marx, turns to the sixteenth century. The English ruling class first acquired its power by robbing the church in the time of Henry VIII and by expropriating the peasants. Elizabeth, in Mr. Belloc's interpretation, was merely a puppet in the hands of the leaders of the new oligarchy, the Cecils. There followed the Stuart attempt to revive the monarchy, which was frustrated by the Roundhead leaders, many of whom, Mr. Belloc insists, were millionaires, and which ended with the consolidation of oligarchical power, including the establishment of the Bank of England and its other characteristic institutions in the reign of William III. Since that time the rule of the oligarchy has never seriously been threatened, and its only important failure was in Ireland. Mr. Belloc, emphasizing facts which are slurred over by the official historians, gives considerable attention to the impoverishment of the Irish people and the Irish famine.

If one assumes that the main lines of recent historical development, instead of being reversed by revolution, will be extended into the future, then this view can be accepted as largely true. One will criticize Mr. Belloc not for his thesis but because his elaboration of it is inadequate—because he devotes so much space to the details of political controversy and military tactics and so little to the financial and commercial forces behind them. His study of Cromwell, for example, which is perhaps the weakest of all Mr. Belloc's biographies, treats Cromwell merely as a cavalry leader and does not attempt to set him in his place in the social and economic forces of his time. And in his "History of England" he does not sufficiently emphasize the influence of India in determining the whole course of English foreign policy for the past two centuries; nor does he show how England today is governed not from Whitehall but from the Bank of England, or by what methods radical leaders are transformed into champions of the aristocracy, or how public opinion is molded to suit the interests of the ruling class. One might enumerate such criticisms indefinitely; but when all is said, the fact remains that Mr. Belloc's interpretation of English history since the Reformation, in spite of all its inaccuracies and inadequacies, is probably nearer to the truth than that given by the official historians.

H. B. PARKES

Drama

Elisabeth Bergner

AT the Shubert Theater Miss Elisabeth Bergner is giving New York "a taste of her quality." The phrase is from "Hamlet" and its import is modest, but it happens, I think, to cover the case. Here is an actress widely heralded in England as the best of our day and here is a heap of theatrical rubbish romantically entitled "Escape Me Never." Set the first to rummaging as best she may among the fripperies of the second and you have, perhaps, an exhibition not undiverting in its own trivial fashion. You have, to be specific, an engaging gamine who impishly bluffs her way from one meretricious situation to another and who keeps you interested in her grotesque little self when you could not possibly be interested in Margaret Kennedy's tawdrily romantic tale of the young musical genius as he appears to the delighted eyes of shocked respectability. You have that and you have also as much more of the same sort of thing as you may care to take, but you have, unfortunately, precious little to go on if you happen to be trying to decide whether Miss Bergner is the great actress she is said to be or merely a cute little thing shrewdly exploiting her cuteness in a play which demands no talents essentially different from those of a music-hall mimic.

Probably no one could play this particular part any better than she does. Few if any, indeed, could play it one-half so charmingly, but the discouraging fact is that it seems to suit as well as it does. Great actresses are ready enough to appear in meretricious plays, but when they do one expects to catch in their performance something which the play itself does not even suggest. One expects them somehow to lift it above its own level, to give it a poignancy and a meaning which it does not have. But it was for this magic touch that I waited in vain. Miss Bergner gets out of the play everything which its author put in it. In her hands it realizes itself and becomes as entertaining as it could possibly be. But she does not transform it, does not make it into something better than it really is. Nor does it anywhere demand of her anything very difficult. For two acts she is an impudent waif sharing the garret of two musical-comedy bohemians; for a third she is the child-mother weeping softly over a dying baby. If most actresses of the type could not do what she does anything like so well, they would, nevertheless, do much the same thing, and the difference would be a difference of degree not a difference of kind.

One thing is certain. If Miss Bergner really is a great actress, then it was a mistake of major importance ever to introduce her to America in a play of this particular sort, for even if its badness were only badness of a different kind, the effect might not be as unfortunate as it is. She might struggle against a clumsily constructed fable and against an inarticulate or even bombastic script. She might struggle; she might triumph—partly at least; and by that triumph she might demonstrate her power. But the trouble with "Escape Me Never" is just that it is so meretriciously and so obviously easy, that its tawdry romanticism and its endless succession of emotional clichés are all actable with the minimum of effort, and that the one virtue it has is the virtue of providing any engaging personality with a series of opportunities to be coy, impudent, tender, defiant, and melancholy at appropriate intervals. There is no doubt that it serves very well to display the charm of a vivacious and appealing young lady, but it leaves the question of her possible greatness wide open.

Great works of art do not resemble one another. One knows when one has met a new one because one recognizes in it something which is unique, and the last thing one ever thinks of saying is that it is "like so and so only better." One does not think of something else because one is standing in wild surmise before a reality whose possibility had never been suspected. Now Miss Bergner has been described in terms which imply that she is capable of a performance suggesting the uniqueness of genius. She has been compared to Duse and Bernhardt by persons who obviously meant by the impossible combination only something which could not be described at all. But it was precisely by the absence of any hint of such uniqueness in her performance that I was most disconcerted. I do not know what it was that I expected, because I expected something which I could not possibly anticipate. Here, I thought, will be either a personality not merely attractive but attractive in some unfamiliar way, or even, perhaps, some mood of gaiety or sadness, some manner of thinking or feeling, not already a part of the familiar repertory. Some new door is about to be opened, some glimpse granted me of a mode of sensibility unknown before. When I come away, the world will seem richer, as it always does when something new has been added to it.

I shall be lifted as I always am when someone has broken through the familiar routine and thought or felt with that freshness which seems so easy but is actually so difficult. Perhaps, I said, I shall want to say what I always say when a greatness is revealed: "O brave new world, that has such people in 't!" But I did nothing of the sort. I came away saying only that Miss Bergner is a clever and attractive young lady who seems so far very easy to classify. Go to see her expecting a vivacious little urchin and you will not be surprised.

"The Old Maid" (Empire Theater) is dramatized from Edith Wharton's story about a woman who steals from her sister the affections of the latter's illegitimate child. There are two unusually fine performances by Judith Anderson and Helen Menken, but as is so often the case with dramatizations the bare outlines of the plot are more adequately represented than the psychological study for which the plot furnished an occasion.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Films

"David Copperfield"

IT would be unnecessarily dull to enlarge on the reasons why the version of "David Copperfield" at the Capitol is not, and could not be, altogether satisfactory entertainment. It is enough to say that one can respond to it only as one responds to any of the works of Dickens—that is, by temporarily suspending any claims to adult intelligence. A marvelous child, with a lively gift of invention and a large heart, but with no particular aptitude for using his brain, Dickens requires that we get down on the floor and romp with him if we are to prevent the slight feeling of nausea that always arises before the spectacle of arrested development. Of Dickens it may truly be said, as it is said of many greater novelists, that in his books he gives us a world—whole, unique, instantly recognizable. But it is a child's world; it bears no close correspondence to any known reality; it has the cohesion of a dream. Perhaps it is for this reason that it is immortal. Because it is fundamentally unreal it is just as acceptable or unacceptable, as the case may be, to audiences today as to the readers of Household Words and All the Year Round in the forties. There will always be people for whom the world of the child is more comforting than whatever world the adult constructs out of his experience and understanding. There will always be those who find their classic type of the indigent eccentric in Micawber rather than in those less consistently humorous Russian cousins of his—Marmaladov in "Crime and Punishment" and the Captain in "The Brothers Karamazov." In brief, Dickens is as immortal as the necessity in the human breast to confuse what one would like to be true with what is, in all probability, the truth. He is as immortal as illusion.

Perhaps the best tribute that one pays to this new version of "David Copperfield" is to say that it manages to rebuild the charming child-world of Dickens in celluloid as palpably unreal as the pages of his book. George Cukor has had the good sense to let the long roll of familiar characters parade before the eye with such rapidity that no interruption of the mind is possible. The direction, unmarked by any originality or striking quality of style, is exactly right for the intention. Everything is subordinated to the primary purpose of bringing out the particular idiosyncrasy by which each of the characters is remembered by the audience. Backgrounds are therefore dimly etched: the Micawber menage is indicated by a few brief shots, the wine merchant's establishment where David works flashes on for only a moment, and a "processed" back-drop of St.

Paul's behind W. C. Fields's stovepipe hat is all that we get of that London whose tides swirl around most of the personages in the novel. In the same manner, the scenarists are determined by the necessity of getting as many characters as possible within the time-period. This requires most notably the elimination of David's school days and all of the earlier history of his relationship with Steerforth. (In one sequence at least, the death of Dora, the necessity becomes a virtue, and one is confronted with perhaps the first example in history of a Hollywood director actually "toning down" a scene from an old master.) As may easily be imagined, the picture gives more of the excitement of a hasty scamper through a portrait gallery than of an integrated dramatic construction. And most discussion is certain to hover around the question of how successfully the different artists have caught the precise lineaments of the characters whom they portray.

It must immediately be acknowledged that Hollywood has spared no expense in providing for its audience the desired emotion of recognition. From W. C. Fields to Hugh Walpole the players in the film have been recruited from the very front ranks of contemporary entertainers. And on the whole the cast is as competent as it is expensive. The greatest single inspiration was the choice of Frank Lawton, perhaps the most satisfactory juvenile on the English-speaking stage at the moment, for the title role. So naturally does this young actor fall into sincerity in his rendition of the emotions that he very nearly forgets that he is playing Dickens. He almost destroys the illusion that everybody else is building up. A less happy selection was made in the case of Master Freddie Bartholomew (as David Copperfield, the child), who seemed to this spectator much too effeminate and at times badly trained in the use of his voice. Concerning W. C. Fields's Micawber opinion is certain to be very much divided. Although it may be granted that he conforms to the physical image remarkably well, he will probably be found lacking in sufficient gusto in his more important scenes. Here especially is a case where a less well-known actor would have worked against fewer handicaps in the audience's recollection. And the same is true for Roland Young, who is fundamentally too charming an actor to be properly sinister in the role of Uriah Heap. The less well-known players do, as a matter of fact, come off very much better; the Mrs. Micawber, the Peggotty, and the Steerforth are excellent; and, for this reviewer at least, the actor who plays the last named evokes the early Victorian period more uncannily than anyone else in the film. In brief, Hollywood has taken no chances in doing justice to the favorite author of G. K. Chesterton, Hugh Walpole, and Alexander Woollcott; and the result is another of those large-scale debauches in nineteenth-century sentimentalism which will one day swell the archives of early twentieth-century evasion.

"Bordertown" recounts the failure of a reformed roughneck from the Mexican quarter in Los Angeles to make a success of the law. The moral would seem to be that foreigners in this country should recognize their congenital inferiority and keep their proper place. Despite a slow beginning and wretched direction throughout, the film takes on a certain interest through the acting of Paul Muni as the frustrated self-made man and Bette Davis as the border-town sorceress who commits murder to secure his love. The Martin Johnsons' latest record of African exploration, "Baboon," includes some remarkable shots of mountain peaks, stockaded native villages, and animal herds taken from their large three-motored amphibian plane. Of interest also are the close-ups of rhinoceroses, giraffes, lions, and baboons, made possible, as one is too often reminded by Mr. Johnson's voice, by tempting the animals within a perilous range. There is not enough new material, however, to make the film a very significant addition to its class.

WILLIAM TROY

Contents

|                                                                   |     |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS                                              | 169 |
| EDITORIALS:                                                       |     |
| Our Surrendering President                                        | 172 |
| Slamming the Door on Russia                                       | 173 |
| Has Chiang Kai-shek Sold Out?                                     | 173 |
| Terror in Arkansas                                                | 174 |
| ISSUES AND MEN. HITLER AFTER THE SAAR. By Oswald Garrison Villard | 175 |
| CARTOON. MUSICAL INTERLUDE. By LOW                                | 176 |
| THE HILL-BILLIES COME TO DETROIT. By Louis Adamic                 | 177 |
| SOCIAL SECURITY IN GREAT BRITAIN. By Raymond Gram Swing           | 179 |
| THE WHITE HOUSE BREAKS WITH LABOR. By R. G. S.                    | 181 |
| IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter                                   | 182 |
| CORRESPONDENCE                                                    | 182 |
| LABOR AND INDUSTRY:                                               |     |
| An Army with Banners. By Heywood Brown                            | 184 |
| The New Deal for Share-Croppers. By William R. Amberson           | 185 |
| MIDWINTER BOOK SECTION                                            |     |
| ARE NOVELS WORTH READING? By Joseph Wood Krutch                   | 188 |
| POETS AND THE WARS. By Philip Blair Rice                          | 189 |
| THE CENTAUR. By Lionel Abel                                       | 192 |
| DESCENT FROM DEATH. By Hal Saunders White                         | 192 |
| BOOKS:                                                            |     |
| Priapus in Georgia. By William Troy                               | 192 |
| Truth Through the Transom. By Frank H. Simonds                    | 194 |
| A Philosophic Pathfinder. By Sidney Hook                          | 195 |
| Saving Cuba. By Carleton Beals                                    | 196 |
| Fiction in Our Time. By Arthur Livingston                         | 199 |
| A Pleasant View of Decay. By Kenneth Burke                        | 200 |
| The Pilgrimage of Heine. By Horace Gregory                        | 202 |
| Drama: A Not Very Magic Mountain. By Joseph Wood Krutch           | 203 |
| CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE                                        | 204 |

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

TO CALL the American-Brazilian tariff agreement the "first break in the log-jam of international trade," to quote Secretary Hull, is to reveal the bankruptcy of the Administration's tariff policy. Nearly a year has elapsed since the passage of the reciprocal tariff act, and though at that time negotiations with several countries had been in progress for months, only two agreements have since been reached. Of the two, the one with Cuba belongs in a separate category because it does not involve the question of most-favored-nation treatment. The Brazilian pact represents the Administration's first attempt to bring about a genuine reduction of tariffs by means of bilateral negotiations under the most-favored-nation clause. As such the results are disheartening. The United States has agreed to reduce its tariff by 50 per cent on balsam, natural ipecac, maté, manganese ore, Brazil nuts, and castor beans—for which we paid all told less than two million dollars in 1933. In return Brazil undertakes to cut duties by 20 to 60 per cent on twenty-eight articles from the United States which had a total value in 1933 of nearly ten million dollars. Thus the United States, instead of making the tariff reduction necessary to restore the purchasing power of a debtor nation, has utilized its bargaining power to break down the protective barriers of a weaker country. And this end achieved, the American press jubilantly commends the Administration for its great victory. The difficulty, of course, lies in the psychology aroused by the bargaining process. As long as it is assumed that we benefit by our tariff and that we should be weakened by any concessions, it is obvious that no real reductions will be made. It is disquieting, moreover, to note that in the first real test of our sincerity regarding the most-favored-nation principle—the generalization of the tariff reduction on manganese—the benefit is not to be extended to the Soviet Union. Since no explanation has been offered for this arbitrary action, it may be assumed that the Administration has as yet been unable to find a plausible excuse.

THE MUNITIONS INQUIRY has plunged into a jungle of questionable practice in the letting of contracts for the navy ships, and obviously the ground will have to be ruthlessly cleared. The testimony develops a remarkable picture and involves men of whose existence and power the public has never dreamed. There is Arthur P. Homer, who has been said to be a "fixer" who could obtain a $10,000,000 cruiser contract for a $250,000 fee, a power which he himself staunchly repudiates. Mr. Homer also is credited with last year's happy idea of building naval vessels with Public Works money. The idea was carried to Marvin McIntyre, the President's secretary, and by him to the President, who approved it, and finally it was "sold" to Assistant Secretary Roosevelt at the Navy Department. This same Mr. Homer, in a matter of a contract for destroyers, arranged to have ten telegrams sent to the White House on behalf of Bath Shipyards, and then called Mr. McIntyre and asked to have the telegrams sorted out from the rest of the President's messages and laid before him at breakfast. Mr. McIntyre promised to do so. The President was asked about this at his own press conference and laughed it off, saying that "Mac" was always having to make such promises, and that the promises were the end of the matter, a curious sidelight on the sub-ethical duties of the White House secretariat.

EVIDENCE OF COLLUSION between the "Unholy Three"—the New York Shipbuilding Corporation, the Newport News Shipbuilding and Drydock Company, and the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Company—in bidding for cruiser contracts was offered by John P. Frey, president of the Metal Trades Division of the A. F. of L. Ten days before the bids were opened last summer he was given an envelope containing the names of the companies which would be lowest bidders for each type of ship. He told General Hugh Johnson about it and offered to open the envelope, but the General said it was "too hot" for him, and refused the information. When the bids were published, the information in the envelope proved to be correct in every detail. A letter from Secretary Swanson was read into the record which stated that the Navy Department investigated charges of collusion last summer but could find no evidence. Laurence P. Wilder, whose testimony first revealed the existence of the alleged "fixer," was in charge of the lobby for the Jones-White merchant-marine bill in 1928, and his expense account at that time was $235,000, not a trifle even for a boom year. Mr. Wilder told the Senate committee that the navy was "in a vise controlled by the three big shipyards." Since the ships built last year cost nearly a fifth more than the year before, the charge of collusion should be investigated by the Department of Justice.

THE ANGLO-FRENCH AGREEMENT on German rearmament comes years too late to remedy the situation, which now can only be ameliorated. The evils of Hitlerism, secret rearmament, and German isolation may be attributed largely to resentment against the stigma of inferiority imposed by the Versailles treaty, particularly its war-guilt, reparations, and armament provisions. If the offer to abrogate the military clauses of Part V of the Versailles pact had been made three years ago, Hitler would in all probability not be in power today; if it had been made eighteen months ago, Germany would not have withdrawn from the League. Yet while the effect of the delay has been disastrous to Germany, its repercussions on the European political scene have in some respect been beneficial. Without the threat of an irreconcilable German foreign policy, the Soviet Union might not have entered the League, the Franco-Italian rapprochement would never have been consummated, and the proposed Eastern Locarno would not have even been broached. If as a result of the belated action of France and Britain Germany can be induced to rejoin the League, there will at least be a net gain for international organization, though the bitterness which has been aroused in the interval may reduce this organization to scraps of paper.

THE LEGALIZATION of German rearmament is also being used as a bait to persuade the Reich to join in the proposed convention for joint assistance against attack from the air. While the suggested accord is identical in principle with the Locarno agreement which it is designed to supplement, it is obviously conceived as a protection against a real threat—the new German air fleet. A defensive understanding among the former Allied powers is undoubtedly on the cards if Germany fails to accept the Anglo-French proposal. But a defensive agreement directed against a given country is open to serious objections, in that it may easily lead to the development of a system of alliances such as existed prior to the World War. The step taken at London may be interpreted as a final and vigorous effort to bring Germany back into the orbit of the existing world organization. If it is successful the problems of disarmament and international economic cooperation can be taken up where they were dropped two years ago. If it fails, the world will be back precisely where it was in 1914.

REVISION of the Soviet constitution in the direction of greater democracy will be hailed by enemies of the Soviet system as further evidence that Russia is moving to the right. Scores of editorial writers will interrupt their denunciation of Soviet terrorism and the Communist menace in this country long enough to point out with great solemnity that the whole trend of Soviet policy is toward an early return of capitalism. That the present constitutional changes have been made possible by the dramatic successes of the Soviet agricultural program, which they vehemently denounce, will of course be ignored. But the abolition of the inequalities between rural and urban representation, the substitution of direct for indirect election for the high soviets, and the inauguration of the secret ballot can mean only one thing—that opposition to Communist rule has dwindled into insignificance. More specifically this means that the progress of collectivization has transformed the peasants, who constitute 75 per cent of the Soviet population, from petty-bourgeois individualists into cooperating members of the Socialist system. Thus what appears to be a trend to the right is the inverted reflection of a basic and apparently irresistible movement to the left.

FOR ANYONE who is still capable of doubting that big business (1) knows what it wants and (2) prefers profit to principles we present two pieces of evidence, for which we are indebted to the Labor and Socialist Press Service. Exhibit number one consists of two quotations from a resolution prepared for Congress by the National Association of Manufacturers. The first has to do with trade practices.

The approved competitive practices and prohibitions submitted by the properly defined majority of a group, trade, or industry should be binding upon the minority.

The second refers to labor.

Recognize the equal right of minorities or individuals to bargain for themselves directly or through representatives of their own choosing.

Exhibit number two consists of two quotations also—this time from a series of propositions made by the United States Chamber of Commerce. Proposition VII reads:

Rules of fair competition formulated by a clearly preponderant part of an industry as suitable for the whole industry with due consideration for small units and approval by the governmental agency should be enforceable against all concerns in the industry.

Proposition VIII reads:

In any new legislation it should be made unmistakable that collective bargaining is bargaining with representatives of all groups of employees that desire to act through spokesmen, without the right of the minority group to deal collectively, or the direct right of individual bargaining, being precluded.

BECAUSE its four huge industrial plants have closed down and 90 per cent of its citizens are on relief, the borough of Everson in Fayette County, Pennsylvania, did not have enough money to pay a bill of $1,000 owed to the Citizens' Water Company, a subsidiary of the powerful Delaware Valley Utilities Company. The utility thereupon not only shut off the borough's water supply but sent crews of men through the streets to smash all fire hydrants. Two days later a fire broke out in a block of wooden buildings and threatened the whole town. The citizens of Everson protested to the state Public Service Commission, which in turn warned the utility not to shut off the water, although this had already been done. A hearing has been arranged, but meanwhile Everson is without water and another fire could easily wipe out the community. The action of the Delaware Valley Utilities Company hardly strengthens the utilities' case against federal control.

THE YOUNG MEN hired by the FERA to educate the people while they have nothing else to do are having difficulties from Maine to Arkansas. We discuss elsewhere the case of Ward H. Rodgers, a former FERA instructor. The tale of Vernon Booker in Bangor is less serious but more fantastic. In the course of a series of lectures designed for men and women between twenty-five and forty, Mr. Booker devoted one discussion to communism and life in Soviet Russia. He quoted extensively from Dr. Frankwood Williams's book on Russia; he went so far as to agree with Dr. Williams at various points, particularly on the intelligence with which the communist state handles marriage and divorce and the rearing of children. Within two days the entire town of Bangor, led by the Bangor Daily News, was in a ferment over the "educator from New York." We quote the letter of an eloquent correspondent:

Every official in town, various agitated ladies interested in branches of Christian endeavor, and the local head of the American Legion indulged in a barrage of telegrams and telephone calls. They appealed en masse to the Governor himself. Bangor seethed. . . . [Mr. Booker] ventured to call on the Grand Panjandrum of the Bangor Daily News. The Grand Panjandrum, in a palsy bordering on hysteria, dismissed Mr. Booker without giving him a chance to utter a word. This newspaper made use of every detail to emphasize how it had come to the rescue of a helpless community. It adroitly refrained from mentioning that Mr. Booker was a native-born son, hailing from Lincoln some fifty miles away, that he came of pure New England parentage, and was educated in Maine schools. The Young Men's Christian Association [where the lecture was given] closed its chaste portals.

Needless to say, Mr. Booker lost his job. But that did not save the FERA from attack for hiring so subversive a young man. The Bangor News reported proudly that Chief Justice William R. Pattangall had said: "If the FERA director cannot find any better way to spend government funds he better send the money back to Washington." This is a new version of the "back where you came from" school. Shall we henceforth read "FERA" for "Russian" gold?

WONDER what it feels like to be Premier of Prussia? General Hermann Wilhelm Göring recently went to Poland to do a little hunting with President Moscicki. We quote a dispatch from Bialowitsch, Poland:

This little town had a hard time during General Göring's stay, for its inhabitants lived as if they were in a beleaguered place. . . . No one was permitted to leave passing trains. . . . The police carefully scrutinized the documents of passengers and many were sent back. The tourist hotel was closed by the police for a whole week and the only private hotel was filled with the police agents who accompanied General Göring. . . . The police protection was perfect in every detail. Two policemen guarded every member of the hunting party. . . .

It is not surprising that with so many policemen around,

General Göring succeeded in bagging only one wild boar and several hares. The whole episode has left us feeling patriotic. In America a man runs little danger of being murdered except by someone who is hired to kill him. General Göring, on the other hand, apparently is in danger of being murdered by everyone except those who are hired not to.

THE EDITOR of our Hunting for Hawaii Department reports the sighting of big game. The Atlantic Monthly for February devotes its leading article to the delights of Hawaii; and the article contains the following sentiments which will be familiar to all those who read The Nation of January 30:

For Hawaii voluntarily attached itself to, and was accepted into, the American Union before I was born, just as Texas was, and so is no foreign place but merely another part of our own familiar U. S. A.

Like Arizona, not many years ago with a similar status. . . . Hawaii's history, just as Arizona's, is now a part of United States history as a whole.

I wonder if they [the people of Hawaii] do not sometimes grow a little weary of being "a state in the making"—especially when they observe some sixteen of the full-fledged mainland states paying no such taxes into Uncle Sam's pocket as they do, and many light-heartedly borrowing or begging greater sums from that shortsighted old Yankee year after year.

Of the author of this article the Atlantic says, in its contributors' column, that "many readers. . . will be happy, not envious, to hear of his luck in being sent to the Pacific as an emissary of the Atlantic." We imagine Sidney S. Bowman of the Pan-Pacific Press Bureau was the most happy and the least envious reader of them all. A little farther along we learn that the author is by trade a designer of tombstones. Perhaps he will be able to design an appropriate one for Mr. Bowman's little campaign of propaganda, which our spies report is dying prematurely—from exposure.

WE ARE DELIGHTED to announce that Heywood Broun has returned to The Nation as a regular weekly contributor. He assumes at this time a rather unaccustomed role as a labor commentator. We are convinced that the combination will be a fruitful one. Labor in this country certainly has need of partisans as persuasive, fearless, and yet humorous as Heywood Broun. And Heywood Broun would be the first to admit that the principles he has upheld so stoutly against so many managing editors can be maintained only by a united labor movement strong enough to combat the offensives now being launched by Hearst, the American Liberty League, and other knights of reaction. Mr. Broun will of course give special attention to the Newspaper Guild in his weekly comment; but he will do so not because he wishes to promote the interests of any single organization but because he feels that the Guild can take the lead in bringing into the American labor movement a group as yet largely unorganized, namely, professional workers. We can think of no surer guard against fascism than an industrial union of all those workers, particularly teachers and writers, who are in a position to influence public opinion. This is a large project. We consider the enlistment of Heywood Broun an excellent beginning.

Our Surrendering President

LESS than three months ago President Roosevelt won a record-breaking victory in the Congressional elections. He might have construed it as a mandate to lead the country with the same enthusiasm and conviction that marked the first months of his Administration. The New Deal at that time was a promise of a new social order, distributing its privileges on a broad democratic basis. Though after two years the New Deal had not yet emerged, the NRA had been a disappointment, and the benefits of the underprivileged were confined to the receipt of federal relief, a great majority was sent to Congress implicitly instructed to support the President, who was thus given a renewed opportunity to realize his promises. But since the election the President has failed to justify the faith placed in him. His vaunted security program as finally hatched proved to be halting and inadequate. Even its advocates could only say for it that it was a beginning. Then followed his work-relief program. Before the election this was held out as a determined pledge that if industry cannot employ the unemployed the government can and will. It turns out to be a morbid substitute for relief, making certain that able-bodied persons who cannot find work in a crippled capitalist system shall not draw help from the government without toiling for it at depressed wages in a federal work gang. The President next surrendered to the newspaper publishers and clipped the wings of his own creation, the National Labor Relations Board, thereby jeopardizing the entire program of enforcement of the law on collective bargaining. And last week he declared war on organized labor in extending the automobile code, revised to include the worthless Wolman labor board. The amended code in effect sanctions the forty-eight-hour week in the automobile industry, and the NIRA both opposed it and recommended changes. The President, abetted by Mr. Richberg, thereupon promulgated the amendments by his autocratic powers, a drama of caesarism which his admirers have always said would be impossible. While this chapter was being written he suffered an almost calamitous defeat in the Senate over the World Court, and received yet another setback in the collapse of the debt negotiations which he had begun with the Soviet government. We do not know how much the President might have achieved in the three months after the elections, but it would have needed a rare talent for failure to have done worse.

The defeat of the World Court was calamitous not because our adherence or non-adherence matters greatly, but because with one ugly revulsion this country turned away from cooperation with other nations in seeking effective alternatives to war. Many factors can be marshaled to explain the defeat. One, certainly, was the loss of the sense of smell in the President's famous nose for politics. He has become so accustomed to success, or is so preternaturally optimistic, that he leaves to his aides responsibilities which he should shoulder himself. We have no doubt that if he had foreseen the possibility of defeat he could have saved the court in the Senate. He could have gone "on the air." He could have appealed to the millions of Americans who wish to be good neighbors in international affairs. The defeat is primarily his own fault. But it also is beyond question that we should be in the World Court today if the Irish-Canadian priest of Detroit had never embarked on his remarkable career as broadcaster. The sudden show of strength by Father Coughlin surprised many people. They had not thought it possible that 200,000 telegrams signed by a million names should stream into Washington in a week, as the result of an hour's torture of the truth by a radio speaker. But they may well be warned. The President is no longer leading the country. He is leaving the field to the demagogues.

These have been black days in Washington. They are incomparably blacker than the week of the bank crisis, for in that experience America was drawn closer together and was inspired with the knowledge that by cooperation it could surmount its difficulties. In the present days sinister forces show themselves, still incipient, but rising with the slow sweep of a tide. It may have been too much to expect that the President would continue to hold these forces at bay. For after all he may have set out on an impossible task—to repair by broadening its democracy a social order which lives by inequality. The forces are not alone exemplified by Father Coughlin; they appear in another guise in the President's own compromises. The letter to the Biddle board two weeks ago and the autocratic imposition of the automobile code last week are the kinds of surrender to be expected if business is to be indulged when it insists on dominating its workers. The code was not imposed for purposes which lay within the President's own philosophy of two years ago. We believe that then the President was sincere in advocating the right of collective bargaining. But now that the automobile board has betrayed and estranged labor and has become the good servant of the automobile manufacturers, the President tries to thrust it down the throat of labor. This change in the President in two years reveals, we believe, the working of an insidious transformation in our national life which if unchecked must end in fascism. The President may not have consciously changed. He may not see that his program of relief work at depressed wages and his betrayal of organized labor are the two greatest gifts to employer-supremacy ever made in this country. His defeat in the Senate and his failure to keep abreast of the American public may startle him for a moment from his invincible optimism. He is turning against the people who elected him and choosing allies among the employers who have been his inveterate opponents. Mr. Farley may know that with five billions to spend he can buy the President's way back into office in 1936. But not any sum can buy the fulness of faith which the country once had in him. He can win it again only by leading. Even if his task should be impossible, at least he can appeal to the great public which believes in economic democracy, and, if need be, take his defeat fighting for it. Three times in a fortnight the President has surrendered without a struggle, twice to the employers, and once to the frenzy of Father Coughlin. It is an inglorious and foreboding record.

Slamming the Door on Russia

IT is a far cry from the cordial conversations between President Roosevelt and M. Litvinov of fifteen months ago to the undiplomatic abruptness with which the State Department ended negotiations with the Soviet government last week. Nor is it possible to explain why the State Department should have spoiled with bad grace what the President began so propitiously. No major change has taken place in this country, in Russia, or in the world to justify the failure of the negotiations. The same reasons for normal, friendly relations exist now as when the President wrote to Moscow soon after his inauguration. The same possibility remains for Soviet purchases in America, and the need for employing American workers on Soviet orders is even more acute. Yet the chance to do political and economic service at one stroke is thrown away as if it were not the business of a foreign office to benefit from a double windfall. All we know about the failure is that the Soviet negotiations have been beset by minor difficulties some of which ought to have been avoided, and that as they progressed they departed from the principles agreed to by the President and M. Litvinov.

The first difficulty was the Johnson Act, which forbade loans to foreign governments in default, though it exempted the Export Bank as a government agency. The bank thereupon gratuitously accepted the conditions of this law. The second came when the State Department asked Attorney General Cummings for a ruling on whether the Soviet government was in default. In asking the opinion it did not inform him that the negotiations were on the basis, accepted by the President in his talks with M. Litvinov, of measuring claims against counter-claims. The Attorney General could hardly have ruled the Soviet government in default until the amount of counter-claims had been determined. But since the State Department did not mention counter-claims, the ruling came that the Soviet government was in default. Thereafter the State Department began haggling about credits. Now the Soviet government was not interested primarily in credits; what it wanted was friendship with America, and it was prepared to pay the awkward price of a left-handed recognition of the American loan to Kerensky, even though the loan bought supplies for Kolchak. We offered only short-term credits; the Soviet Ambassador was willing to take only a long-term loan. And there the negotiations almost collapsed, when M. Troyanovsky finally offered to compromise by taking half the credits for five years and the other half for twenty years. The State Department seemed to be annoyed at this, and the Soviet Ambassador returned to Moscow. At the time we could understand the mood of the State Department only by supposing that it was trying to put over the issue until after the November election. We were wrong. M. Troyanovsky returned to Washington and last week renewed his offer. He did not improve on it, and this, if the State Department thought it was out-bargaining the wily Easterners, may have been a shock to Secretary Hull's entourage. But the outcome was that after a five-minute interview the negotiations were not only broken off but ended with an emphasis that is anything but true diplomacy.

Thus is written a new chapter in the mismanagement of debt collections. What we have lost from Russia is not as great as the sums we might have collected from our former associates in the war, but it is considerable. We had a concrete offer of $100,000,000 to be paid us over a period of years in settlement of claims. The sum we asked was more, but we might have expected a compromise payment of around $150,000,000. We had in addition the promise of $200,000,000 in business for American firms. While the negotiations progressed, Russia's relations with France improved, so that what we offered in short-term credits was no better than what might have been obtained in Paris, perhaps even in Germany and Great Britain, without paying the price of appearing to recognize debts contracted by earlier Russian governments. At the same time the Soviets' need for foreign machinery decreased through the improvement of internal economic conditions. Yet the State Department took no account of these changes, consulted no interests of our own so far as we can see, and in the end slammed shut the door on further discussion. We must ask some questions. Who was it who insisted that the negotiations must end? Was it the President? Was it by any far-fetched chance Secretary Hull? Was it Mr. Kelley, chief of the Eastern European Division, who all along has appeared to have an animus against the Soviet government? If it was Mr. Kelley, how does it happen that he is allowed so much influence in American affairs? If, as we suspect, the negotiations failed simply through the ineptitude of the State Department, no answers to these questions need be expected.

Has Chiang Kai-shek Sold Out?

ON the basis of press reports, one would conclude that after a long period of quiet preparation Japan had suddenly resumed the use of forcible tactics to further its ambitions in China. The attack on Chahar and the skirmish with Outer Mongolian troops at Kalkha Miao are interpreted as efforts to intimidate Nanking so as to exact concessions which would otherwise be hard to win. This interpretation glosses over the basic fact of recent Sino-Japanese relations—that Chiang Kai-shek has worked hand in glove with the Japanese at every opportunity. No show of force is necessary to persuade Chiang that Japan can be of inestimable assistance in dealing with the Communists. Nor is it necessary for the purpose of strengthening Japan's military position with a view to a further attack on North China. The demilitarized zone created by the Tangku truce of May 31, 1933, has always been under the full control of the Japanese troops stationed along the Peiping-Shankaikuan railway. The Peiping Political Council—the dominant political body in North China—and the Hopei provincial government are completely under the thumb of Japan. In Nanking Japanese influence has been somewhat less direct but none the less effective. The new tariff schedules promulgated by the Nanking authorities in July, 1934, reduced the duties on all Japanese products, even to the extent of injuring domestic manufacturers, while increasing the levy on imports from other nations. These measures, together with the suppression of the anti-Japanese boycott, have brought Japanese trade virtually back to the 1931 level.

But Japanese ambitions have by no means been satisfied. There still remains a long list of specific demands, some of them running back to 1915, which Tokyo is pressing for acceptance. Primary among these is Japan's desire to finance the construction of a series of railways which would place North China in much the same position of economic dependence as Manchuria was in prior to 1931. Parallel to this is the demand that only Japanese capital be used for the development of agriculture and industry in the five northernmost provinces of China. Nanking is also being pressed to replace its present European and American technical advisers with Japanese, and to accept large loans for the reorganization and modernization of its army. There is even talk of inducing China to withdraw from the League in order to bring it more fully under the control of Japan. In exchange for these concessions, Japan stands ready to raise the rank of its envoy to that of ambassador and to render much-needed financial aid to the Nanking regime.

Obviously many of the above aspirations are in the nature of long-range objectives rather than immediate political issues. The proposed agreement for cooperation against the Communists and certain of the specific economic demands appear, however, to require immediate attention. In fact, it is highly probable that at least tentative arrangements on these points have already been concluded. Chiang's withdrawal of troops from North China, his consent to the appointment of Japanese advisers to towns in the demilitarized area, the recent reopening of postal service between China and Manchoukuo, and the drastic measures taken to curb anti-Japanese activity are explicable only on the basis of a definite understanding with Japan. Beyond this, however, Chiang cannot go without incurring widespread popular disapproval. Anti-Japanese sentiment is dormant, but it has by no means been crushed. To enter voluntarily into an open alliance with the Japanese against the Communists would be suicidal. But if it could be made to appear that these concessions were imposed upon Chiang by the superior force of Japanese arms, public opinion would be much less outraged. Such is the subtlety of Oriental diplomacy.

What we appear to be witnessing, then, is an attempt by Chiang Kai-shek to save his own neck by selling out to Japan. Suppressed by ruthless terrorism, the Chinese people are unable to prevent this betrayal. Never was the protection of such agreements as the Nine Power Pact more obviously required. Though the Open Door policy has frequently been used as a shield for dealings of an unsavory nature, it has at least been instrumental in preventing an unholy scramble for territorial booty in China. Yet for the United States to go out of its way to invoke the Open Door at the present moment would merely heighten Japanese resentment against this country. If any lesson is to be drawn from the experience of the last three years, it is that Japan is not to be swerved by spasmodic protests. Nothing short of joint action by all the powers can stave off an ultimate conflict for the mastery of the Far East. Because the United States is the one great power now outside the League, its responsibility is doubly great.

Terror in Arkansas

IN more fields than one the Roosevelt Administration's well-intentioned attempts to reconcile basic differences between those who have and those who have not have resulted only in defining the issues and precipitating actual conflict. Thus we have the strange spectacle of an out-and-out break between a liberal President and the American Federation of Labor, which has been able to get along with some of the most reactionary Presidents in our history—and the Administration faces a period of unprecedented labor strife. In the South one of the more tangible results of the policies of the AAA is the virtual reign of terror which cotton planters in eastern Arkansas are now conducting against share-croppers. The acreage-reduction plan was designed to raise the price of cotton and bring back prosperity to the whole South. It is being administered by Secretary Wallace, perhaps the most socially-minded member of the Roosevelt regime. Yet as a direct result of it thousands of share-croppers, whose poverty defies exaggeration and who obviously need help more than any other section of the farm population, face eviction; and their organization of a tenant-farmers' union, encouraged, no doubt, by the government's friendly attitude toward unionization, has provoked the present terror against them.

In last week's issue we commented on the arrest and conviction of Ward H. Rodgers in Marked Tree for "anarchy." Since then other partisans of the share-croppers, namely, Lucien Koch and Bob Reed of Commonwealth College, have been beaten up; and Mr. Rodgers has been arrested again, along with Mr. Koch and a third unnamed person, in the town of Lepanto, Arkansas. The motivation of these arrests was made clear by the mayor of the town himself. The three men were taken into custody while addressing a meeting of whites and Negroes. "They were talking about that 'share-cropper business,'" said the Mayor, "and were creating a lot of tension that was unnecessary." In another section of this issue William R. Amberson presents a thorough and authoritative survey of the "share-cropper business." We leave it to the reader to judge whether the tension was created by three men in Lepanto.

The Department of Agriculture has taken account of the terror in Arkansas in two important ways. It has sent an investigator, Mrs. Mary Connor Myers, to the region, and we can report that she is making a real investigation. She has actually talked to members of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union, which is more than her predecessors have done. What is even more to the point, the department, mainly because of pressure from the share-croppers' union, has held up rental and benefit payments to one of the most obdurate planters while his attempted eviction of many tenant families is under review. But the basic problem remains. It is impossible to reduce acreage 40 per cent without reducing the number of tenant farmers. What shall they do? Swell the army of the unemployed in the cities or remain in wretched hovels on the land with no income except from occasional labor at fifty cents or a dollar a day? The plight of the share-croppers presents one of the most dangerous and acute problems in the country. Only a fundamental change in the plantation system can solve it.

Issues and Men

Hitler After the Saar

THAT the overwhelming vote in the Saar and the return to Germany strengthened Hitler and the Nazis admits of no doubt. There will be a recrudescence of Nazi enthusiasm—and not only in Germany. We shall undoubtedly see a flaring up of the Nazi movement in Austria, which must be Hitler's next objective in his plan of building in Central Europe the greatest German power ever witnessed. Just who owns Hitler today it is difficult to say. The great industrialists as a whole, of course, are in control; and Schacht is becoming more and more powerful, not only because of his great ability and his economic shrewdness, but because he is successfully eliminating those who oppose his policies and those who, like Gottfried Feder, stood for the original National Socialist program. As for the position of the Reichswehr, that remains in doubt. Since the extraordinary conclave of Nazi party leaders and army and navy officers at the State Opera House in Berlin at the beginning of the year, it has been accepted that the Reichswehr has won complete supremacy in the defense field, with the special Hitler troops—the S. S.—and what remains of the Storm Troopers—the S. A.—subordinated to it.

Sensational newspapers here and elsewhere prophesied before the Saar vote that there would be another bloody purge of the Nazi Party when the Saar was out of the way. There is no evidence to prove that this is on the boards at present, but one of the most competent American observers is of the opinion that there will be another convulsion within the Nazi Party in February or March. The conflict between those poor dupes of Hitler who really thought that he meant what he said when he promised them a Socialist program and those who stand with their leaders cannot be ended by terror. The only planks of his platform that Hitler has really lived up to are those relating to the Jews; everything else is in abeyance, and if anyone questions him about it, he is in a position to recall the number of times he has said that the party must have at least five years to put through its program—it will be easy enough to find other excuses when the five years are up. Meanwhile he continues to stress that there are 3,410,000 fewer unemployed than there were when he took office, though the number of the jobless increased by 252,000 during December, with the total standing at 2,604,000. Even Hitler only claims that 2,500,000 have been regularly employed at regular wages. The rest of the reduction is accounted for by the number working at nominal wages in the labor camps and as farm and domestic helpers. The gain in employment has been chiefly due to the rearming of Germany, the making of munitions, guns, airplanes, and so on. Also, large numbers of persons—Communists, Socialists, Jews—were thrown off the roster and have to find a means of living as best they can. Even the Institute for Business Research admits that the domestic boom created by the government through credit inflation is slowing down, chiefly because of the growing shortage of raw material, which is beginning to be more and more serious despite the legerdemain of Schacht. The latest letters from Germany seem to indicate a growing unrest because of the continuation of the economic distress.

It would be wrong, however, to assume that Hitler's own position has as yet been shaken in any degree. The callousness of the German people as a whole to the blood purge of June 30 remains inexplicable. True, there is evidence of an increase in outspoken criticism. One hears of men criticizing the regime freely in public restaurants without lowering their voices. It is known that there is growing unrest among the editors of what is left of the press of the country. Occasionally through the dispatches we hear of prominent men being sent to prison, as was the distinguished scholar and philosopher Professor Johannes Leisegang of the University of Jena, who was jailed at the beginning of December for having said that Hitler's speech at the bier of Hindenburg was only electioneering, and that it was "a dishonor for a common soldier to deliver the funeral oration for a Field Marshal." Professor Karl Barth got off without a prison sentence but he lost his professorship at Bonn chiefly because of his failure to give the Hitler salute at the beginning and close of every lecture!

As for the Jews, their plight is worse than ever, and Americans must not be misled as to this by the inability of our newspapers to print details. As one correspondent has pointed out, the Nazis have improved their diabolical technique and no longer allow as much news of their repressions to come out. But we have recently received some facts in the report of the first year's activities of the Jewish Central Committee in Germany, which was created in the summer of 1933. The committee estimates that 60,000 German Jews and 25,000 of foreign citizenship have left the country. About 2,000 Jewish civil employees of university training have been discharged, and about 4,000 Jewish lawyers have been ousted from the profession. Some 4,000 Jewish physicians also have been forbidden to act as panel doctors, or have been discharged from positions in hospitals and public and private institutions. No fewer than 2,000 of these are now in need of charity. Eight hundred Jewish professors have been expelled from the universities, practically all of the 1,200 journalists and writers have been discharged or forbidden to publish any work, and 2,000 Jewish actors, singers, and vaudeville artists are debarred from earning a living. Some 35,000 Jewish employees of banks, business houses, and industries have applied to the committee for aid, together with 90,000 shopkeepers and other business men. Yet Dr. Wilhelm Frick, the Nazi Minister of Interior, solemnly declares that "no Jew has a right to complain of unjust treatment in Germany." The obvious and malign falsity of this statement is characteristic of the whole Nazi leadership.

Bruce Garrison Villard

A Cartoon by LOW

The Hill-Billies Come to Detroit

By LOUIS ADAMIC

Detroit, January 25

THE automobile industry, as you may have read in the daily press, is having the best beginning of a new year since 1929. The New York Automobile Show was a vast success. As I write, it is reported that similar shows, with their attractive new models, are very successful also in other large cities throughout the country. Orders are pouring into Detroit. Some of the departments of the Ford plants are working in three shifts six days a week. Several General Motors plants operate in two shifts seven days a week. Tens of thousands of men and women have been put to work in recent months in various branches of the great motor industry, and more are being employed weekly—not only in Detroit, but to a lesser extent in some of the smaller towns nearby as well. A number of Detroit boosters to whom I talked gave me glowing accounts of the sudden upswing in the industry. Things are starting to hum again: no maybe about it. They all used the word “hum.” And to my question about the labor situation they replied—most of them, it is true, with a suggestion of uneasiness—that there was nothing to worry about. Yes, all was quiet. . . . No, no; absolutely no danger of a general auto strike this year, nor anything resembling real trouble.

I met several intelligent workers, one or two would-be labor leaders, some red agitators, a number of white-collar employees of automobile plants, and miscellaneous citizens of my acquaintance who are vaguely radical, progressive, or liberal and more or less informed about what is going on in Detroit's leading business. Talking with these people I became convinced that despite prophecies last year of impending trouble in 1935 there is no possibility of any great upheaval in the motor industry during the current high-production season, nor, as a matter of something a little more substantial than a guess, later in this year. But by this I do not mean that the labor situation in Detroit is anything to be happy about. It is not.

Detroit still has 52,000 families, or approximately a quarter of a million people, on various forms of relief, while there are somewhere between 50,000 and 75,000 unemployed persons in the city who, chiseling along in other ways, are not on relief. In some of the automobile plants employment lately went up as much as 100 per cent, whereas the relief burden was decreased only about 20 per cent. The explanations for this discrepancy are interesting.

For one thing, the companies have hired great numbers of girls and young women with no previous experience in the automobile industry; in many departments of the intricate but superbly organized production process no experience is necessary. These girls were given and continue to be given jobs in preference to experienced and physically better-equipped male workers. The companies' theory—no doubt very sound—is that women and girls are not as apt to join unions or become otherwise troublesome as men. And many of these new automotive workers come not from families on relief but from a slightly higher economic level—again because such persons, not having been exposed to the extreme hardships and humiliations of the jobless, are less likely to respond to labor-union agitation than the ex-unemployed.

The automobile manufacturers' labor policy is this: The industry must not be unionized, and to keep the unions from gaining a foothold, we must take every precaution and spare no expense. Among the experienced automotive workers living in Detroit and the vicinity, only those have been and are being rehired whom the plant employment managers personally know to be “safe,” or who can secure personal O.K.'s from prominent citizens in Detroit, such as well-known judges and commanders of American Legion posts. Workers known to be inclined, however slightly, toward unionism or radicalism are almost generally taboo in the production department, whether on relief or not. Those hired are watched by stool pigeons, who in some plants go so far as to search the men's overcoat pockets for possible radical literature.

Apparently there is a great dearth of “safe” workers in Detroit. In recent months, with production increasing, it has been necessary for the companies to bring in tens of thousands of people from outside, principally from the South, and put them to work in the busy plants. For months now the companies have been sending their labor agents to recruit hill-billies from Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, and Alabama. These hill-billies are for the most part impoverished whites, “white trash” or a little better, from the rural regions. The majority of them are young fellows. They have had no close contact with modern industry or with labor unionism—this, of course, is their best qualification. Their number in Detroit is variously estimated as between fifteen and thirty thousand, with more of them coming weekly, not only in company-chartered buses but singly and in small groups on their own hook, for no one has a better chance of employment in Detroit these days than a Southerner of unsophisticated mien. They are employed at simple, standardized tasks in production departments, for which very little or no training is necessary, at 45 or 50 cents an hour, except in Ford's, where the wages are slightly higher. These workers are happy to receive this pay and are much “safer”—for the next few months, anyhow, while big production is on—than local labor, poisoned by ideas of unionism and perhaps even more dangerous notions.

The hill-billies, with their extremely low standard of living and lack of acquaintance with modern plumbing, are looked down upon by all but the most intelligent local workers, both native and foreign-born; they are despised also—indeed, mainly—because they take employment away from the old-time automotive workers. This, naturally, is agreeable to the geniuses running the Automobile Chamber of Commerce. In fact, it is exactly what they want. It splits the workers still more. Any kind of solidarity between these newcomers and old-time Detroiters is out of the question in the immediate future. It takes ■■ American worker ■■ long while to assimilate the union idea; and these unfortunate Southerners—though just now most of them consider themselves extremely fortunate—are nothing if not Americans.

It is all very, very clever, and it will take the labor movement, such as it is, some time to devise the strategy and tactics to cope effectively with this latest of dirty tricks played upon the workers by the automobile tycoons and their brain-guys. Individual proletarians, however, already are inventing counter-tricks. To crash a job at a plant one man I know practiced up on the Southern dialect and drawl, then presented himself at the factory gates, and was hired as soon as he opened his mouth. Another good way for a man to get a job in Detroit, I am told, is to look and act stupid.

Do the people of Detroit as a whole know about this importation of workers from the South? The newspapers, I have been informed, never mention it. Naturally not. They are strongly in favor of the automobile industry remaining open shop. The same is true of important people in the city in general. Anything is justified to keep out the unions, which to them signify only trouble. They are willing to contribute to relief; they are willing to do almost anything to keep the industry from being "strangled to death by the unions." Of course, most of the big people deny that the companies are importing outsiders wholesale. An important engineer of a great body plant, however, said to me: "The industry's been in the red for years. Now for the first time since the depression began it looks as though a nice profit is probable. Can't you see the manufacturers' point of view? Can you blame them, things being as they are, if they take precautions—if they insure themselves against possible interference with production? True, some of the people brought into the city will be 'dumped,' as you say, into the lap of Detroit when high production ends in April or May, but what is more important to Detroit—the fact that the industry goes on humming uninterrupted or the danger that the city will have ten or fifteen thousand more relief cases in May? Anyhow, I believe that both the city and the industry figure that they'll deal with that in May. No use crossing bridges till you come to them. That's the American way." He smiled. I said that it seemed to me a bit cruel to bring in these people from the South, then dump them. "That may be true in some cases," was the answer, "but in a big thing like this and in serious times like the present you can't worry about that. The automobile industry is the most important industry in the country. The prosperity of other important industries depends on it."

The middle-class and lower-middle-class people are more or less aware of the importations of workers but are too full of troubles of their own to try to do anything about them. Petty landlords and realtors who have rented their vacant houses to the hill-billies complain that their tenants, unappreciative of modern appliances, are damaging their properties. The automobile workers, particularly the unemployed, feel the angriest about the importations, but are largely helpless against them. They have no organization through which to act, no power. Their anger is directed chiefly against the hill-billies.

There is but one union in the automobile industry of any consequence, and this one of no great consequence—the Mechanics' Educational Society of America, an independent organization essentially interested only in the "aristocracy" of automotive labor, the tool-and-die men. The A. F. of L. momentarily is embarking on an "organization campaign," but anyone who knows anything in Detroit knows that the campaign is only a lot of empty motions, that in all probability the organizers are closer to the brain-guys of the Automobile Chamber of Commerce than they are to the organized workers. A number of federal unions have been formed in the past year, but none have any numerical or other strength, while scores of plants have large unions under "safe leadership."

Speed-up is the rule in nearly all plants, and big sections of automobile labor have other grievances which make them anything but anti-union, but the A. F. of L. organizers, living in good hotels and taxiing about the town, are careful to do nothing to inspire them with courage to join the union in the face of the employers' fierce and consistent opposition. In mid-February the kingpin of American labor, William Green, is expected to visit the automobile centers; the occasion doubtless will be marked by the customary geysers of blah and bluff which have marked the A. F. of L. campaign so far. The rank-and-filers will be told again to put their trust in the tried-and-true leadership of the great Federation. But it is obvious that the Federation has no desire to organize the industry. Its immediate motive is merely to prevent the appearance of some new organization which eventually might succeed in unionizing the industry and then possibly become a rival of the A. F. of L. in other fields.

The Communist Party in Detroit has a large apparatus, but owing to the Communists' serious tactical blunders in the past it is totally isolated from the masses of workers and therefore of no immediate importance. The American Workers' Party, now the Workers' Party of the United States, whose tactics were so successful in Toledo last year, is just beginning to get a foothold in Detroit, but is practically incapable of developing any real power during 1935. The tactics of the Workers' Party, I understand, will be to attend A. F. of L. mass-meetings and develop rank-and-file pressure upon the A. F. of L. "organizers."

In brief, no big movement or upheaval is possible. Possible, however, are small local blow-ups. The only important plant in the automobile industry which is effectively organized is the Auto-Lite in Toledo, the scene of the serious strike last spring led by the aggressive A. W. P. strike tacticians. The federal union there, I am told, is in better condition now than it was when the strike was called last year. Its leadership is more militant and vastly more intelligent than it was early in 1934. It is under the influence of the A. W. P. A new explosion in Toledo is possible. The managers of Auto-Lite, at any rate, seem to think so. This time last year they employed about two thousand workers. Today their working force is over five thousand. The explanation is not only that production has gone up generally but that Auto-Lite fears a possible shut-down in March or April. If a new strike occurs in Toledo, it probably will be fiercer and bloodier than the last. Behind Auto-Lite will be, as in the last strike, the power of the entire automobile industry, while on the workers' side will be much of the militancy developed in the 1934 struggle and vastly more experienced leadership. The most important factor working against the strike is the general socio-economic situation in Toledo, which has improved somewhat in the last five months, superficially at any rate. Fundamentally the situation is practically the same. One out of every three and a half persons in the city is still on relief, and it must be remembered that it was the unemployed who so largely contributed to the fury of the 1934 incident.

Social Security in Great Britain

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

SOCIAL insurance in Great Britain had a stormy birth and has led an embattled life. Now that the system is established, unemployment insurance in particular having been fundamentally overhauled last year, the completed whole is much more like a full-grown complex city, let us say, than a lucid scale-drawing of plans. Certain elements in it are easy to pick out and describe, but a detailed and accurate study requires involved explanations of how some of its features came to take their present form. These explanations are important if one is to understand the scheme, and yet they are irrelevant if the scheme is to be used in comparing standards with those of another country. The British system even has a vocabulary of its own, part of it incomprehensible here. And the history of British social legislation, since much of it was devised to modify purely local adaptations of the insurance idea, makes tediously dry reading to all but specialists.

The British security program was enacted in three separate steps. First came small non-contributory old-age pensions for those over seventy and without more than a very low minimum income. This was enacted in 1908. It was essentially a relief measure, taking the place of private charity, then widely organized for this purpose. This was a prelude to the great insurance venture of 1911, when Great Britain embarked on health and unemployment insurance. It was only a partial beginning of unemployment insurance, but the health-insurance scheme was full-fledged and embraced the entire working population on a basis which stands today without major alteration. Contributory old-age pensions and pensions for widows and orphans were added in 1925.

The conception prevalent in this country until recently that British social insurance was the creation of British Socialists is altogether wrong. When Britain went off the gold standard, after a minority Labor government had been in office, many fell into the error of charging socialism with the responsibility of wrecking the British budget through unemployment insurance, and thus destroying British credit. But even at this time Britain had no Socialist government. It had a Labor government which did not command a majority in Parliament and could remain in office only by refraining from any truly Socialist efforts. The British scheme of social security must be written to the credit of Liberals and Conservatives. Labor governments managed for a time to liberalize payments and regulations, but they did not initiate anything essential in the scheme itself. Liberals are responsible for nearly all of it. Asquith was Prime Minister in 1908, when the first pension act was passed. Lloyd George was the Chancellor of the Exchequer who forced through health and unemployment insurance in 1911. And Winston Churchill, then a recent convert to conservatism, was the Tory Chancellor who in 1925 made old-age pensions contributory and added pensions for widows and orphans.

It may be that social security can be enacted in the United States without the long and strong conflict it has had to endure in Great Britain. Lloyd George's espousal of the principle in 1911 shook London to its foundations, and the hostility between him and the financial interests led to murmurs of revolt, even revolution. The growth of the system was immeasurably facilitated by the outbreak of the World War. Insurance as an issue was forgotten. By the end of the war it was working, and was at hand to help solve some of the terrifying problems of demobilization. But the struggle was often resumed after the depression of 1921, and since then has become at times a bitter one between the niggardly policy of the Conservatives and the demand of Labor for a decent living standard as a right of citizenship.

The British scheme was changed last year in one fundamental which in a way compares with present-day thought in this country. A distinction was accepted between employables and unemployables, and separate treatment was provided for each class. Employables in the British act are called "able-bodied unemployed persons in need of relief." But whereas the President's program intends to employ such persons in public-works projects at depressed wages, the British attitude is wholly different. In Great Britain relief is paid in cash in almost all cases. The government accepts responsibility for employables even if they are not protected by unemployment insurance—agricultural workers and domestic servants are still excluded from insurance, though plans are being drawn for the inclusion of agricultural workers. The scheme takes in even the non-manual (white-collar) workers with less than $1,250 income a year who are not in business for themselves. This is the first assumption of responsibility for employables as a whole by the central government. It formerly rested with local authorities, the county and borough officials, and relief might be administered generously in a radical county and ungenerously in a tory one, or be dangerously inadequate because of shortage of funds. Now the purpose is to establish unemployment insurance and relief on a sound basis, administer it by permanent officials not directly responsible to Parliament, and remove the whole system from the domain of politics. The funds for the relief of employables are theoretically contributed by the local authorities in conjunction with the government. But the greater part of the burden, about 95 per cent, is borne by the national treasury.

A "means test" is applied to those in receipt of such relief, but the conditions laid down are more generous than they were before the act was passed. Thus if a man owns a house, he is not required to borrow on it or sell it. If a person has money from health insurance, the first $1.75 is not counted, nor is any maternity benefit, nor the first $5 of a war pension, nor one-half of workmen's compensation, nor the first $125 invested or in cash. The amount of the allowance will vary according to need, and in certain cases will be even greater than the unemployment-insurance benefit.

To come now to the essentials of the British insurance system. Unemployment insurance is to be distinguished from relief and is contributory. The employer pays one-third of the cost on the theory that he benefits from maintaining his labor reserves; the worker contributes one-third and the theory that he is making an enforced saving to protect him against the slumps of the trade cycle; the state pays one-third to justify its use of compulsion in setting up the scheme. Contributions vary for age and sex groups. Men pay 20 cents a week, women 18 cents, boys from 10 to 18 cents, girls from 9 to 16 cents. Benefits begin after a waiting period of six days and continue for twenty-six weeks, though the time is extended if the applicant has a long insurance record, and can be as long as a year. Single men receive in benefits $4.25 a week, women $3.75, boys from $1.50 to $3.50, and girls from $1.25 to $3. Allowance for an adult dependent is $2.25 and for each dependent child 50 cents. Thus a married man with four children draws $8.50 a week, or twice the amount for a single man.

Theoretically, the British scheme operates through a national chain of labor exchanges, which it was hoped would become the chief agency in placing people in jobs. The exchanges are of great service, since they are the local administrative offices of the system. But only about one-fourth of the jobs have been filled through the exchanges, and while resort to them by employers has increased, this feature has been a disappointment and remains a weakness in the plan.

Health insurance in Great Britain is less discussed than unemployment insurance, but it has been a notable success. The unemployment-insurance fund is notoriously in debt, but the health-insurance system is financially sound and today derives more than 18 per cent of its income from interest on investments. But the success is due in part to conditions in Great Britain prior to 1911 which cannot be duplicated elsewhere. Nearly half the workers at that time were members of private societies which provided health insurance in one form or other. And when the state scheme was adopted, it was built on the foundation of these approved or "friendly" societies. Some of them had large reserves, and today some societies are able to pay out a wider range of benefits than others. Every insured person either belongs to a society—which the greater part choose to do—or his contributions go into a postal-savings account, which can give him only sparing returns. The friendly societies are non-profit-making and are under strict supervision of the government. The state collects the contributions and apportion them to the societies for the distribution of benefits.

As with unemployment insurance, the contribution is made for the worker by his employer—it is by a system of stamps on a card—and the employer, worker, and state pay a share. A man pays 9 cents a week to his employer's 9 cents; a woman pays 8 cents to her employer's 9 cents, and the state pays one-seventh of the benefit given the man and one-fifth of the benefit to the woman. Benefits are of two kinds, cash and services. A man receives $3.75 a week while sick, a spinster $3, a married woman $2.50. There is a smaller disablement benefit, $1.87 for a man, $1.50 for a spinster, and $1.25 for a married woman. An insured wife gets a $10 maternity benefit. There is sanitarium treatment for tuberculosis patients, and societies with surpluses are able to add dental care, treatment by specialists, home nursing, hospital care, and even distress grants. In addition, every insured person has all "proper and necessary" treatment from a physician free of charge, as well as needed drugs.

This last aspect of medical care was fought by the British physicians at the beginning, and is still resisted by some. Doctors are not compelled, however, to serve insurance patients. They are rewarded if they do by a payment of so much per person under their care, and the average income of "panel" doctors from this part of their practice in 1929 was $2,100. Many complaints are made by patients that panel doctors keep them waiting intolerable hours, but the wider observation is that doctors have an opportunity to treat minor complaints and watch for early symptoms which ultimately reduces their work and greatly benefits their patients.

The health-insurance scheme as it now stands cares for over 17,000,000 persons, all of them entitled to the minimum benefits described. Of this number 12,500,000 have in addition dental care, 11,500,000 have free or cheapened optical treatment, 11,000,000 receive surgical appliances free, 10,000,000 are entitled to part cost of convalescence homes, 7,500,000 receive part cost of hospital treatment, and 5,000,000 can have home nursing for serious illness.

To Americans the British old-age, widows', and orphans' pension scheme will sound grossly inadequate. With the figures of Dr. Townsend and Huey Long ringing in our ears, the weekly $2.50 paid to a man or woman at sixty-five becomes almost absurd. And to receive an old-age pension a man must have contributed 9 cents a week to his employer's 9 cents, a woman 4 cents to her employer's 5 cents, and the government makes up the difference in cost. The widow receives the full $2.50, and the pensioner's orphan $1.87. A widow also has $1.25 for her eldest child and 75 cents for each other child.

Had the system started out with a fund to make it self-liquidating the government would have had to find $3,000,000,000 at the outset. It chose instead to pay out of current revenue what was needed each year. Even after the whole population is in the scheme, making contributions from childhood, the government in eighty years will be contributing an annual subsidy of $438,000,000 or about one-seventh of the present British budget. This scheme was added to social security by Winston Churchill, and at the outset it was looked upon with much enthusiasm. Tories preened themselves on being disciples of Disraeli and having a progressive social outlook. But when their financial experts began studying its future, many of them changed their minds, and I believe if the Conservative Party had it to do over again, it would leave old-age pensions strictly alone.

What is hard to explain in a country without a working security system is the difference it makes in the state of mind of a country. The mental background of the British is more peaceful than ours, not because of pride in the rising level of humanity, but because of the greatly enhanced safety. The social system, they feel there, has been fundamentally rebuilt though they still have a capitalist society. What is more, the security system is regarded not as a transition to a new Socialist order but as essential to the preservation of capitalism. The establishment of the system is recognized as the biggest thing the country has done in a generation. And many believe that Lloyd George, who is more responsible for it than any other individual, will be placed higher for it in history than for his leadership in helping win the war. And from conversation with him on this point I can say that he thinks so himself.

[This is the second of a series of four articles analyzing the approach to social security in various countries. The third, on social insurance in the Scandinavian countries, will appear in an early issue.]

The White House Breaks with Labor

Washington, February 4

DONALD RICHBERG came out of the President's office at the White House last Wednesday with Clay Williams, president of the NIRB, and Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., and Walter P. Chrysler, the automobile manufacturers. The manufacturers hurried away to escape the waiting newspapermen. Richberg, his arms up over his head, playfully made as though to charge through them, then laughingly pulled up. It was the buffoonery of a prominent man who shows that he can be one of the boys. He was asked if he had any statement to make. The automobile code was to expire the next night, and everyone knew it had been under discussion. "We have had a series of conferences with all parties concerned," began Mr. Richberg, but he was interrupted. "Including labor?" spoke up an incredulous voice. "Yes." "Who for labor?" the voice pressed. "I won't make any statement about that," said Mr. Richberg, obviously annoyed, and went on to say that the news about the code would be given out by Mr. Williams at nine o'clock that night.

The scene, with its false good cheer and Mr. Richberg's prevarication about the consultation with labor, was characteristic of the deception and superficiality with which the amended code was imposed on the industry. Labor was not consulted. Later the President explained that he knew the attitude of labor because he had had letters a month before. Mr. Richberg, however, again and again asserted categorically that labor had been consulted, and Mr. Williams concurred, though neither would name the labor representative. A newspaperman told Mr. Richberg that Mr. Green and Mr. Dillon (of the automobile workers' union) both denied that labor had been consulted. "I don't believe it," he said. "You believe that they were consulted, or you don't believe they denied it?" the correspondent asked. "I don't believe that they denied it." It was strange for newspapermen to be called mendacious, and most of them had heard the denial of Green and Dillon. Mr. Richberg apparently was satisfied that a month-old letter was a consultation, in the kind of intellectual hide-and-seek which certain men and women in high places play with truth. Subsequently even the President took a hand in the befuddlement by saying at his press conference that the Wolman board had not been incorporated in the code as an amendment, though there it was, amendment number four, for all to read. Only one explanation of the President's denial is possible, and pitiful as it may be it is the most charitable explanation to be made of the whole episode of the code. The President did not realize what he was doing or remember accurately what he had done. He had been told that the automobile workers themselves were in favor not of the A. F. of L. or company unions but of works councils, and so he believed he could dismiss the A. F. of L. without injustice. Since he saw no labor officials he could not learn that Dr. Leo Wolman had chosen for elections those plants where the unions were weak, and could not inquire to what extent the order of the union to boycott the election was being obeyed. He is in that dangerous position, also occupied by Frances Perkins, of considering himself a benefactor of labor, hence above co-operation with it and certainly above criticism.

The President's disregard of organized labor is not the only astonishing feature of the imposed code. To carry through his agreement with the manufacturers he had to override the NIRB, which is in charge of all codes since the departure of General Johnson. This board consists of five men, S. Clay Williams and Arthur D. Whiteside representing the employers, Sidney Hillman and Leon C. Marshall representing labor, and Walton H. Hamilton representing the consumers. Leon Henderson, director of research and planning, and Blackwell Smith, general counsel, are members without votes. The amendments were sent from the White House to this board, which stood five to two against them, the employer members opposed to the rest. The Wolman board was not the only basis of the NIRB's objections. It saw in the amendments of the hours provisions the sabotage of the whole campaign to shorten hours in industry. The arrangement is not what it looks to be. It seems to give to 80 per cent of the workers an average of forty-hour weeks through a year, allowing forty-eight hours a week to be worked at certain periods, with over-time rates not effective until more than forty-eight hours are worked. But as the average working time in a year is not much more than five months, this means that these men are made to work forty-eight hours when they do work, and the forty-hour week is a myth. The tool-and-die makers, one-fifth of all workers, who prepare machinery for making new models, have an average forty-two-hour week under the code, and they alone draw over-time pay. What the board proposed was to bring this class into the forty-hour average, and have over time for them and all other workers begin after forty-two hours. The President and Mr. Richberg would not hear of it. They went ahead, amended the code on the forty-eight-hour basis, and left the shorter-hour campaign of the NRA on a siding. The NIRB saw the folly of forcing the Wolman board upon labor and proposed to change it by giving it the structure and legal standing of the steel and textile boards existing under Public Resolution No. 44. This was not an ideal solution but it at least gave labor something different from the Wolman board, which it openly refuses to use. But this serviceable suggestion also was unheeded at the White House.

The first result has been to put labor into a needed mood of self-service. It has given up the sneaking hope that the Santa in the White House might go on bringing gifts after Christmas. There will be a strike in the automobile industry, and it will be bitter, since it will be the first openly anti-Administration strike under the New Deal. In Washington labor moves its battleground from the White House to the Hill. It is going after legislation and believes that Congress is to the left of the President on labor policy. The A. F. of L. ought to have organized the automobile industry a hundred per cent as its first privilege, but it went about the task with a defeatist psychology. Now the great face-slap by the President has sent the blood of labor leaders tingling.

R. G. S.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter had somehow overlooked the Dobuans until Margaret Mead, reviewing Ruth Benedict's "Patterns of Culture" in The Nation, referred to them casually but succinctly as "the morose paranoid Dobuans of New Guinea." Having read Mrs. Benedict's book, the Drifter can report that his most sadistic expectations were realized. The Dobuans, whom Miss Mead described in her cool scientific phrase, are, in a layman's word, the meanest people on earth; and as such their activities have all the horrible fascination of one of those Laurel and Hardy comedies which progress from disaster to disaster and end in utter destruction—as spectators howl with delight.

COMPETITION is the moving force of life in Dobu. And it has been developed to such a point that social forms, to quote Mrs. Benedict, "put a premium upon ill-will and treachery and make of them the recognized virtues of their society." Hostility is the common social attitude and a smiling countenance is frowned upon with a frown of which only a Dobuan is capable.

Dobuan social organization is arranged in concentric circles, within each of which specified traditional forms of hostility are allowed. No man takes the law into his own hands except to carry out these culturally allowed hostilities within the appropriate specified group. The largest functioning Dobuan grouping is a named locality of some four to twenty villages. It is the war unit and is on terms of permanent international hostility with every other similar locality.

There is one group, called the susu, the group of the mother's line, which is allowed to practice a limited internal harmony. But its larger social function is to increase hostility, particularly between husbands and wives and between fathers and children, who may meet after the mother's death only by invitation of the susu. Needless to say, the Dobuans find in marriage the greatest scope for their unusual talents, and Mrs. Benedict's account could not be improved.

Marriage, of course, must be with someone outside [the susu]. It remains within the locality and therefore it allies two villages between which enmity runs high. . . . Marriage is set in motion by a hostile act of the mother-in-law. She blocks with her own person the door of her house, within which the youth is sleeping with her daughter, and he is trapped for the public ceremony of betrothal.

The marriage ceremony itself is a very unfriendly and dour affair at which each bridal group pretends not to see the other or "if they must notice the other party, they glare with hostility." Husband and wife are allowed to live together, but only at a terrible price. From marriage until death the couple live in alternate years in the village of the husband and the village of the wife, and by tradition the unlucky spouse who is on alien territory must accept humiliation as his due. He is a perpetual outsider until the next year, when he may retaliate—and does.

The village in which the couple are living at the moment is seldom satisfied with the behavior of the spouse who has married in. . . . Faithfulness is not expected between husband and wife. . . . adultery is a favorite pastime. . . . It is a matter of profoundest concern to the outraged spouse. He (it is as likely to be she) bribes the children for information. . . . He quarrels with [his wife] violently and no quarrel can go unheard in Dobu. . . .

Thus even the virtuous-sounding requirement that a husband and wife maintain a common domicile becomes in Dobu merely another incentive to hostility; for circumstances make the common domicile so difficult that it often destroys the marriage.

THE Drifter has quoted enough to give some idea of the charming life of the Dobuans (and to indicate the fascination of Mrs. Benedict's book.) Needless to say, their business relationships among themselves—they are mostly concerned with yams—as well as with other peoples are characterized by lying, double-dealing, in fact, every simple or subtle form of treachery. The Drifter feels it would be superfluous also to point obvious morals. It remains to be said that the Dobuans, like the citizens of more civilized countries, are victims of an economy of scarcity. Their islands are bare volcanic upcroppings; and their population is much too large for their resources. Competition, by insuring the greatest harm to the greatest number, tends to keep the population down. Finally, it must be pointed out that the economy of scarcity to which Dobuan meanness can be traced differs in one important respect from the scarcity to be met with, say, in America: it is natural and not man-made.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Elect Maurice Sugar!

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

An unusual opportunity is facing Detroit workers and all progressive people in the non-partisan elections for judge of the Recorder's Court to be held on March 4. The entire labor movement from right to left has joined in supporting the candidacy of Maurice Sugar, who for more than twenty years has been Michigan's foremost labor attorney. Mr. Sugar has been indorsed by the Detroit and Wayne County Federation of Labor, the Mechanics' Educational Society of America, the Society of Designing Engineers, the Trade Union Unity League, the Communist Party, the International Labor Defense, and numerous other groups. These organizations, so widely divergent in aims and tactics, are all agreed that the election of Maurice Sugar would greatly further the cause of labor. We believe that this accord is unique not only in the history of the Detroit labor movement, but of the American labor movement as a whole.

Mr. Sugar has a record of which any man might be proud. He is not of that dubious group that style themselves—especially before elections—"friends of labor." He is of the labor movement, has been completely identified with it throughout his distinguished legal career, has fought and made sacrifices in defense of the rights of labor. In more than twenty years of practice Mr. Sugar has represented labor organizations of every economic and political complexion, but never once an employer as such. During the war he was of that valiant band who risked their all in opposing the war hysteria; as a result, he spent a year in prison. Today he is continuing the fight against reaction as a leading member of the American League Against War and Fascism.

Here are some of the outstanding labor cases in which he has appeared:

He exposed the reactionary interests behind the bill to register and finger-print foreign-born persons, which was rushed through the 1931 Michigan legislature. As a result of this fight the Federal Court declared the bill unconstitutional.

As attorney for Jesse Crawford, Negro worker, he won the fight to prevent his extradition to the Georgia chain gang (January, 1933).

He secured an injunction (January, 1933) to prevent the Board of Education and the city government from diverting $2,000,000 from teachers' salaries and schools to pay interest to Wall Street bankers.

He is attorney in the Michigan Red Flag case now pending in the state Supreme Court, in which two workers are facing long imprisonment because a red flag was raised in a Finnish workers' children's camp where they were instructors.

He successfully defended James Victory, Negro worker, who faced life imprisonment last summer on a framed charge of having attacked and robbed a white woman.

In all these cases, as in hundreds of others, Mr. Sugar served without fee. On various occasions he has acted as attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union and the International Labor Defense. Nation readers will recall Mr. Sugar as the author of Michigan Passes the "Spolansky Act" in the issue of July 8, 1931, and of Bullets—Not Food—for Ford Workers in that of March 23, 1932.

While all progressive forces in Detroit are united to elect Maurice Sugar, the forces of reaction, dominated by the open-shop automobile companies, are equally united to prevent it, and they have powerful backing, political and financial, as well as a press that is always at their service. Because we feel that the fight to elect the first militant labor judge in the country has more than local significance, we are appealing to labor organizations and to all progressive and liberal people everywhere to help. Funds are urgently needed to carry on an effective campaign. Those who desire to make contributions can send them to the campaign headquarters, 1010 Barlum Tower, Detroit, Michigan.

Detroit, February 1 N. J. BICKNELL, M.D., Chairman
Maurice Sugar Campaign Committee

The Carl Mackley Apartments

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The paragraph in The Nation of January 16 describing the Carl Mackley Apartments built by the American Federation of Hosiery Workers in Philadelphia, while correct in the main, is apt to give a misleading impression.

A personal visit to the apartments revealed that a five-room apartment rents for $52.50 a month and the lowest rent available is $25.50 per month for two rooms and bath. While the rooms are, as you say, well lighted and ventilated, they are very small. Electric current for all purposes is included in the rent but the electric refrigerator must be provided by the tenant. People from the slums cannot afford such rents, and since no slums were cleared away for these buildings, the project can hardly be called slum clearance. Actually, more desirable accommodations can be obtained for less money right in the center of the city, while the new project entails thirty-five minutes' riding by elevated. Up to a week ago only twelve of the 284 units had been rented. The enterprise, after all is a purely speculative one. Whether it can be made "self-liquidating" is questionable. The Hosiery Workers are exactly on the plane of a private contractor who builds with the hope of making a profit.

Hosiery workers are among the aristocrats of labor, both in their hours of labor and their rates of pay. They, perhaps, can afford to pay such rents. Certainly labor in Philadelphia as a whole cannot. As "a challenge to labor the country over to seek improved living conditions," the Mackley houses simply will not function.

Philadelphia, January 14

THOMAS C. SHAFFER

Grateful for the Truth

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

At a general meeting of the San Francisco Bay Newspaper Guild on January 20 the membership unanimously voted a resolution of thanks and appreciation to The Nation for its courage in printing the article Not Fit to Print.

The newspapermen and women of the San Francisco Bay region, who have been waging a desperate struggle for guild existence in the face of heart-breaking pressure, are grateful for an article in which the facts are unvarnished, the truth clearly apparent. We feel particularly encouraged because The Nation has not been muzzled by two-faced publishers who scream "freedom of the press" in the morning and spend the afternoon hiring $15 a week reporters, cutting wages to starvation levels, and throwing veteran men into the street because they didn't wear the right-color necktie.

Once more, therefore, the San Francisco Bay Newspaper Guild expresses deep appreciation to the editors of The Nation.

San Francisco, January 23

DEAN S. JENNINGS,

Executive Secretary American Newspaper Guild

Correction from Toledo

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In an item which appeared in the Labor Section of The Nation of January 16 relative to the federal Automobile Workers' Union in Toledo, it was incorrectly stated that the workers in the Auto-Lite plant are all organized in this union, and that it is controlled by the progressive block, which is controlled in turn by the local Workers' Party members.

The facts are that the union has just completed a bitter internal fight in which Thomas Ramsey and Floyd Bossler, former reactionary leaders, have been deposed and progressives elected in their places. The union is now faced with a fierce battle in the Auto-Lite plant against company unionism. Out of 5,000 employees about 2,000 are members of the federal union, 2,000 are members of the Auto-Lite Council, the company union, and 1,000 are unaffiliated. While Workers' Party members and Unemployed League members are active and prominent in the union and have a good influence, these groups by no means control the organization, and it is entirely incorrect to assert that they do. We are the first to acknowledge this.

Toledo, Ohio, January 28

ART PREIS,

Secretary Toledo Branch of Workers' Party

Simon Nelson Patten

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I am making a study of the life and sociological ideas of the late Simon Nelson Patten. I would appreciate hearing from persons having any biographical information or Patten letters.

PHILIP E. KELLER

Stanford University, Cal., January 30

Labor and Industry

An Army with Banners

By HEYWOOD BROWN

SECTION 7-a, which theoretically protects the worker in his right to join an organization of his own choosing, has produced a great deal of strife and litigation and not a little drama. Admittedly it has not worked well, and some ascribe the difficulty to a certain vagueness in the phrasing. I doubt if this is the seat of the trouble. The baldest and plainest statement would still be fought by most employers, since unionization has always been a matter of victory won and never of a boon merely granted. It is quite true that certain business men are willing to testify that they get along very well with the unions in their industry and on the whole prefer the set-up. But that is only after they were compelled to accept the condition. The silliest question an organizer can ask is to inquire of a boss, "Have you any objections if I attempt to organize your shop?"

If the government were in a position to say that in all 7-a disputes it had maintained a rigid neutrality, that would be a pretty fair boast. Unfortunately, it would not be true. In many instances the actual machinery of the NRA has been used to break down an employee victory. I need only cite the Jennings case. Some will argue that a broken promise is better than no promise at all, and it must be admitted that in the early days of the New Deal 7-a was an excellent talking point for some union leaders. It did help in the formation of the American Newspaper Guild. As soon as the brief honeymoon was over, many organized groups were faced with a problem in popular psychology. It is as simple as this: Do men and women fight harder when they learn that they have been fooled or do they grow discouraged and quit?

In my opinion the former reaction has been true of the great majority of newspaper men and women. A catchword used effectively by the publishers as far back as I can remember is now turning to their disadvantage. On August 7, 1909, I asked for a raise for the first time. My salary on the Morning Telegraph was $20 a week. I wanted to get $22.50. W. E. Lewis, the editor of the paper, received me in kindly fashion but he admitted that he was a little bit shocked. Mr. Lewis pointed out that I was only twenty years old and that twenty dollars a week should be ample. I felt glad that I had not started work at the age of eight.

He told me that the job of reporter was the most glamorous occupation a young man could have. At my age Richard Harding Davis, whom he had known intimately, was receiving only $15 a week. Editors, he assured me, were always anxious to reward good service but they did not like to have their reporters thinking of their opportunities in terms of money.

I went away feeling thoroughly ashamed of myself. Somehow I had disgraced the craft. What would Richard Harding Davis have said? Not until a year later did I ask for the raise again and then I was fired. Possibly I was more naive than most cubs but there really was a general feeling that we were curiously gifted bohemians and that it was almost a lark to be broke between pay days. Maybe the married men didn't think so.

Richard Harding Davis has been dead a long time now and many things have happened to the world including the liquidation of Van Bibber. And yet something of the old delusion of the romance and the glamor of the craft persists. It has been a factor in the organization of Guild chapters on some of the rockiest and most dangerous ledges. Nobody who attended the meeting of the staff of the Staten Island Advance when Alexander Crosby joined up is likely to forget the speech he made there. The city editor was present as a devil's advocate. He kept pressing on Crosby and saying, "Mr. Newhouse is treating you all right, what do you want to join this Guild for?"

And Crosby said, "I'm thinking of my soul. Don't laugh. I really am. A year ago I meant to join the Guild and got scared off. I've been thinking that if you have a right and don't use it, whether you need it that precise minute or not, you lose it for all time."

He joined and he got fired. When his case was brought before the Newspaper Industrial Board, the lawyer for the publisher cross-examined him severely.

"Why did you insist on joining the Guild at this particular time? You've already testified that the year before you decided not to join. Why was it important for you to join right at that meeting?"

"Because," said Crosby calmly, "I'd decided to quit being yellow." And there was no further cross-examination along that line.

The favorite phrase among all labor groups today is, "But we must be realistic about this." It has not gone unmentioned in Guild meetings, and I would report the psychology of the organization's members most inaccurately were I to suggest that there is a crusader complex all up and down the line. Yet since unionization is new to us it is necessarily exciting. Many have joined the Guild under circumstances which carried no threat of discharge or discrimination, but a very great number have been well aware of grave risks and still defied them. Not all the opposition has been of the terroristic kind. We have, in a few instances, the "good gray boss" to contend with. I refer to the publisher or managing editor who says, "Boys, you know I'm your friend. You can always come to me. Why do you want to mess around with new-fangled notions?"

One of the big New York papers—which I will not name for fear of embarrassing our existing chapter—is just such an Uncle Tom establishment. The staff gathered to listen to a Guild officer but before coming they had voted fifty-one against one not to affiliate with the Guild. The speaker soon sensed that his audience was hostile and asked for comments and questions from the contented workers of the plantation. They assured him that in the matter of hours and wages and everything else they could not think of a single thing which they desired.

"And so," inquired the speaker, "your attitude is that your own working conditions are perfect and that you do not want so much as to lift a little finger to help improve the working conditions of other newspaper men and women in America? Is that so?"

The spokesman of the happy islanders gulped a little and said, "Yes." "In that case," the Guild speaker answered, "we might as well call this meeting off."

The hand of a lone, skinny reporter shot up. "How many people do you require to start a Guild chapter?"

The New Deal for Share-Croppers

By WILLIAM R. AMBERSON

THE social outlook of the Secretary of Agriculture is well known, and there can be no doubt that the higher administration of the department is genuinely interested in building a better life for all classes in our farm population. Thus the authors of the 1934-35 Cotton Acreage Reduction Contract, foreseeing the possibility of economic and social disorder in connection with the operation of their program, wrote into the document a section which was presumed to be a sufficient charter for the defense and protection of the rights of agricultural laborers. Section 7 of the contract reads as follows:

[The producer shall] endeavor in good faith to bring about the reduction of acreage contemplated in this contract in such a manner as to cause the least possible amount of labor, economic, and social disturbance, and to this end, in so far as possible, he shall effect the acreage reduction as nearly ratably as practicable among tenants on this farm; shall, in so far as possible, maintain on this farm the normal number of tenants and other employees; shall permit all tenants to continue in the occupancy of their houses on this farm, rent free, for the years 1934 and 1935 (unless any such tenant shall so conduct himself as to become a nuisance or a menace to the welfare of the producer); during such years shall afford such tenants or employees, without cost, access for fuel to such woods land belonging to this farm as he may designate; shall permit such tenants the use of an adequate portion of the rented acres to grow food and feed crops for home consumption and for pasturage of domestically used live stock; and for such use of the rented acres shall permit the reasonable use of work animals and equipment in exchange for labor.

The general intent of this section to protect cotton farm tenants and croppers from displacement is surely clear. A critical examination, however, reveals the essential weakness of its phraseology. The producer is not pledged "to bring about reduction" but only to "endeavor . . . to bring about reduction." "In so far as possible," twice repeated, and "as nearly ratably as practicable" further weaken the section, which now becomes scarcely more than a gesture of benevolence. As the section proceeds, however, it becomes stronger, permitting "all tenants to continue in . . . occupancy," and then guaranteeing access to rented acres and woods land without qualification other than the "nuisance or a menace" phrase.

The right of tenants and croppers to share in the benefit payments is guaranteed by Section 10. Here it is found that the ordinary cropper, working on a fifty-fifty basis, without "One," said the speaker. "You've got a chapter," said the lone reporter.—It's grown.

If romance and glamor can be used to make newspapermen accept insecurity and low pay, I insist that those same qualities may well be a factor in helping them fight their battle for just rights. And you have only to see a Newark picket line to realize that Guildsmen and Guildswomen regard themselves as members of an army with banners.

tools or teams of his own, is allowed  $\frac{1}{2}$  cent a pound for cotton not grown in 1934 as his share of the "parity payment"; whereas the owner receives all of the "rent,"  $3\frac{1}{2}$  cents a pound, and  $\frac{1}{2}$  cent of the parity payment. Concerning this curious eight-to-one division of the government benefits there has been much discussion. The croppers have aptly called their share the "poverty payment." Dr. Paul W. Bruton, formerly of the AAA legal staff, has written:

The contract should have been drawn so that the benefit payments would have been made directly to landlords and tenants in proportion to their respective interests in the crop. . . . Under the 1934 and 1935 contract the landlord has everything to gain and the cropper everything to lose.

Recognizing the validity of such criticism, the Secretary has recently announced that in 1935 rental payments will be diminished and parity payments increased. Unless carefully administered, the actual effect of this change is likely to be very different from that intended, since a new incentive is given to unscrupulous landlords to discontinue share-cropping entirely and go over to day labor.

In the spring of 1934 a group of Memphis members and friends of the League for Industrial Democracy became interested in the operation of the reduction program as it was affecting the lives of the tenants and share-croppers. In collaboration with Norman Thomas, a survey of about 500 farm families was carried through, and the results of this study were submitted to Mr. Wallace early in May. The following conclusion was reached:

The acreage-reduction program has operated to reduce the number of families in employment on cotton farms . . . due . . . to failure . . . to reduce acreage ratably, forcing some tenants into "no-crop" class . . . at least 15 per cent . . . of all . . . families. . . . Many plantation owners eliminate the share-cropping system . . . forcing . . . croppers to accept day labor instead. . . . Widespread replacement of white by colored labor . . .

Shortly before the submission of this report the department's own investigator, Dr. Calvin Hoover, professor of economics at Duke University, reported to the Secretary as follows:

The operation of the acreage-reduction program creates a motive for reducing the number of tenants on farms. . . . Contracts . . . have provisions designed to prevent . . . but the system of enforcement . . . has been inadequate.

Secretary Wallace has similarly written:

I am fully aware that acreage adjustment produces its unemployment problem just as the shutting down of factories in the cities.

In spite of the conclusions of their own investigator, many of the officials of the Department of Agriculture refuse to recognize that the reduction program has created a new unemployment problem. Concerning this matter there can hardly be room for question, although the magnitude of the displacement of labor must indeed remain in doubt. Gordon W. Blackwell, after a study of 700 displaced farm families in North Carolina, concludes that "the fact that the landlord could no longer finance the tenant, the desire of the landlord to use the tenant as day labor rather than give him a crop, and the acreage-reduction program of AAA are the real reasons why there is a displaced-tenant problem." These findings closely parallel our own conclusions of last spring, except that in the richer Delta country there was relatively little unemployment until the winter of 1933-34, when the reduction program began to exert its influence. We believe it is fair to say that over the whole cotton belt about one-third of the present rural unemployment can be directly referred to the reduction program.

As a result of such criticism of the program the department set up an Adjustment Committee headed by J. Phil Campbell. Several thousand complaints have been referred to it and some adjustments have been made. Our committee has observed the handling of cases submitted to Mr. Wallace in May. The committee found in one case that a large plantation had replaced many white sharecroppers with colored day laborers. The investigator reported that "there have been some evictions of white families, and . . . some substitution of share-croppers with day labor, but the extent . . . has been very small in proportion to the size of the operations"; as a result the plantation was cleared. In another case "it was found that a change had been made from share-croppers to day laborers, but as the croppers had been notified early in 1933 that this arrangement would be carried out in 1934, it was not considered that this change was made as a result of the cotton program." The committee holds affidavits from some of these people, all white, in which they swear that they received no notice until after January 1, 1934. Similar affidavits were submitted by them to the government investigator but were ignored. In a third case the investigator found that "the landlord had changed from share-croppers to day labor. . . . Contract suspended and cancelation recommended. . . ."

In some cases the investigations were so utterly superficial as to be valueless. A large cotton farm in eastern Arkansas, comprising some 14,000 acres, has long been notorious for its bad treatment of its tenants. Interest on "furnish" has been charged at 25 cents on the dollar—an illegal and usurious rate—when settlements were made, and few settlements have been carried out. The condition of the croppers, mostly colored, has been tragic. In one day last winter the FERA worker in the county, aghast at the condition of these people, spent \$1,400 of government money to clothe and feed them. The only clothes which most of them now possess were given them by this worker. In the spring of 1934 the owners decided to change a part of this farm over to a day-labor basis. Croppers were notified that each adult worker could retain only  $3\frac{1}{2}$  acres on a share-crop basis. In some cases this represented a cut of 75 per cent in acreage. They were required to cultivate a large part of the plantation on a day-labor basis at 75 cents for a thirteen-hour day. Actually 35 cents only was paid over; the rest was placed in a "petty account," which the croppers claim has not been paid.

The government investigator went to this plantation with a member of the County Committee, who has informed our committee that no thorough investigation was made. A few croppers were interviewed and a few questions which were not pertinent to the charges were asked. Thus the investigator chiefly inquired whether the families had enough corn land. These people were rightly suspicious of all inquirers, and they failed to disclose the real situation. The investigator conferred with the owners but made no inspection of the books. He told his guide that he thought he had not been told the truth. But no word of this opinion appeared in his report to Washington, which cleared the plantation. The AAA check for thousands of dollars was shortly thereafter released, and the records state that "this plantation was thoroughly investigated." The whole "investigation" of this huge farm covering twenty-two square miles was completed in not more than six hours. The county committeeman, now relief administrator, recognizes the gravity of the situation and offers to aid the Department of Agriculture in a real investigation of this and other plantations in his county, if the department really desires to have it. Forty Negro families now face eviction from this farm because they have joined a union.

The minor officialdom of the department has remained quite unimpressed by these substantiations of the findings of our committee. Thus it was possible for C. A. Cobb, the head of the Cotton Section of the AAA, to write on September 18 that the charges "were examined at first hand, and found in many cases to be absolutely false, and in others greatly exaggerated." T. Roy Reid, assistant director of the extension service in Arkansas, went the limit in denial of the facts when on November 27 he assured a correspondent that after a thorough study "there was no evidence found by these impartial investigators to sustain the charges."

In spite of the plain intent of Section 7 to guarantee tenure the Cotton Section of the AAA has adopted a contrary official interpretation which is responsible for much of the present confusion on the cotton farms. This interpretation may be stated in the words of W. J. Green, field representative of the Adjustment Committee, as follows:

The cotton contract states that the landlord shall keep the same number of tenants, but does not compel him to keep the same tenant. . . . There is nothing in the contract in regard to race . . . the landlord would have the right to replace a white tenant with a Negro . . .

Under the convenient protection of this interpretation of the labor clause thousands of families have been dispossessed throughout the cotton belt. In our own territory white share-croppers have usually been sacrificed, and, if replaced at all, have seen their homes occupied by colored families, often forced to work on a day-labor basis. A new wave of such dispossessions is scheduled for 1935. We have before us a list of nearly 300 families, the majority white, who have received eviction notices, some for membership in a union, some because they have tried to get their rights under the contract, some because the landowners are changing to Negro or convict labor.

We believe that it can now be seen that the great exodus of colored families from the rural South during the 1920-30 period has been reversed, and that many of these families are now returning to the country, where they are competing with white families for the available places. Being preferred by many plantation owners, they are responsible for the dispossession of many of the whites, who in their turn are thrown upon the relief rolls.

A group of twenty-three threatened families has entered the courts to ask for an injunction against eviction and for fulfilment of the contract. Most of the plaintiffs are white, and all have excellent records as farmers. The defendant is Hiram Norcross, planter, of Tyronza, Arkansas. This test case of the meaning of Section 7 will shortly be heard by the Supreme Court of Arkansas. The suit is supported by the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union and the American Civil Liberties Union, with C. T. Carpenter of Marked Tree in charge of the case. Funds for legal expenses have been collected from hundreds of croppers of both races, much of the money "pennied out" by the payment of a few cents a week. An authoritative court interpretation of Section 7 will go far to resolve the present dispute as to the rights of these people to hold their lands.

From these experiences the conclusion must be drawn that, despite the creation of an Adjustment Committee and some effort on the part of federal officials to rectify injustices, relatively little has been accomplished. In justice to the Department of Agriculture it must be admitted that the enforcement of the labor provisions of the cotton contract, even if there were no dispute regarding interpretation, would be a herculean labor, since more than a million contracts have been signed. The department can get adequate investigations neither through its county agents, who, though technically competent, are yet unskilled in social relationships and closely bound to the landlords, nor through the hurried trips of harassed minor officials inspecting scattered cases on the run and unfamiliar with local situations. Once the basic error of production restriction has been made, it is no longer within the power of administrators, however humane, to prevent a train of vicious sequelae. In times of economic stress we see the feeble hold of legal forms.

There is reason to believe, however, that much may yet be accomplished if a more adequate machinery of inspection and enforcement be set up. Let the Secretary of Agriculture create a National Agricultural Labor Board, responsible directly to him, with regional offices and a representative in at least each Congressional district. This board should have power to enforce the labor provisions of all AAA contracts and should concern itself not merely with hearing complaints but with making appropriate surveys to prevent abuses from arising. In the cotton country croppers have been driven from pillar to post for so long and have sunk so low in the human scale that they cannot imagine any other type of life, and do not know how to resist exploitation. They react by developing an irresponsible and antagonistic attitude. For half a century now the 40 per cent annual labor turnover has, at each year's end, filled Southern roads with miserable families seeking a new home. With a federal reduction program in operation, new opportunities have almost vanished. The plight of these people thus becomes in a peculiar sense a national responsibility.

For enforcing its contracts the Department of Agriculture holds a much stronger position than the governmental agencies which preside over Section 7-a of the industrial codes, since it controls important financial benefits the withholding of which can throw many a plantation into bankruptcy. It must, however, clarify its mind as to its attitude toward the various classes of our farm population. In the cotton country its present program is greatly aiding the 30 per cent of owners and higher types of tenants, but it has been of no aid to most of the 70 per cent of croppers and day laborers, many of whom are worse off than ever before. Under its program the older habits of exploitation persist, merely moving in new channels and assuming new forms. The department has not yet come to grips with the basic problems. The creation of a more effective agency for the adjustment of labor disputes under present contracts is only a step in the larger program which is needed. The following concrete suggestions are offered:

1. When new contracts are drawn, the labor clauses must have the binding force of law, without quibble or equivocation, and the full protection of the department must be extended to every man, regardless of race, color, or union affiliation, who has honestly performed his labor.

2. The right of agricultural laborers to organize and bargain collectively should be proclaimed and recognition of this right written into all contracts.

3. Tenants and share-croppers should be given representation upon all boards and local committees set up to administer the AAA program.

4. The labor of children under fourteen years of age in the fields should be forbidden by national statute. Many children now begin to pick cotton at the age of five and to "chop" at ten, at wages as low as 3 cents an hour.

Ultimately the plantation system must be liquidated. Dr. J. H. Dillard is quite justified when he writes: "Damn the whole tenant system. There can be no decent civilization until it is abolished." We must do away with the whole antiquated scheme of landlord-tenant arrangements, to which there must always cling many of the worst features of chattel slavery without its benefits.

Forces are already working to accomplish this liquidation. Universal bankruptcy has threatened and will threaten again, as cotton prices fluctuate and interest and taxes pyramid. Official Washington is by no means entirely oblivious to the present situation; the basic difficulty is the lack of a unified program. The rural rehabilitation program of the FERA is establishing thousands of destitute families on a new and more independent basis, which may represent the entering wedge of a force that will ultimately transform the present system. The urgent need for a change has now been recognized by the PWA Mississippi Valley Committee, which in its report to Secretary Ickes advocates a federal program which will enable all tenants to acquire ownership of land. The alternative method of large-scale cooperative farms must also be tested. If tenure is absolutely guaranteed, without power to sell or mortgage, possibly on long-term leases from the government under a Federal Loan Authority, it will free a whole people from their present shackles and make possible the education of a more responsible and effective generation than the South has ever known.

The solution of the human and economic problems of the Cotton Belt is not to be found within the South alone. No purely regional program will suffice. Its special products must be properly utilized in a national and, ultimately, an international scheme, planned for the use of all.

Midwinter Book Section

Are Novels Worth Reading?

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

PERSISTENT readers of novels will usually confess that what began as a passion tends to end as a habit. The transition may have been made by easy stages. The victim may not know just when he ceased to find in the pages of fiction the excitement which once was there, and when he began, willy-nilly, to expect no more than the tranquillity which comes from repeating once again a familiar experience. But if the reader has reached forty and if—as we politely assume—he has the normal capacity to retain impressions, then he can hardly deny that the transition has occurred, that he has ceased to find in very many best-sellers, or even in novels which have had a succès d'estime, anything capable of stirring in him that sense of a fresh and rewarding adventure which was once so common.

The history and the treatise are necessarily long, but men who actually require 250 pages in which to set down the original things they have to say about character and "life" are rare—far rarer at least than the authors of respectable novels; and most of what the competent novelist has to say cannot fail to be as familiar to the persistent reader as his own most familiar impressions. He may feel it his duty to "keep up with current literature," or he may frankly confess that he reads novels for the same reason that more desperate men play solitaire, but the very explicitness of the novel, the pains it takes to explain acts or motives which no one who has read much or observed much needs to have explained again, make it dilute at best; and as the reader settles into his daily or his weekly volume—hot from the press and urged upon his attention by the indefatigable enthusiasm of the professional recommender, who is bound to pretend that he has just learned for the first time that adolescence is yeasty or that women are fickle—he cannot but admit that the day has passed when these things come to him as important discoveries. There was, of course, a time when that was exactly how they did come and exactly what they were—a time when "meadow, grove, and stream" or, if you prefer, even the "he said" and the "she said" of a now only reminiscent dialogue were appareled in celestial light, and every recurrent situation, every common sight had still "the glory and the freshness of a dream." But the reader, alas, is no longer what he was, and there has passed a glory, not only from the earth, but also from those merely competent descriptions of it which the competent novelist gives.

Every few years, perhaps, the persistent reader meets some wholly original work—some "Ulysses" or "Magic Mountain" or "Remembrance of Things Past"—which stirs him again to the excitement he once felt in every substantial novel and which seems to open some new field of understanding or emotion. But if he actually demands of every novel anything remotely resembling that, he will spend, year in and year out, less time in reading fiction than he spends in brushing his teeth. He may meet the situation as he will. He may leave novel reading to younger folk or he may, as he has probably learned to do in connection with other activities, content himself with enjoyment upon a lower level; but whatever he does he will have come upon a sort of law of diminishing returns from fiction.

Of all the forms of imaginative literature the novel is the one which contains the largest amount of sheer information. To a far greater extent poetry and even the drama present the products of a distillation, while the novel devotes more effort to mere description. That is why it is so long and that is why it is, preeminently, addressed to youth. It does not, as the great poem does, deal with experiences too direct and too simple to need a context of experience, or assume whatever knowledge of the ways of men may be necessary to comprehension. It describes men and manners, even the habits and traditions and conventions of particular societies. Both in the cant and in the more general sense of the phrase it imparts the "facts of life." For that reason its function is largely, and importantly, educational. Only experience itself is a better teacher of what we call "knowledge of the world," and the man who has not read his quota of good novels is a man of unusual experience or unusual intuition if he does not remain somehow callow by comparison with those who have participated vicariously but specifically and in detail in more kinds of lives than any man can have for himself. But for that reason also it is the form from which, as time goes on, one can learn less and less, since one has come to know more and more about the subject with which the novel deals.

Once every page taught something. Every incident was instructive, not because no other novel communicated the same fact or the same truth, but simply because they were all as new to the reader as they were old to human experience. Only those incapable of learning can, however, continue indefinitely to find in any except the supreme novels any large proportion of fresh instruction. One discovers that more and more is familiar, that from any given novel one receives fewer and fewer fresh impressions, until finally the time has arrived when it no longer pays to search the whole haystack for the needle, which as likely as not is not even there. And when that time comes, the reader does one of two things: either he stops reading novels except on those rare occasions when one not mainly repetitious appears, or he settles into the harmless and, to some, agreeable habit of lulling his spirit with the repetition of familiar experiences.

Some writers—and some critics—seem to feel that the difficulty has been eluded when the novel has been packed with facts of a sort which gain nothing from fictionalization. Having no new things to say about human nature, the author puts in what he knows about the Napoleonic wars, the history of medical research, or the economic development of New England. The result may be informative in its way, but what you have in such a book is not primarily a novel at all. What you have instead is popularization on the lowest level, something hardly less debasing to reader and writer alike than those instructive fables for children in which Spinach appears as a good fairy and Toothpaste is a beneficent genius whose favor it is well to cultivate. No writer worthy of his craft wants to compromise with the most effective possible presentation of his material, and no reader who really wants information wants it in any except its most accurate and comprehensive form. But the novel which imparts information of a sort with which the treatise or the history can adequately deal is either bastard fiction, vulgarized exposition, or—more probably—both.

"Fictionalization" is a dreadful word which signifies a dreadful thing. The kind of information which a true novel gives, the kind of instruction which it succeeds in imparting, is a kind with which only it can deal. Its field is a field of observations and intuitions too complicated, too illusive, and too tenuous to be reduced to downright statement, and capable of being communicated only in connection with concrete persons and concrete situations which suggest them. The true novelist does not translate his abstract conclusions into stories, for if he did he would have not a novel but a fable. The true novelist writes novels just because what he wants to say cannot, by him at least, be dissociated from the story he has to tell, and nothing can be "fictionalized" because nothing can be made into fiction which is not that, and only that, to begin with.

It is a pity, no doubt, that the novel which the mature reader can find not merely "worth reading" but actually too valuable to miss should be as rare as it is. But the situation is not to be remedied by offering him sugar-coated pills of history or economics instead. There is, indeed, only one way in which critics, librarians, editors, and the others interested in the welfare of fiction can possibly remedy it. Let them see to it that all novels are written by geniuses.

Poets and the Wars

By PHILIP BLAIR RICE

What should the wars do with these jiggling fools?

SINCE our poets began their rather vertiginous scramble down from the ivory tower into the depths of the mine pit, only a few years have elapsed. It is not surprising, consequently, that much of their output should be inferior and that the critical standards by which it is judged should be highly confused. In discussing such poetry critics have ranged between two extremes. At one extreme is the assumption that poetry is a form of propaganda and that its political orthodoxy or heresy is the main thing that matters. At the other, poetry is treated as merely a craft, and interest in its subject matter is deplored as irrelevant curiosity; if the poet's beliefs are mentioned at all, it is only to dismiss them as neutral "data" from which the poet spins his word-music or word-magic. The point of view which I should like to suggest is both traditional and unpopular: that poetry is, in the last analysis, neither propaganda nor a craft but an art.

These much-abused terms need to be clarified. Art differs from propaganda in that it does not have the primary purpose of inciting masses of people to action, a purpose to which it is ill suited. This does not imply that propaganda may not be upon occasion, for society in general, even more important than art. When, as at present, the social organism (if the metaphor be allowed) is in severe pain, its more spontaneous utterances are likely to be artless cries of agony or recrimination. It is quite intelligible under the circumstances that some poets should wish to write, in the words of Ben Maddow, "lines in bad taste, iron-skinny, twisted as cramps of hunger." An example of this sort of writing is Robert Gessner's "Upsurge," which in certain moods I for one find very stirring, but not as poetry.

Art goes beyond the limitations of a craft, on the other hand, because it can be more than the skilful organization of convenient material into a pleasing design to meet some prescribed or casual need; the poetic artist, at his best, uses the craft of language to present movingly his vision of the world and of man's place in it. The poet's beliefs and insights, when he has any of consequence, are not inert data upon which he operates. Not only do they influence the form and texture of the poem, but they confer upon its highest moments an intensity which cannot be derived from the resources of language alone. A critic who treats either a poem's technique or its substance in isolation fails to do it complete justice.

These rousing platitudes are, I believe, pertinent to the present state of affairs in literature, which involves both a crisis in belief and a refashioning of the instruments of literature to deal with this crisis. At this point I should like to affirm that the poet is under no obligation to deal primarily or exclusively with social and economic themes. Today, however, it is highly probable that he will be aware of such matters, and that his awareness will be reflected in his writing. Furthermore, until the event proves otherwise, it is a safe assumption that the conflict of cultural forces and ideas can supply at least as fit subject matter for poetry as that supplied by the procession of the changing seasons.

Part of the difficulty with verse inspired by the social muse springs from its novelty. Such verse is not altogether unprecedented, but generally its motivation has been well concealed: Wordsworth's desire to call attention to the early injustices of the Industrial Revolution was veiled in praises of the Idiot Boy; with Kipling, imperialism spoke the language of morals and piety. In the last century, moreover, the poet has not been able to draw his imagery from the economic life of the time as readily as could the Elizabethans, for example, from the commerce and handicrafts of their age. Until very recently, at least, the products and social by-products of modern industrialism have been almost uniformly shoddy and lacking in pageantry. It was not until T. S. Eliot and others of his generation went for their technique to earlier poetic traditions, which made greater use of the intellect, that the sights and sounds of an urban, mechanical civilization could be reduced to poetic order.

As a result of their labors, when a younger poet such as Stephen Spender began to write he was able to face a world which did not merely jar upon his senses. He could see that the "air-liner with shut-off engines" possessed the same traditionally poetic qualities as the moth; he saw it "with burring furred antennae feeling its huge path through dusk." Now it was possible to go a step farther:

After the first powerful plain manifesto
The black statement of pistons, without more fuss
But gliding like a queen, she leaves the station.

The link with the traditionally poetic has been omitted in the first two lines; the two terms of the metaphor are both distinctively modern, and one of them, "manifesto," is taken from the sphere of economic conflict. Spender is doing much the same sort of thing as George Herbert did in his poem Redemption, where the subject of the Atonement is treated in the following figure:

Having been tenant long to a rich Lord,
Not thriving, I resolved to be bold,
And make a suit unto him, to afford
A new small-rented lease, and cancell th' old . . .

Of the two passages Spender's is the less labored; it is in no wise a conceit.

Metaphor is only one of the poet's tools, but until a writer has mastered its possibilities he is rarely able to deal adroitly with economic material. Even such an accomplished writer as Archibald MacLeish falls down because he is not able to handle contemporary subject matter in this way. He is at his best when he writes about the Mexico of the Conquistadores or the masts of Cette or on themes taken from "The Golden Bough." When he approaches his own time he becomes abusive and incoherent. He rarely achieves a metaphor which extracts wonder or terror—much less pity—from the contemporary world: it enters his verse mainly as the "anti-poetic" which weights his invective.

The failure to attain a more complicated type of order is also illustrated in MacLeish's topical poems, Frescoes for Rockefeller City, and 1933. The legend persists with some left-wing critics that the Frescoes are an American version of the hymn to Horst Wessel. To interpret them thus is to miss their significance entirely. They contain, indeed, a certain amount of amiable Americanophilia, at the same time hard-boiled and sentimental, such as has been a recurrent note in our literature from Whitman to Sandburg. But this does not resemble in the slightest the militant nationalism of Hitler and Mussolini; it is no more fascist than is a run-of-the-mine Fourth of July oration by an Iowa Congressman with a slight leaning toward the Ku Klux Klan. A large part of the poem is devoted to satire on the robber barons, and might have been written by almost anyone with Mr. MacLeish's gifts, even by an orthodox Marxist. The last of the six sections is devoted to a burlesque on the Communists, whom Mr. MacLeish finds vulgar. But the conclusion of the poem gives a decisive clue. After asserting that it is pretty hard to change America ("She's a tough land under the oak trees, mister"), the poet reveals his true attitude in the last line: "There is too much sun on the lids of my eyes to be listening." Mr. MacLeish is not a fascist: he is simply bored, bored by both communism and predatory capitalism, bored by the social muse herself.

The poem entitled 1933 presents the same attitude, although the author tries to force it to a more positive conclusion. Elpenor speaks to Odysseus out of the hell of the contemporary world, directing him to steer past the sirens who sing of "dialectical hope and the kind of childish Utopia found in a small boys' school," and who prescribe "work as the answer for everything." Odysseus is advised to trust neither to "charts nor to prophets" but to "seamanship." (Is this Mr. Roosevelt's "quarterback" philosophy?) At last he will come to "a clean beach, an unplowed country" where he can "begin it again" with the hard rain on his head and raw fern for his bedding. This might be taken to symbolize subsistence homesteads or emigration to Bali, but the chances are that the poet means nothing so specific:

You have only to push on
To whatever it is that's beyond us.

In other words, Mr. MacLeish counsels us to keep a stiff upper lip and muddle through.

These poems are ineffectual, in the first instance, because the poet has neither an articulated point of view of his own nor a comprehension of that of his adversaries. He is merely irritated with what he sees about him. The hell of 1933, like that of Mr. Pound's "Cantos," on which it is patterned, is "without dignity, without tragedy." The poet may not be able to find order in the contemporary world; he must, however, be able to read into it the possibility of order, else he cannot extract from it either tragedy or comedy. The tragedy or the comedy will then arise from the contrast between the possible and the actual.

The connection between a poet's thought and his craft is here especially intimate. The poet who has dominated his material will usually express the more complex type of order by means of symbols. Mr. MacLeish's symbols fail because they have no precise reference, intellectual or emotional. The problem of symbolic structure is particularly difficult for the poet who feels impelled to write on social themes. His symbols must simplify a highly complex object of reference; they must also be just. When Ben Maddow, in his poem Red Decision, chooses as his principal symbol of the capitalist system the Reverend Bigutz, who doth from his brain like udders softly squirt apt phrases for the quasi-liberal Church of St. John the Rockefeller . . .

the reader may well feel that the torpedo is aimed not at the engine room of the capitalist ship but at one of its barnacles. On the other hand, the same poem presents a symbol of the future commonwealth which is poetically very effective, used as it is in contrast with pictures of the slums:

A home, a rigid bubble of the sun,
of Le Corbusier, at Poissy-sur-Seine, light, light sustains the glassy flank, a sun-light world. . . .

Poetry on these themes would seem to have very definite limitations. Some of the issues with which it deals are, we hope, transitory. If and when they are solved they will very largely be dead issues. But the poet cannot keep his gaze fixed unflinchingly on eternity; and, indeed, historical understanding, with its gift of "imaginative assent," enables those who are properly qualified to resuscitate much that to others is utterly defunct.

To adopt the attitude of "imaginative assent" rather than that of belief may well require from contemporaries a more heroic feat of detachment than from posterity. It would certainly be difficult to imagine a Communist today enjoying to the full a fascist poem, or vice versa, whatever its technical excellences. A related difficulty is illustrated by the fact that no one, presumably, would be willing to admit that he had been converted to communism, Southern agrarianism, or rugged individualism merely by reading the

An Innovation in Anthologies

The short biography has gained great popularity in recent years, and so varied and interesting are the achievements in the form, that it is high time a judicious collection were made for the shelves of permanence. This sizable volume, equipped with the informal notes and Introduction, represents seventeen authors. Some of the selections—for instance, those by Robert M. Coates and Harold Nicolson—have never before appeared in book form.

MODERN SHORT BIOGRAPHIES

Edited by Marston Balch

383 pages, $2.00

THE ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES OF THE NEW DEAL

By BENJAMIN STOLBERG and
WARREN JAY VINTON

"In a very real sense this little book says all there is to say about the New Deal; and says it with such economy of means, . . . such brilliant and at the same time forthright vocabulary that one wonders what the rest of us were up to all this time."—The Nation. $1.00

MODERN ANTHOLOGIES THAT LEAD THE FIELD

MODERN AMERICAN PROSE.

EDITED BY CARL VAN DOREN.

Covers sixty writers in the period, 1914-1934.

900 pages, $2.75

MODERN AMERICAN POETRY.

EDITED BY LOUIS UNTERMAYER.

Representing 153 poets. Fourth revised edition.

850 pages, $3.50

MODERN BRITISH POETRY.

EDITED BY LOUIS UNTERMAYER.

Representing 150 poets. Third revised edition.

790 pages, $3.50

MODERN AMERICAN POETRY AND MODERN BRITISH POETRY.

The two above titles in one volume on India paper.

$5.00

BOOKS ON WRITING

BECOMING A WRITER.

BY DOROTHEA BRANDE

A new, successful method of developing one's writing powers. Third printing.

$2.00

NARRATIVE TECHNIQUE.

BY THOMAS H. UZZELL.

Revised 1935 edition of a book that has sold in thousands among practising writers and college students.

$2.50

WINNER OF TWO AWARDS

The second novel to receive the distinguished America-France Award, and also the recipient of the French Academy Novel Prize. The theme, that of a cultured, worldly couple's conversion to Catholicism, is one unusual in modern fiction. Being individuals of unusual gifts, they are not content with the ordinary practices of religion, and decide to renounce each other for the cloister. Here begins the dramatic third act of their lives in a story that is brilliantly, powerfully realized.

$2.00

THE ABBEY OF EVOLAYNE

By PAULE RÉGNIER

SOCIAL JUDGEMENT by Graham Wallas

The last writing which the distinguished author of THE ART OF THOUGHT completed before his death—a discussion of the part played by thought and emotion in the process by which men arrive at responsible decisions.

$1.50

ON IMAGINATION: COLERIDGE'S CRITICAL THEORY by I. A. RICHARDS

A re-examination of the ideas of the great English critic, establishing the validity of those principles for today and restating them in the improved psychology now available.

$2.50

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY, 383 MADISON AVE., NEW YORK

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

poetic exponents of one of these schools of thought. I do not mean to imply that the poet does not have his contribution—one cannot, in these matters, simply “leave it to the economist.” In fact, one of the perhaps incidental uses of the poetic imagination is to show us what the abstract principles of the theorist mean in the concrete. But it is especially difficult for such a poem to be a unit in itself. The reader, even the sympathetic reader, is constantly diverted from the poem by the feeling that he would like to have some statistics on a given issue, or by the need to engage in dialectical analysis.

The poet, moreover, in order to achieve dramatic concentration, is almost invariably tempted to overstate his case. Messrs. Auden, Day Lewis, and Spender come nearer than most of their contemporaries to writing major poetry on social themes, partly because they are concerned not only with the raw suffering produced by the economic system but also with the quality of life which it engenders. They see the problem not merely as a “social” one, but as one of harmonizing the individual with himself—a moral problem, if you like. Yet even they sometimes give the impression that the profit economy is wholly responsible for all sorts of things, such as selfishness, sexual impotence, and bad taste in the arts, which are traceable in large part to factors that would be operative under any economic system.

Difficulties arising from the problem of poetry and belief are not peculiar to verse on social themes, for to a considerable extent they apply also to philosophical and religious verse; and I am not asserting that they are lethal. A consideration of them may, however, forestall the disappointment of expecting too much, or the wrong kind of thing, from the deliverances of the social muse at the present time. It may also suggest that the poet's beliefs should unobtrusively control the opera from the orchestra pit and not wave a baton in the center of the stage.

The Centaur

By LIONEL ABEL

A horse's lungs and four legs
we should need
    yes, and horseblood up to the loins at least to run so utterly

As the twofooted runner who went over the mile's length, running with white ankles blurring to pale bronze with footbeat
    following so fast on footbeat
the gray cinder lengths so long between

And yet wore a jersey, a white one,
    any of us could have worn it,
and sucked on a lemon rind
such as we find in our teacups and had need of an acid equal to our need
on legendless evenings

Were we not right to cry to the runner to flog his limbs like another man's horse to sweat, flog forward, sweat as a horse sweats breast the tape, fall, fall headlong up to the loins in a fable

Since to be sane, to be sober
we must drive all the fablefooted beasts back to the half-darks
    when they breast up out of the half-lights and cry to come among us—shall we not cry to the twofooted runner

Descent from Death

By HAL SAUNDERS WHITE

I who have seen the hours turning
With no returning,
Seeing like water or the wind's flow
All things go careless of desire,
I who have felt the slow fire
Of the lone body's burning,
Leave now false rest—
This crumbling turret of the breast—
Leave now the sealed and mummied room;
Down the long stair
By which I climbed into my high despair
Descend to common air;
In the high tomb deserted leave that self
Which starved on plenty and grew proud,
Leave every starveling hope it had Once to be glad
In its own private shroud.

Books

Priapus in Georgia

Journeyman. By Erskine Caldwell. The Viking Press. $4.50.

WHATEVER else may be said of this new work by Erskine Caldwell, it should dispel the notion that he is to be considered a realistic interpreter of conditions in the South—or anywhere else for that matter. For those persons who felt that the references to the tenant-farmer system in “Tobacco Road” and the description of the factory strike in “God's Little Acre” were really irrelevant distractions from the principal interest in those two books, “Journeyman” will prove a complete justification. It is now quite evident that Mr. Caldwell is interested in only one thing and that whatever does not bear on that one thing is altogether beside the point. What both Mr. Caldwell and his admirers are most genuinely interested in, of course, is what T. S. Eliot, in one of the more somber poems of his later period, describes as “the ecstasy of the animal.” To insure proper concentration on such a theme Mr. Caldwell has necessarily to select a background and characters as little encumbered by traditional moral and intellectual impedimenta as possible. In this sense alone does his choice of the backwash region of rural Georgia have any particular significance. The essential need is for a background in which so few strictly human characteristics persist that the

Unanimously Voted One of the Notable Books of 1934

Journey to the End of the Night

by LOUIS-FERDINAND CÉLINE

In The Nation's selection of "Fifty Best Books of 1934"; in The New Republic's list of "A Hundred Notable Books: 1934"; in Time's list of sixty-eight "Best Books"; and in Lewis Gannett's "Best Books of 1934" Céline's great novel ranks among the leaders. The Nation says: "Of all the novels written in the last fifty years Céline's novel probably constitutes the most violent and all-embracing condemnation", while The New Republic calls it "A masterpiece that has to be read."

Second large printing. $2.50

War Memoirs of David Lloyd George

Vol. I, 1914-15. Vol. II, 1915-16. Vol. III, 1916-17.
Vol. IV, 1917

In these memoirs Britain's war-time Premier deals, in Volumes I and II, with the events leading up to the War and with the war years 1914-1916. In Volumes III and IV he deals with America's entry into the world struggle and with some of the most important events of the War — the peace discussions, the submarine menace, the fall of Joffre, the Nivelle offensive, Caporetto, Passchendaele, the Inter-Allied Council and the military situation.

"They are indispensable to any study of the War." — Harry Hansen in Harper's Magazine.

"No one who wishes to be well informed about the Great War should fail to study them." — Rt. Hon. Winston S. Churchill.

Four volumes. Fully illustrated. $4.00 each.

The Great "Bounty" Trilogy

by CHARLES NORDHOFF and JAMES NORMAN HALL

- (1) Mutiny on the Bounty 97th thousand. $2.50
- (2) Men Against the Sea 40th thousand. $2.00
- (3) Pitcairn's Island 40th thousand. $2.50

"Not since Stevenson and Kipling has there been such a tale of idyllic adventure as Nordhoff and Hall have unfolded in this trilogy of the sea." — Chicago Daily News.

Rats, Lice and History

by HANS ZINSSER

"Wars are lost by generals and won by epidemics" may well serve as the keynote of this biography of typhus fever in which Dr. Hans Zinsser, bacteriologist, tells the career of typhus and its extraordinary effect on the history of the world. An Atlantic book. (To be published on February 8th.) $2.75

LITTLE, BROWN & COMPANY, Publishers, Boston

We Accept With Pleasure by BERNARD DeVOTO

"I recognized in it my own generation as I never recognized it in the pages of Scott Fitzgerald or Ernest Hemingway." — Lewis Gannett in New York Herald Tribune. Third printing. $2.50

Dusk at the Grove by SAMUEL ROGERS

This modern story of an American family, awarded the Atlantic $10,000 Prize in 1934, was one of the outstanding books of last year. "A distinguished novel." — New York Times. 34th thousand. $2.50

A History of the World War by LIDDELL HART

Based on the author's earlier and shorter "The Real War." "Incomparably the best short history of the World War which has yet been written." — New Statesman and Nation, London. An Atlantic Book. Illustrated with maps. $4.00

Russia's Iron Age by WILLIAM HENRY CHAMBERLIN

"At the present moment no existing evaluation of the Soviet régime seems comparable to 'Russia's Iron Age.' It is indispensable to a proper understanding of the Soviet Union in 1934." — New York Times. An Atlantic Book. Fourth printing. $4.00

Desert Wife by HILDA FAUNCE

"Inspiring quality and great distinction of style mark Hilda Faunce's story of her life as helper to her husband at his Navajo trading station. 'Desert Wife' is the fine story of this experience, a beautiful and revealing book." — New Republic. With 23 illustrations by Langdon Kihn. Third printing. $3.00

Roman Spring — Memoirs by MRS. WINTHROP CHANLER

A rare volume of reminiscences of Rome, Washington, Newport and New York in the days of the Four Hundred. "A charming, humorous and understanding record of the two worlds its author has known and of which she has been a part." — New York Times. An Atlantic Book. Fifth printing. Illustrated. $3.00 process of abstraction may be carried on with the minimum of difficulty. For the personages in Mr. Caldwell's idyls are not subhuman, as some critics maintain; they are so divested of everything that we understand by the human that there is scarcely any point in trying to establish a kinship at all. What each of them is reduced to finally is a kind of abstraction—from the human to the animal, and even farther, as in the present book, from the complete animal organism to the single instinct. The world of Mr. Caldwell's three novels does not exist in heaven or on the earth, nor do the monomaniac creatures with which it is populated. It can be accepted only as a world of pure fantasy, a world of potentialities rather than actualities, in which man, that paragon of animals, is reduced to the lowest common denominator of his animal nature.

In outline this new book possesses the bald simplicity of the very earliest stories of the race. In particular, it recalls the old tales of gods mingling with men, the legends of Dionysus, Priapus, and Pan—in which the effect of the divine visitation was a considerable upsetting of the regular human order. So mischievous were these deities on their rare terrestrial holidays that mankind was thrown for the duration of their stay into what the Greeks were forced to call a "panic." The disturbing god was usually associated, it will also be recalled, with the cult of fertility or generation; and Semon Dye, the hero of "Journeyman," is quite distinctly a divinity of this order. As in most of the myths, it is never certain whether the name that this wandering preacher gives himself is really his own; his origins are left obscure; he arrives and departs like a will-o'-the-wisp. But in the course of his brief stay he swindles the dull-witted Georgia landowner out of his farm, his automobile, and his wife. He shoots down a Negro who protests against his seduction of one of the girls on the place, and he ensnares the whole neighborhood into the village schoolhouse to hear him preach against sin. Toward this great event everything in the story is made to move; and it must be admitted that Semon Dye's efforts to instil "religion" into the sluggish congregation provide some of the most astonishing chapters in recent fiction. While neither the use of the Southern revivalist meeting nor the identification of sex with religion is exactly new in the contemporary American novel, these closing sections exceed in graphic concreteness anything that even Mr. Caldwell has so far offered to the public. And it is during this orgy that the resemblance between Semon Dye and the early gods of the phallic cults is most likely to strike the reader. He will seem to be less a man, even a caricature of an itinerant Southern preacher, than some incarnation out of time and space.

When he is gone the man called Clay remarks, "God help the people at the next place Semon picks out to stop and preach. . . . But I reckon they'll be just as tickled to have him around as I was." In itself such a statement need not be given too much importance, but coming as it does at the close of this strange fable and paralleling so exactly the Dionysian resolutions of Mr. Caldwell's other novels, we are probably justified in believing that we finally come to rest in another rather homely reassertion of the religion of the flesh. In other words, Mr. Caldwell belongs to the tradition of modern writers who seek to discover an escape from the uncomfortable situation of being a man in the more limited satisfactions of the animal. Without reviving any of the familiar intellectual arguments against such a point of view, one may inquire whether Mr. Caldwell in so limiting his own interest in his characters does not also limit the possibility of very much future interest in his writing. In the last analysis, his reduction of man to animal, of experience to sensation, involves eliminations which the novelist, who addresses himself to men and not to animals, can hardly afford to make through very many successive works.

WILLIAM TROY

Truth Through the Transom

The American Diplomatic Game. By Drew Pearson and Constantine Brown. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

THIS is a book which offers the reviewer two utterly different lines of approach. In itself it affronts every tradition of journalism, the trade to which I have belonged all my life. Drew Pearson's technique is that of the transom. It consists of viewing public events and public men, not as Walter Lippmann does, from Olympus and with a telescope, but from a ladder and looking over the transom with an opera glass. Now personally I prefer Lippmann to Pearson just as I like Plutarch better than Pepys. As a result, I should like nothing better than to be able to say that the results of Pearson's methods are as unattractive as are his methods themselves. But I am bound to say that if anyone asked me to direct him to an illuminating explanation of the post-war performances of American statesmanship, I should have to send him to Pearson and not to Lippmann.

In itself this book is purely destructive; it discloses how and when American statesmanship broke down in all its more considerable undertakings of the post-war years. It leaves it to the reader to answer the question of why the failures were invariable, as beyond any doubt they have been. Nevertheless, all the evidence is there. If you read the description of the circumstances of the formulation of the Kellogg Pact, the conduct of the London naval conference, the launching of the Hoover moratorium, and, finally, the birth of the Stimson doctrine, you see the reason why all led to humiliating collapse.

Take the Kellogg Pact. Its origin is to be traced to two men, Salmon O. Levinson and James T. Shotwell. In their separate fashions they had hit upon the idea of outlawing war. The former approached it from the legalistic point of view, the latter from the academic. Mr. Kellogg was too busy with practical problems to deal with cranks. In the end he did accept it just as a tired business man buys a ticket to the Irish Derby Sweep in order to get rid of the importunate ticket seller. As it happened, he not only won the capital prize, but in addition that prize turned out to be the Nobel award. One day he awoke to find himself famous.

Take, again, the story of the American delegation at the London naval conference. From the very start it was clear that the only hope of a five-power pact was American consent to a consultative agreement. Otherwise France was bound to wreck the show. But Mr. Hoover did not realize it, Mr. Stimson did not perceive it, even Dwight Morrow was only led to it by the reliance he placed upon the judgment of George Rublee, who did see it. Eventually Morrow persuaded Stimson, but Stimson's message to Hoover came too late and the London conference collapsed. Afterwards Mr. Stimson is described as speculating to himself when he first hit upon this idea. The story of how Hoover fumbled the moratorium because he hated the French is fully told. So also is the story of how the State Department once claimed for Hoover the credit for a "solution" of the financial crisis in Europe in 1931, which was threatening world catastrophe; and how Stimson, with the honesty which is as characteristic of the man as is his inherent unselfishness, exploded the cheap self-seeking of Washington by confessing that he knew of no American plan, and such useful suggestions as had been advanced were to be credited to the British Prime Minister and not to the American President.

Now these tales are not the inventions of an inveterate reporter; they are not the creations of a cheap cynic. All things considered they do constitute a fair picture. They disclose the reason that American foreign policy has been consistently futile. Stimson was not a mean man or a petty person. Morrow was very far from being a fool, even if the position into which he was thrust at London was new to him and, before he had mastered it, the good moment had passed forever. Nor was that much-criticized and, on the whole, properly criticized State Department of ours wholly without vision. On the contrary crabbed, conceited, academic Stanley Hornbeck had a grasp of realities in the Far East which would have earned him a knighthood in Great Britain. But who would listen to him until it was too late? The Stimson doctrine was evolved in time to get us in up to our neck in the Manchurian affair but only long after it could have helped get the Japanese out of Manchuria.

Hughes with his Washington conference, Kellogg with his pact, Stimson with his doctrine, and last of all poor Hull with his tariff-reform notions, which belong to a day as dead as Queen Anne—in Pearson's narrative you see them all similarly fumbling on the margins of a new phase in American history. Like General Trochu during the defense of Paris in 1871, they are credited with a plan and they accept the credit. But in reality they have no plan. Knowledge, experience, conviction—of these they have little. All of them would honestly like to do something, first for peace and second for the Administration to which they belong. Above all they are not wicked men, wicked in the sense of being militarists, imperialists, super-nationalists. On the contrary, they are morally and intellectually average men. They are asked to formulate a policy for a country which has so far failed to make up its own mind. They are invariably caught between the prerogatives of the Senate and the pretensions of Presidents. They honestly seek to make the world safe for peace but they actually are expected to make it secure for the party in power at the next election. And so far as one can see, nothing has changed between 1920 and 1935 save the Administration.

FRANK H. SIMONDS

A Philosophic Pathfinder

Mind, Self and Society. By George H. Mead. Edited by Charles W. Morris. University of Chicago Press. $5.

THESE posthumous papers represent the ripe fruit of one of America's most original, but comparatively neglected, philosophers. They bring together in systematic and detailed argument a series of views until now only available in truncated form in a scattered variety of technical publications. If philosophical eminence be measured by the extent to which a man's writings anticipate the focal problems of a later day and contain a point of view which suggests persuasive solutions to many of them, then George Herbert Mead has justly earned the high praise bestowed upon him by Dewey and Whitehead as "a seminal mind of the very first order."

At the time Mead began his studies on the social presuppositions of the mind and self, professional philosophers were concerned almost exclusively with the relations between the subject and object, spirit and matter, individual and society—and with the insoluble problems of how to put together again elements which the traditional method of stating philosophic questions had forever separated. Mead's painstaking empirical account of mind as social action expressed in the interplay of gesture and symbol, and of the contents of mind as a historic product of social interaction, seemed to many of his contemporaries irrelevant or, at best, tangential to the main lines of philosophic inquiry. And yet by making the nature of communication between selves his central topic, and under-

They're talking about these timely and important books in circles where serious-minded people meet—

MOBILIZING FOR CHAOS

By O. W. Riegel

"The statement that there is dynamite in this book, followed by the imprimatur of the Yale University Press, leads one to expect the sensational substantiated by documented facts, and this is exactly what the author gives us. . . . The body of the book should prove sensational to all laymen and exceedingly interesting to journalists."—George Seldes in The Nation. $2.50

The Twilight of the SUPREME COURT

By Edward S. Corwin

An up-to-the-minute appraisal of the New Deal, the Recovery Program, and the NRA in the light of constitutional principles. $2.50

THE DOCTOR IN HISTORY

By Howard W. Haggard, M.D.

Author of "Devils, Drugs and Doctors." "He has done for medical history what Van Loon did for geography."—New York Herald Tribune. Over 100 illustrations. $3.75

MAXIMILIAN Emperor of Mexico

By his Private Secretary, Jose Blasio

Translated by Robert Hammond Murray, with foreword by Carleton Beals. "Blasio's book is indispensable . . . the best first-hand book on the reign of Maximilian . . . spangled with the shine of absorbing details that only a private secretary can notice and only a gifted one notes down."—New York Times. Illustrated. $3.00

A COMMON FAITH

By John Dewey

Fourth printing of this much discussed book. "The pure distillation of a great mind on the great subject of religion." John Haynes Holmes in N. Y. Herald Tribune. $1.50

YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS

New Haven, Connecticut

scoring its necessary and multiple reference to an objective continuum of social experience and activity, he was delivering a flank attack upon the conflicting schools of idealism and realism whose noisy verbal whirr composes the theme song of most of the history of modern philosophy. The question which Mead implicitly raised—namely, to what extent the traditional metaphysical, logical, and epistemological problems are the result of an inadequate analysis of the nature of communication, language, and thought—is now being explicitly forced on the attention of the philosophers, from fields as wide apart as foundational mathematics to genetic psychology. Meaning and the meaning of meaning are the prolegomena to any future philosophy.

A brief indication of the concrete philosophic bearing of some of Mead's conclusions will reveal the fruitfulness of his approach. If personal consciousness is neither logically nor temporally prior to social experience but, as Mead holds, built up in us out of organized social attitudes and processes through the mechanism of language, then the ghosts of philosophic subjectivism are finally laid. The familiar question, posed in one form or another from Bishop Berkeley to Bertrand Russell, as to how we can legitimately go from the experienced elements of our private world to the neutral structures of a public world no longer is intelligible once its presuppositions about meaning and communication are challenged. Every meaningful description of our personal experience already calls attention to facts and forms of behavior—to things and persons—which are outside that experience. Conversely, if an objective social experience is the matrix out of which all meanings are discriminated, then science, as the organization of meanings for the purposes of the prediction and control of things, reports not about physical things as they exist in their bare externality but about the world of commonly experienced things. Scientific objectivity must be interpretable as one form of social objectivity, that is, in terms of what is invariant in social experience. The contrasts between the "illusory" solid substance of things and their "real," non-experimental, scientific character, dramatically exploited for different ends from Democritus to Eddington, vanishes in the light of careful inquiry into the role of signs and symbols in thinking.

This first volume does not concern itself directly with large philosophic issues but with the linguistic and social groundwork of consciousness. Consciousness, for Mead, is not located in the brain nor in the muscular contractions of the larynx. These are mere conditions of its appearance, but neither the only nor the most significant conditions. In its distinctive sense, consciousness emerges out of the interpenetrations of individual behavior by social processes. Since the scientific study of behavior must give an account of the social conditions in and through which it unfolds, psychology may more properly be regarded as a branch of social psychology than of physiology.

Mead's main problem is to reveal the specific mechanisms through which the stream of social experience waters and nourishes the individual self. Following the lead of Wundt, he maintains that gestures are the fundamental vehicles of communication, uniting at least two individuals in a common social pattern. When gestures become significant symbols, meaningful readjustment of individuals to each other and their common situation takes place. Vocal gestures are the most exemplary instances of significant symbols. When uttered, they arouse in the individual making them the same incipient response which they arouse in another. The individual understands himself first as others understand him; he observes within himself a tendency to act toward himself as others do. This establishes a community of meaning which is enlarged by the capacity of the individual to play the same roles toward himself in successive experiences which others play. The series of roles taken at any time by society—"the generalized other"—in relation to the individual constitute his "me." When the individual becomes critically aware of the attitudes taken toward and exhibited by himself, and acts to preserve or change them, he develops personality. The "I" of self-consciousness is born.

In Mead's view social harmony and control are genuinely possible only when individuals "are able to assume the attitude of others who are involved with them in a common endeavor." The implications are obvious and are drawn by the author. Any caste or class society, by limiting the opportunities of shared social experience, restricts the number and impoverishes the quality of the personalities developing within it. Distinctions between personalities, although socially derivative, are the most precious flowers of culture. They can be preserved and multiplied, however, only in a society whose institutions make it possible for all individuals to participate significantly in cooperative activities.

Criticism and evaluation of Mead's pioneer researches must wait upon the appearance of the rest of his work. Here I wish to raise two general questions which his analysis suggests. Granted that the adjustive responses of the individual to his world acquire social dimensionality through the mechanism of language, how is language itself affected by other activities and institutions of social life? Is there any method by which the language process can be treated not only as the instrument of social communication but as the resultant effect of other social activities without raising futile and insoluble problems about the origin of language? Second, to what extent can basic differences in linguistic structure be significantly correlated with differences in social experience?

Professor Charles Morris is to be congratulated upon a very competent piece of editing. His prefatory essay provides an illuminating introduction to Mead's world of ideas.

SIDNEY HOOK

Saving Cuba

Problems of the New Cuba. Report of the Commission on Cuban Affairs. Foreign Policy Association. $3.

IF all the elaborate programs for saving Cuba which have been published by Americans during the last thirty-five years were laid end to end, they would not cover the hundred miles of sea between Key West and Havana, but their pages would amply paper the walls of more than one poor Cuban's thatched bohío and console him with the thought that, though he may still starve, good-will toward him will never cease. After thirty-five years of American persuasion, coercion, and buzzing experts, there is still no democracy in Cuba, the school system has rotted away, health control has not advanced, militarism grips the island, and trade during the depression has dropped to a pre-independence level. The people have a Sunday-school, made-in-the-U.-S.-A. constitution, but less economic independence and more starvation than under Spanish rule. For three decades Cubans have come to own less and less of their own country. Cuba today is a sick country growing sicker.

Presto! Another American program. Invited by President Carlos Mendieta, the Foreign Policy Association, financed by the Rockefeller Foundation, sent eleven experts for two months last year to investigate "the new Cuba" (sic) "in complete scientific independence." Their 500 pages of findings, at least apparently, are far more disinterested than the writings of past apologists such as Professor Chapman of California or Chester Lloyd Jones of Wisconsin.

Another foundation report! It is academic, theoretical, cautious, contradictory of its own findings. It sidesteps ticklish questions, is afraid to step on toes. Its practical whitewashing of the public utilities is inexplicable; its currency and banking suggestions are a joke. On the bright side: the report moves forward in a coherent manner rarely encountered in such multiple collaboration, through a mass of permanently valuable facts and tables, to a series of conservative, occasionally well-defined recommendations.

Even to make these temperate suggestions, the commission had to tread valiantly over the reiterated and plaintive diehard footnote objections of one of its own members, Professor Carle Clark Zimmerman of Harvard. His insect-measuring investigations of the Cuban family reveal, despite his superficiality, a frightful situation. But his only suggestion is that the living level can be raised appreciably "if a well-considered reconstruction policy be adopted." In general he burns incense hopefully before the Moloch of laissez faire.

Least satisfactory by all odds is Dr. Ernest Gruening's public-utilities chapter. Under a thin veneer of apparent academic impartiality he largely absolves the companies of past wrongdoing, presents company propaganda without due analysis, bases most of his findings on short-range data of the present plight of the utilities without presenting a complete picture of their condition, including earnings and activities, during the previous Machado period. He is more sympathetic to the companies than to the post-revolutionary governments, labor, or the public. His insistence that Machado showed no special favoritism to the Cuban Electric Company, subsidiary of the Havana Electric Utilities, the American and Foreign Power, and the Electric Bond and Share draws a rueful smile. Machado, he declares, "neither before assuming the presidency nor after was ever an official or a stockholder of the Compañía Cubana de Electricidad [Inc.] . . . Machado's company was called the Compañía Cubana de Electricidad, S. A. . . . As he sold this company to the larger company of the same name, it is not surprising that confusion should occur in the public mind." Gruening successfully adds to the confusion by this misstatement.

The so-called Machado Compañía Cubana de Electricidad, S. A., was owned by the American and Foreign Power Company (incorporated in Maine) as early as 1923. Machado was vice-president. To its Cuban subsidiary the parent company leased all its other Cuban holdings. In 1925, not 1926 as Gruening states, the Havana Electric and Utilities, Inc., took out a charter, also in Maine, to reorganize the Steinhart properties. In that year Machado, whose campaign had been heavily financed by Mr. Catlin (Electric Bond and Share representative), became President of Cuba. He never sold his company to the Compañía Cubana de Electricidad, Inc. The latter was not incorporated until December 13, 1927, in Florida, as a subsidiary of the Havana Electric and Utilities to reorganize the existing owned properties.

Mr. Catlin, president of the Cuban Electric Company before and after reorganization, was Machado's most intimate friend. Gruening makes no mention of Machado's efforts, on coming into office, to remove for perpetuity practically all the company's taxes or of the great reduction he did effect and no mention of Machado's assistance to the company in acquiring new properties; he places no importance upon Machado's brutal treatment of leaders of the various consumers' strikes or upon his refusal to permit any rate reduction by the municipalities; he forgets Machado's martial-law decree to shoot saboteurs on sight and his decree forbidding anyone to order his light service cut off. He does not examine Machado's private deals with Catlin in connection with properties resold to the Cuban Electric Company. But this marked favoritism explains the public wrath that beset the company as soon as Machado was overthrown.

Gruening ignores public-relations activities, worse in

The Best Selling Novel in America

HEAVEN'S MY DESTINATION

By Thornton Wilder

Selected by the Book-of-the-Month Club and endorsed by the critics. "Hereby proclaimed the Town Crier's book of the month."—Alexander Woolcott. $2.50

★ WINE FROM THESE GRAPES

By Edna St. Vincent Millay
The finest work of a great American poet. $2.00

★ SOUNDING HARBORS

By Eleanor Mercein Kelly
New stories by the author of "Basquerie." $2.50

★ FRANCE IN FERMENT

By Alexander Werth
True facts behind the headlines. $3.00

★ THE NATIVE'S RETURN

By Louis Adamic
"Unique . . . a gorgeous work!"—Harry Hansen. $2.75

★ ENGLISH JOURNEY

By J. B. Priestley
"Vigor, sincerity, eloquence . . . a superb reporter." $3.00
—The Nation.

★ SOLD OUT TO THE FUTURE

By Roy Helton
How to live in the present. $2.50

By the Author of "The Fault of Angels"
Harper Prize Novel — 1933

NO QUARTER GIVEN

By Paul Horgan

A drama of the private life of a genius that "will remain vividly in one's memory."—N. Y. Times. $2.50

HARPER & BROTHERS ■ 49 E. 33rd Street, New York

Cuba than in our own country, though he once wrote a book exposing them in the United States. He condones the overhead mulcting of the holding companies. Besides its income from subsidiary stocks and the interest on huge loans to subsidiaries, the Electric Bond and Share Company also charged the Cuban Electric Company, though it was 60 per cent overstaffed with highly paid executives, a sliding-scale percentage of gross profits. In return for purchasing and other administrative services the parent company was given an average of more than $350,000 annually (1928-33 average). Gruening emphasizes the fact that in making the $1,500,000 annual purchase for the Cuban company, the holding concern bought fuel and oil through long-range contract at 90 cents a barrel when the best spot price was $1.25. This is merely a routine trade practice scarcely warranting such exaggerated commissions. The parent company also takes heavy slices through a subsidiary supply and engineering company. Profits drift up through five companies; loans and services sift down through five companies with attendant servicing and commission charges on each floor. Moreover, the Cuban company must pay profits on capitalization watered to nearly double the physical valuation.

Gruening makes no clear statement that the Cuban rates have been the highest in the world. He admits they should be reduced, but uses most of his space, not in scientifically analyzing production and distribution costs, but in trying to prove by partial, incomplete, and unsound data what everyone knows, namely, that costs are greater in Cuba with imported coal than in most places in the United States. He fails to mention, however, that labor costs are much lower. He greatly exaggerates the "load" factor in costs and compares the wide fluctuation in the amount of current used at different hours in the day for the single week ending April 28, 1934, with the fluctuations experienced by the Montana Power and the Texas Power and Light Company. He picks a week soon after a military coup d'état and subsequent to a long period of disorder, also a week just after the grinding season, when fluctuations in Cuba are unusually great. On the other hand, this week is particularly favorable in Montana and Texas. In the form in which he presents his evidence it is merely valueless company propaganda. He has ignored recent technical studies in this country regarding distribution costs. The Grau rate cut was unscientific, as he indicates, though the new rate established by his technical commission was still higher than almost anywhere in this country.

In labor conflicts Gruening takes the side of the company unions, while denying they are company unions. I was in Havana during the strikes he describes. Among other things the strikers demanded a minimum wage of $1.60, but Gruening is far more disturbed because the average monthly wage of thirty-five leading executives was only $638—this average did not include the extravagant salary paid Mr. Steinhart, though later Gruening himself shows that out of sixty-seven members of the better-paid personnel dismissed during the temporary government management of the company, only twenty-eight were really needed.

Professor Graham of Princeton, a hoary dollar- and gold-standard bearer, wishes to tie the Cuban peso at par to the American dollar, thus making a monetary unit entirely too high in value. As a salve to its national pride, Cuba, he claims, should have its own currency, but backed by American dollars, deposited by a trustee in American banks, and invested in short-term American government and banking securities. Obviously the future of the American dollar is by no means assured. Graham's proposals would merely make Cuba's currency and banking a tail to the American bankers' kite. He offers no practical advice for the prompt establishment of rural credit, but wishes on Cuba building and loan societies, trust companies, and investment banking. His only suggestion for combating the monopoly of foreign banking corporations is "legislation establishing at least a minimum of good banking." A bold bad man indeed!

Cuba should turn to Mexico, which has a sound managed currency with silver banking, has completely broken the power of the foreign banks, and has made banking increasingly serve social ends. A similar currency policy would at once stimulate sugar, tobacco, and fruit growing, curtail all unnecessary imports, force diversification, stimulate small-scale manufacturing, and reduce the internal debt. A capital export tax would strengthen the trend.

Mr. Thomson's chapters on labor are a vast improvement, though they lack background—investigation of unemployment, seasonal labor, wages, and living costs. From them we can conclude for ourselves that all the Cuban workers got from the so-called revolution—and this from the independent, non-recognized Grau government—was an eight-hour day, a strengthening of the 1916 workmen's compensation act, the right to hold 50 per cent of all jobs, and compulsory arbitration. Under Mendieta the arbitration law was converted into an instrument of tyranny. Strikers then received the right of being tried as ordinary criminals by the special tribunal of national defense—tantamount to a martial-law decree. Mr. Thomson fails to show us that though Mendieta uses more legal lather, his treatment of Cuban labor differs little from that of the odious Machado. No account is given of the government's anti-workers' terror. Instead, Thomson fusses over the 50 per cent law and the deportation of black Haitians without prior court hearings. We wish Cuba would heed his suggestions and then demand that the United States correct its own vicious treatment of aliens.

Mr. Fetter presents the customary exhaustive public-debt material. He suggests as one possibility regarding the Chase bank loans, repudiated by a government commission, that they be adjudicated by The Hague—a favorite trap for colonial countries. As recompense for actual benefits received, Cuba should make a study of the Warren Brothers' road contracts (not made by the commission) and the manner in which the money was loaned and spent. The Cuban people should estimate and deduct the damages done to the country by the bank's assistance to an illegal despotism, especially as the bank and the State Department, which indorsed the loans, were repeatedly warned that the loans were improperly made to an illegal government in violation of the Platt Amendment. Certainly the Foreign Policy Commission is fully justified in its mild proposal to place reconstruction ahead of debt-payment resumption. (Zimmerman pops his protest.)

The best high light of the commission's report is Professor Jenks's thoroughly capable investigation of the sugar situation. His analysis of the contractual relations between the colonos and large company centrales is especially illuminating. As in his previous book, "Our Cuban Colony," he remains too cordial to the previous working of the Chadbourne sugar plan, basically a bankers' arrangement, not a bona fide sugar plan at all. It has tended to ruin the independent colono whom Jenks favors.

The most constructive suggestions are concerned with land colonization and diversification. To diversify crops and put the people on the land would reduce costly importation of foodstuffs, guarantee all-year-round sustenance, and make labor sufficiently independent to demand decent wages. The commission naively suggests that the sugar companies cooperate by setting aside parts of their land for the cultivation of foodstuffs. Cut-throat competition obviously prevents such benevolence.

The commission taxes the Roosevelt Administration for having failed to recognize the Grau Administration, the only government in all Cuba's history of truly Cuban origin. It valiantly urges the relinquishment of the Guantánamo naval base. Otherwise with regard to political affairs the report is weak and evasive. It hopes that "some means may be successfully found for establishing a constitutional regime in succession to the provisional government." Then it can be questioned whether the existing forms are adequate. This pious State Department hope puts the cart before the horse. Precisely because Sumner Welles cooked up a pseudo-constitutionality for his puppet De Céspedes government has the Cuban situation become so politically confused. Cuba's American-made constitution has never worked.

No clear, extended account is given by the commission of the continuous American intervention in Cuban affairs from the time that Welles and Roosevelt put the skids under Machado until Mendieta was finally inducted into office through Batista's betrayal of Grau and the government was handed over to a decrepit political clique, with all those elements which really made the revolution, except the upstart Batista, eliminated.

The commission mournfully suggests that an autonomous body of able and honorable citizens "aloof from the vicissitudes of partisan politics and dominated by non-political members" take up the task of its reconstruction program. Some of Cuba's most able and honorable citizens secretly protested to the commission against its findings and were promptly jailed or molested by the present government.

The race is on between a social revolution and an undisguised military coup by Batista or some other military leader who has played the American game. American interests are already whispering in Batista's ear that he should save Cuba. Thus the commission is blithely unaware of the revolutionary and social forces hammering Cuba on the anvil. Its conclusions all depend on the impossible return of old forms of apparent constitutionality, business revival, and American paternalism. Though it mentions cooperatives and land colonies, it carefully closes the door on nearly all collectivist tendencies and is careful to point out that its suggestions need not injure any existing enterprises. It wants to help everybody, to give every Cuban worker's family an avocado tree (this might be taken as the commission's slogan), to develop a new rural middle class, to preserve big business, to avoid disturbing existing property rights. Thus it largely evades the whole problem of American corporate ownership.

Cuba cannot live until the drain of foreign profits is vastly reduced. The burden of rent, interest, and repayment of the principal on foreign loans, on a billion and a half dollars of American investments, not to mention the enormous British and Spanish holdings, is simply too great for the island to bear. Any well-meaning reforms will run foul of this fact. The commission wishes to have its cake and eat it too. It repeatedly suggests the pressing need for Cuba to hire more American experts. God help the Cubans if some of the members of this commission are a sample!

CARLETON BEALS

Fiction in Our Time

Modern Fiction. By Dorothy Brewster and Angus Burrell. Columbia University Press. $2.75.

THE authors of "Modern Fiction" know the field of the modern novel thoroughly, and this volume, like its predecessors, "Dead Reckonings in Fiction" and "Adventure or Experience," moves with the ease and grace that come of that perfect mastery. The stress here is on the technique of the novel, the only problem in fact that the student of a literary genre can soundly set himself. The essays that deal with Dostoevski, Conrad, Joyce, Proust, and so on, aim at defining the technical distinctiveness of each writer, so that,

RANDOM HOUSE

FROM THE SPRING LIST:

Stephen Spender

VIENNA; a new poem, $1.25

THE POETRY OF

C. Day Lewis

His complete work to date, in one volume, including the essay, A Hope for Poetry. $2.50

A COMPANION VOLUME to the WEEKEND BOOK

Sea Sequel

542 pages of salt-water songs, poems, chanties; tales of piracy, mutiny and romance by famous authors. $2.50

Rain from Heaven

The Theatre Guild play by S. N. Behrman. $2.00

Gold Eagle Guy

The Group Theatre play by Melvin Levy. $2.00

COMING LATER:

Gertrude Stein

LECTURES IN AMERICA. $2.50, March 6th.

J. M. Synge

His entire work in one volume for the first time. $3.50, March 27th.

RANDOM HOUSE SUCCESSES:

Remembrance of Things Past

by Marcel Proust. Four beautiful volumes, boxed, $12.50

Ulysses

by James Joyce. Complete and unabridged, $3.50

The Daring Young Man on the Flying Trapeze

and Other Stories by William Saroyan. 6th printing, $2.50

— Send for a New Catalog —

RANDOM HOUSE, 20 E. 57 ST., N. Y. C.

taken in the sum, they give a most informing picture of the evolution of the novel during these past fifty years. The authors are concerned to be sound rather than striking, and one notes that their formulas are for the most part the ones that have best withstood the test of criticism at large. In Conrad the basic research, we are told, is the problem of the individual's spiritual isolation; in Proust, the remembrance of things past; in Virginia Woolf, character and curiosity about the whole influx of life; in Maugham, Bennett, and Mann, the passage of time. The quest for such formulas supplies an almost ideal method from the pedagogical standpoint; and for the general reader, too, such analyses are of the greatest utility as simplifying a very embroiled and forbiddingly vast mass of contemporary literature. Most of these essays have a permanent look. They give one the impression of being, as the professors say, "definitive."

The book, one might caution, has to be taken in carefully measured doses—say, two essays a week, after meals, with the proper dilutives. Judged as a book among books this is solid diet. Its heaviness does not lie in the style. The authors write always with elegance and not seldom with wit and force. It does not lie altogether in the thought. The authors are agile, original, ingenious thinkers, and there is little surplusage. There are three difficulties, as I take it. In the first place, the analyses of the various novels are too detailed and too direct. The logical summary of a work of art, unless it is practiced by a writer who makes a special craft of the digest—as William Griffith does, for instance—is one of the deadliest of all forms of literature, and I believe that history would show that one of the surest ways to kill interest in a book is to epitomize it. To the reader of this volume such summaries give an unescapable impression of being in the classroom.

In the second place, the authors of "Modern Fiction" are badly bitten by "psychology," and especially by a psychology of the Freudian variety with its mess of mother and father complexes, its "releases" and "redemptions," and much other intellectual trumpery that emanates from that school. Verily, it is as though our age had wearied of seeking the key to the riddle of the universe among the stars and had concluded, as an inspiration of despair, that there might be a chance of finding it hidden in the garbage can. The "psychological" method is simply our present-day version of the trick of "explaining" the perfectly well-known by the altogether unknown, a method which is forever being revived because it always allows us to find exactly the sort of explanation that we are looking for. "We all hate our fathers and would like to murder them." Such, for example, is one of the great discoveries of D. H. Lawrence, that Newton of the universe which the Great God Sigmund Freud created in his own image. So we go looking for the father complex in any novel that happens to be before us. Let a character make a pass at his old man in a quarrel and all the bells in Freudiana start ringing, for another writer has found his "release," another writer has been "redeemed." All such twaddle reduces literary criticism to the level of the testimonial and experience meetings in any of the medico-psychopathic religious sects, and yields results of a dulness and banality from which there is no escape.

The other trouble probably is with the novel itself. One has to be grateful to the authors of "Modern Fiction" for sparing one the nuisance of reading many of these so-called masterpieces of the novel in our time, for, on the assurance of such well-disposed authorities, one may feel that one has skipped them without losing any of the revelations that modern culture has to offer. The "stream of consciousness" bears on its grimy surface little save dead cats and rotting melon rinds. We used to have the medieval "vision," and that seemed childish. Now we have the modern "reverie," and that is supposed to be a great improvement. All the same, one can still take comfort in the fact that somewhere in between the visions and the reveries comes the nineteenth century with a few great men with a few great ideas. One looks in vain throughout these many digests for even the suggestion of an idea that is, let alone big, interesting. According to the authors of "Modern Fiction," most of the writers they review had an impassioned curiosity as to the "meaning of life." They never seem to find it, because they all sooner or later get distracted by the quest as to what happens when as a babe, or earlier, you have conceived improper designs on your mother. At fifty, the answer is, you will surely be leading a double life, and there will be no remedy except art, bolshevism, or suicide. It all reads like propaganda for Grade A milk, and it is almost enough to drive one to humanism.

One might summarize these speculations on dulness in the precept that to be interesting in our time the literary critic needs not only a theory of a literary genre but also a theory of life; for in appraising some of these writers as "great artists" the authors of "Modern Fiction" are probably doing their duty as literary critics, but they are somewhat remiss in their full scientific duty in failing on more than one occasion to designate certain celebrated idiots as the idiots they are.

ARTHUR LIVINGSTON

A Pleasant View of Decay

Music Ho! A Study of Music in Decline. By Constant Lambert. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.75.

IN so far as a book review is a news item, the only way I know to report on this bright and intelligent volume by Constant Lambert is to quote from it as copiously as possible. To begin with: since it is a survey of music, I might state my belief that a reader could find its pages extremely stimulating though the sounds of music concerned him not at all. Those who are acquainted with the works which the author discusses will of course be better equipped to derive the maximum satisfaction from his lively comments, but the main requirement for the non-musical would be a general interest in the symptomatology of recent cultural movements, in the mental topography of our decades. Pungent, picturesque, aphoristic—the author gives us a succession of succinct characterizations. Himself a composer of great merit, he has a gift for verbalizing his tonal experiences; and though not one single passage of musical notation is quoted in this book, one gets an excellent picture of modern composition.

In fact, Mr. Lambert makes us realize that the "outline" is beginning to take on the dignity of a new literary form. Too often undertaken as a mere business venture, it has affronted serious readers by its superficiality. At its worst, it provides mere identification marks of the "Book of Etiquette" variety. But Mr. Lambert bears witness that it can become quite a civilized medium, with much the same interpretative value as one might derive from a good realistic novel of the panoramic sort. Indeed, such works have certain notable advantages over the realistic novel per se. Since they usually deal with some highly barometric aspect of the times—some art or practical activity at its most expressive stage—the writer automatically has at his disposal representative figures. And whereas the realist of the novel must often find that his cult of "reality" pledges him to report the most dismal drivel as the "truth" about people's minds and speech, the realist of the critical survey can be at once accurate and eloquent. He has, as it were, the equivalent of Shakespeare's noblemen. He can give us selective statements, statements made by people who are actually living yet who show a certain captaincy in their choice of behavior. And in direct contrast with the rules of novelistic realism, the sharper and more brilliant the statement of the critical survey, the greater its "photographic truth."

In any event, Mr. Lambert's book is illuminating. Of Stravinsky's rhythms he says: "They are rhythms suspended in space, arbitrary patterns in time, forming a parallel to Debussy's impressionist use of harmonies detached from melodic reasoning." Of Schönberg's harmonic system: "There are two ways of destroying the significance of the House of Lords—you can either abolish it or you can make everyone a member. We have no sense of modulation in Debussy's music for the simple reason that he doesn't modulate, and we have no sense of modulation in Schönberg's music because the work itself has become one vast modulation." Or to quote another of his ingenious contrasts: he says that Wagner gives us the "appeal of a ship with the hero's sweetheart on board leaving the quay, or the departure of a troop train in time of war," whereas Debussy's appeal "is of the less personal and more subtle order that we get from the mere sight of an unknown ship in sail." Stravinsky he both praises and condemns as a master of the pastiche, skilled at assembling musical incongruities, and borrowing from earlier styles without any sense of their inner significance but with concern for externals only: "Like a savage standing in delighted awe before those two symbols of an alien civilization, the top hat and the pot de chambre, he is apt to confuse their functions."

He disagrees violently with those composers who attempt to build their works upon the traditional folk melodies, which are unsuited to modern harmonic treatment, resist constructive manipulation when used as ingredients of larger symphonic forms, and are too alien to the quality of contemporary life. He likewise shows little sympathy for the "wrong note" school, whose members acquire a doubtful distinction for their compositions by the arbitrary shifting of harmonic intervals.

When discussing the shortcomings of "Exoticism and Low Life," he writes: "There is a definite limit to the length of time a composer can go on writing in one dance rhythm (this limit is obviously reached by Ravel toward the end of 'La Valse' and toward the beginning of 'Bolero')." He makes the quite paradoxical but just observation that realistic music should be used only in connection with the events it describes, concluding: "The place for music of the Honegger type is not the concert hall but the cinema. Those who are bored by 'Pacific 231' in the concert hall would have been surprised at the brilliant effect it made when used in conjunction with the Soviet film 'The Blue Express'." On the subject of "highbrow jazz," he suggests that the composer must extend the harmonic vocabulary of the popular syncopationists, but "this development must be on the lines of a broader view of what is desirable as consonance rather than on a narrower view of what constitutes dissonance."

Sibelius is this author's giant—and he writes some convincing pages upon Sibelius's virtues. After many sharp chapters devoted to the processes of musical "decline," we appreciate his firm attachment to the lonely Finn. The one great drawback of Lambert's study, from my point of view, is that it shows too little sympathy for the aesthetic behind the new collectivist trends in art. "The artist who is one of a group," he says, "writes for that group alone, whereas the artist who expresses personal experience may in the end reach universal experience." This is not the issue. Art is not merely a problem in production—as in the recent Art for Art's Sake movement. Nor is it merely a problem in consumption—as in the earlier doctrines of "appreciation." It is a problem in the coordination of production and consumption. An occasional great inventor may permit himself a long step in advance; but the trouble with Mr. Lambert's attitude is that it asks all to write as though they were the occasional great.

KENNETH BURKE

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

MID-WINTER CLEARANCE

Save Up to 75% of Original Prices on

BOOK BARGAINS

OFFERED BY AMERICA'S OLDEST MAIL ORDER BOOK HOUSE

INTRODUCTORY OFFER

FREE!

With Each Order of Two or More Books Listed Here

PEN and PENCIL All-In-One

A smoothly writing fountain pen at one end, a mechanical pencil at the other, the EVERLAST is guaranteed a lifetime. Has storage chamber for extra leads, eraser, visible large-capacity ink-reservoir. In black or beautiful mottled colors. SEND COUPON WITH ORDER TO OBTAIN FREE AS DESCRIBED ABOVE.

1. DANTE'S DIVINE COMEDY. The famous Henry F. Cary translation. 130 full-page Gustave Doré illustrations. 652 pages. Large clear type. Handsomely, durably bound in tan buckram, size 6 3/4 x 10 in. (Published at $10.00.) Ass'n Price, $2.98
2. SCULPTURE. By A. M. Rindge. From prehistoric and Egyptian times to the present, with emphasis on the contemporary. 300 illustrations. (Published at $6.00.) Ass'n Price, $1.69
3. THE WORK, WEALTH AND HAPPINESS OF MANKIND. By H. G. Wells. First edition. In 2 large, fully illustrated vols. Boxed. (Published at $7.50.) Ass'n Price (the set), $1.98
4. A HISTORY OF ITALIAN PAINTING. By Oliver S. Tonks, Ph.D. 102 interesting half-tone illustrations. 430 pages. (Published at $4.00.) Ass'n Price, $1.49

These books postpaid within U. S. or Canada at these special prices; elsewhere, 14c extra per volume.

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION (Est. 1884)

367-373 Fourth Ave., New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $..... Please send the books checked below:

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11
(Mark circles around books desired)

- ☐ Send me FREE PEN and PENCIL as offered above.
☐ Send me FREE CATALOG No. 258-N.

Name .....

Address .....

City .....

State .....

5. Complete in 20 volumes

Fundamentals of MUSICAL ART

Published at $40.00

Ass'n Price, $6.95

EDWARD DICKINSON, LITT. D., Editor-in-Chief. Handsomely, durably bound in artcraft, titles and cover decorations stamped in gold. Pocket size, 4 1/4 x 7 in. (Published at $40.00.) The complete 20 volume set at our Ass'n Price, $6.95

THE TITLES ARE: I—Introduction to Music. II—The Folk Song and Dance. III—The Art Song and Its Composer. IV—The Growth and Use of Harmony. V—The Art of Listening. VI—Choral Music and the Oratorio. VII—The Music of the Church. VIII—Great Pianists and Composers. IX—The Organ Composers and Literature. X—The Violin, Cello and String Quartet. XI—Who's Who in the Orchestra. XII—Early and Classic Symphonies. XIII—Beethoven and the Romantic Symphony. XIV—Modern Symphonic Forms. XV—Early Italian and French Opera. XVI—Modern French and Italian Opera. XVII—German and Russian Opera. XVIII—Modern Tendencies in Music. XIX—Music as a Social Force in America, and The Science of Practice. XX—Glossary of Terms, and Index.

6. KIPLING'S COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS. Inclusive edition (1885-1926). Contains index to first lines besides alphabetical list of contents. Handsomely, durably bound in full leather. Silk head and footbands, title and cover decoration stamped in gold, gold top. Boxed, 862 pages. (Published at $7.50.) Ass'n Price, $1.98

7. THE GREATEST ARCHITECT OF THE RENAISSANCE — Peruzzi of Siena. By W. W. Kent, Member of American Institute of Architects. Illustrated with 89 full-page plates. (Published at $7.50.) Ass'n Price, $0.89

8. PICTURESQUE AMERICA. By John Francis Kane. Contains over 250 fascinating photographs, America's amazing scenic marvels. Originally called a bargain at $15.00; now brought up to date and handsomely bound at special reduced Ass'n Price, $2.98

9. TWELVE-INCH GLOBE. Measures 15 1/4 inches from top to base. Up-to-the-minute in detail. Printed in 10 colors. Late 1935 edition. (Retail price, $13.50.) Ass'n Price, $3.98

10. BI-SEXUAL LOVE. By Dr. William Stekel. Authorized translation by Dr. James S. Van Teslaar. (Published at $5.00.) Ass'n Price, $1.69

11. THE HOMOSEXUAL NEUROSIS. By Dr. William Stekel. Authorized translation by Dr. James S. Van Teslaar. (Published at $5.00.) Ass'n Price, $1.69

N-13

The OPEN ROAD in SOVIET RUSSIA

Ninth Season

The Soviet Union is drawing thousands of visitors—
Because it is humanly the most interesting country in the world today.

Because government administration of all enterprise makes travel cheap . . . on a dollar basis.

Of the thousands who visit the Soviet Union each season, there are a few hundred who seek more than surface impressions and who therefore require more than the standard services. Through its own independent representation in Moscow, and by virtue of its long-established connections with Soviet institutions, The Open Road affords the enquiring traveler special opportunities and advantages.

Group tours, and service to independent travelers—

Detailed advice on application to 18th Floor

THE OPEN ROAD
56 West 45th Street New York
Cooperating with Intourist

THINK OR SINK says
"Chem"—who knows America's social and political systems from the inside, and who proposes definite remedies for the definite evils he sees. A book that will change your whole life, and may change our civilization. Send a dollar for

"ON HUMAN EGOISM"

on five days' approval to Charles Henry Mackintosh at his winter retreat. If you collect autographed First Editions, just mention it, and "Chem" will comply.

CHEM PUBLISHING CO. • WINTER PARK, FLORIDA

~~~~~ Not Even Supposed to Exist! ~~~~~

The SEX LIFE of the UNMARRIED ADULT

Edited by Ira S. Wile, M.D.

The contributors include Dr. Robert L. Dickinson, Margaret Mead, Prof. Ernest
R. Groves, Mary Beard, Prof. Ernest W. Burgess, Horace M. Kallen, Prof. Robert Morris Lovett, Lorine Pruette, Morris L. Ernst, Prof. N. W. Ingalls.

"A much needed, candid, and sane discussion of one of the most important social and moral problems of the day. The book should ~~be~~ a real stir."
—HARRY ELMER BARNES.

$2.50 at all bookstores, VANGUARD PRESS, Dept. N, 100 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

The Pilgrimage of Heine

Poet in Exile. By Antonina Vallentin. Viking Press. $3.

A NUMBER of difficulties lie in wait for the contemporary biographer of Heine. Not the least of these is the complex character of the poet who has now become the symbol of the Jew exiled from Germany. Another difficulty arises when we remember that Heine has told his own story remarkably well. The biographer is then placed in the embarrassing position of competing with self-conscious, fully documented source material: an autobiography, letters, a journal, a travel diary, and a number of poems. A further difficulty lies in the fact that the story of Heine's career is familiar to everyone who has the slightest interest in him, and so far whatever fresh material has been brought to light seems to fall well within the pattern of a life history that Heine himself recognized as his own.

Yet, in English, the "definitive" biography of the poet remains to be written, and for the moment we must allow the present "life" to answer that demand. Handicapped by an inept, cumbersome translation from the German text, the English reader is slowly forced to admit that Antonina Vallentin has written an excellent rephrasing of a well-known story.
Perhaps her style is not as bad as it is made to appear, and by presenting us with a "social interpretation" of her subject she has solved many of the more obvious difficulties that confront the Heine biographer.

She has chosen, I think, the very method that actually reveals the poet, journalist, public figure, man. It is a method not unlike that of Taine's. Time, place, and historical event behind the man are soberly presented and then carefully interwoven with the episodes of his daily existence. We have then gained the primary motives for those startling contradictions in Heine's character. We are made to see clearly the reasons for Napoleon worship in that fragment of society where Heine was born, that segment of semi-professional, semi-tradesman class of German-Jewish society that saw no conflict between a complete assimilation with German culture and an international ideal of intellectual liberalism. To this is added the direct influence of the home environment upon a supersensitive boy. Heine's father and mother lived in an atmosphere of "great expectations," of hoping to fall heir to a fortune possessed by well-to-do relatives. With them Heine entered a strange world of economic insecurity, in which perhaps great unearned wealth or deepest poverty lay just around the corner. It was a breeding place for fantasy, for hope beyond hope, and a final stage for disillusionment beyond despair. One must be granted imagination to see the possibilities of such a world; but imagination was Heine's property, which he cherished in good fortune or ill, and then turned critic upon, revealing as he did the contradictions of nationalist and revolutionary, petty bourgeois and artist.

The central problem in Heine's life was one of self-betrayal: he could be a "good nephew" to a rich uncle and that uncle's dearest enemy; he could be the eloquent German nationalist and the champion of an international revolutionary cause; he could not live without the luxuries of bourgeois comfort, yet the actual enjoyment of them was destroyed by exile, by irregular living habits, and by the acquisition of an incurable disease. However unconscious, however "inevitable" such behavior might have been, this was self-betrayal to a purpose, for the result whether in self-defense or self-assertion was literature and literature of a revolutionary order. The particular kind of self-revelation that Heine has given us will never find its solution within the society that he inhabited; nothing short of revolution would exorcise the devils in his own blood as well as in the world outside him. Under Hitler in Germany today those very devils have grown into more than life-size monsters, and Heine, a self-exiled Jew, occupies the position of prophet speaking to his people across the span of the nineteenth century.

In the present biography I found two episodes in Heine's life gaining peculiar significance—one at the beginning of his career, the other at its close. Antonina Vallentin has recreated for us the famous interview with Goethe. The youthful, ambitious Heine made his appearance before the sage at Weimar, the old man whose features had already taken on the pallor of a commemorative statue. Young Heine's poise was shattered; he stood in conference with the dead. Goethe made a polite inquiry: what was the young man writing now? Heine replied: "A Faust." The statue froze, for the last passages of the second "Faust" were still unwritten and Goethe saw himself as the one man on earth fit to supply that final answer to a lifelong problem. In leaving Weimar Heine left the past behind him, and for him it meant the beginning of a long pilgrimage.

The second episode took place in Paris in 1843; this time the prematurely aged Heine played the sage and Karl Marx the young man. The relationship struck fire and prospered, for Marx supplied that energy wherein Heine saw himself reflected as in a mirror. There was a rapid exchange of influence between the two men and they collaborated in the founding of a weekly paper, the Vorwärts. There Heine contributed his "Silesian Weavers":

Ein Fluch dem falschen Vaterlande
Wo nur gedeihen Schmach und Schande
Wo jede Blume früh geknickt,
Wo Faulnis und Moder den Wurm erquickt
Wir weben, wir weben!

I think the power of these lines contains the same relevance today as in the hour in which they were written, and in them Marx's subsequent defense of Heine as a revolutionary poet is amply justified. In Heine's case the process of self-betrayal had gone so far as to reveal the very heart of man's betrayal of himself within a universe of evil. The self-sacrifice was complete: "Und in mir lebt nur noch der Tod."

And in this final sacrifice lay his salvation.

HORACE GREGORY

Drama

A Not Very Magic Mountain

IT is reliably reported that England thought very well indeed of a piece called "Prisoners of War" when it was first produced some ten years ago. Now that it has reached the Ritz Theater after so long an interval the American public has a chance to judge for itself, but if the first-night audience furnishes any criterion it is not likely to be very much impressed. That audience, indeed, showed a tendency to giggle when it was not supposed to and it was plainly restless long before the curtain finally descended upon a series of events hardly pointed enough to hold the attention of those not especially thrilled by certain subdued references to homosexual love.

Ten years ago there was doubtless a topical interest in the story of a group of British officers marooned on a Swiss mountain and wishing they were sick enough to be paroled. The author begins by sketching their monotonous life, and there is, indeed, a certain mild effectiveness in his picture of a group of grown men whom boredom has reduced to schoolboyish bickerings. Almost inevitably something like the adolescent

Victor presents 25 minutes of DIE WALKÜRE

Lawrence Tibbett, Soloist
Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra

NOTHING could so thrillingly illustrate the progress of tone reproduction as this particular miracle of full Wagnerian orchestral richness rising out of simple-looking black discs, three-sixteenths of an inch thick!

For this is Wagner as he has never been recorded before — in the new series of Victor Higher Fidelity Recordings that far surpass anything you have ever heard in realism of recorded tone.

Wotan sings his Farewell in the superb and startlingly living voice of Lawrence Tibbett. Brasses, strings and woodwinds, every one is there in the stirring Ride of the Valkyries, soaring and sweeping again in the glowing Magic Fire Spell. Perhaps the two most amazing all-time feats of program music, ready to be reproduced at your command! Four records, eight sides, in album.

Händel's Water Music Suite. Another noteworthy Victor release for this month — recorded with superb fidelity by the new Victor processes, as played by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra. Two records, four sides. Q Your dealer will gladly play both the above selections for you.

VICTOR RECORDS

RCA Victor Division
RCA Manufacturing Co., Inc.
Camden, N. J.

☐ PLAYS ☐ FILMS ☐

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

S. N. BEHRMAN'S play

RAIN FROM HEAVEN

with JANE COWL
and JOHN HALLIDAY

GOLDEN THEATRE, 45th Street, West of Broadway.
Evenings 8:30. Matinees Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
(in association with Charles B. Cochran)
for a limited engagement

ELISABETH BERGNER in

ESCAPE ME NEVER

by MARGARET KENNEDY

SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway.
Evenings 8:30. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

"A genuine contribution to the American theatre."—Gabriel, American,
HERMAN SHUMLIN presents

The Children's Hour

By LILLIAN HELLMAN

MAXINE ELLIOTT'S THEATRE WEST 39th STREET
Evenings 8:30—50c to $3. Matinees Wed. and Sat.—2:40—50c to $2.

☐ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says ☐

ACCENT ON YOUTH. Plymouth Theater. Hopeful message for the middle-aged in a lively comedy about playwright in love with his secretary. Witty and amusing.

ANYTHING GOES. Alvin Theater. Victor Moore as Public Enemy No. 13 in a No. 1 musical revue, with Ethel Merman at her best.

ESCAPE ME NEVER. Shubert Theater. Here is a heap of theatrical rubbish, romantically entitled. Few if any indeed, could play it one-half so charmingly as Elisabeth Bergner.

LIFE BEGINS AT 8:40. Winter Garden. Disputes with "Anything Goes" for first place among the revues.

MERRILY WE ROLL ALONG. Music Box Theater. One of the outstanding hits and very good indeed if you don't mind having your serious plays use a little staycomb in their hair. By George Kaufman and Moss Hart, who excoriate cheap success without forgetting to put in a few wisecracks where they will do most good.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE. Henry Miller's Theater. Much like the above but about a movie star this time and perhaps a trifle less mechanical.

RAIN FROM HEAVEN. Golden Theater. Perhaps the best—and certainly the most substantial—of S. N. Behrman's excellent comedies. With Jane Cowl as a charming embodiment of urbanity and tolerance in a world seemingly about to lose both.

REVENGE WITH MUSIC. New Amsterdam Theater. Charles Winninger, Rex O'Malley, and Libby Holman in a lavish and generally entertaining operetta with lots of comedy and some good dancing in a more or less Spanish manner.

ROMEO AND JULIET. Martin Beck Theater. Swift and beautiful production with Katharine Cornell as Juliet, Basil Rathbone as Romeo, and Brian Aherne as Mercutio.

SAILORS OF CATTARO. Civic Repertory Theater. The third and much the best offering by the Theater Union, which goes in for plays with a revolutionary purpose. This one is all about a mutiny on board an Austrian man-of-war, and it is first rate a play, quite aside from the red-flag waving.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR. Maxine Elliott's Theater. Tense but grim drama about a fiendishly perverse child, who is played with extraordinary force by Florence McGee. One of the most discussed plays of the year.

THE PETRIFIED FOREST. Broadhurst Theater. Superb performance by Leslie Howard in Robert Sherwood's engrossing play about a lost intellectual. Exciting a melodrama but a great deal more besides.

THUMBS UP. St. James Theater. Bobby Clark, Hal Le Roy, and others in a slightly old-fashioned but entertaining review.

crush develops when each man in his loneliness picks out a pal, and the story centers around one particular youth obviously predisposed by nature to such an experience. No physical relationship develops and it is not entirely clear just how far the author intended to emphasize the possibility of any such thing, but the American director, at least, has chosen to stress the pathological aspect as strongly as the text will permit, with the result that the whole seems both timid and offensive. In a sense Barton Hepburn, who plays the leading role, is almost too good. Nearly every gesture and nearly every intonation carries a certain painful suggestion of fundamental effeminacy. He is repulsively gentle and maddeningly fussy. He quarrels shrilly, repents in abasement, and sulks like a prima donna. Given the ungrateful role, it is perhaps not easy to imagine just what else he could have done, but it is difficult to enlist the sympathy of an audience for a creature so thoroughly unattractive, and the audience does what mankind has always done when faced with a suffering outside its comprehension—it snickers uncomfortably and averts its eyes. Possibly "Prisoners of War" will enjoy a certain success of scandal but it is probably too tame for even that, and the ordinary observer will be inclined to set it down as another instance of that strange English ambition to make their contemporary drama as undramatic as possible.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"Fly Away Home" (Forty-eighth Street Theater) is an amusing minor farce in which the youngest generation confounds its elders by putting into practice the best modern theories of education. Old-fashioned virtue and romance triumph in the end but not before both have been subjected to a lively fire of predictable but deft witticisms. The cast is well trained and the audience is constantly amused.

M. M.

[Several reviews scheduled for this number have been omitted for lack of space. They will appear in early issues.]

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS ADAMIC is the author of "Dynamite: The Story of Class Violence in America" and "The Native's Return."

HEYWOOD BROWN, the well-known columnist of the World-Telegram, is the president of the American Newspaper Guild.

WILLIAM R. AMBERSON is professor of physiology in the College of Medicine at the University of Tennessee.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE contributes reviews and criticism to various literary periodicals.

LIONEL ABEL is a young poet and critic whose work appears frequently in The Nation.

HAL SAUNDERS WHITE is a member of the English Department of Washington Square College, New York University.

WILLIAM TROY is a member of the English Department of Washington Square College and The Nation's moving-picture critic.

FRANK H. SIMONDS is well known as a journalist and author.

SIDNEY HOOK is assistant professor of philosophy at New York University and lecturer at the New School for Social Research.

CARLETON BEALS is the author of "The Crime of Cuba." ARTHUR LIVINGSTON is associate professor of Romance languages at Columbia University.

KENNETH BURKE has just published a new book, "Permanence and Change."

Contents

| | |
|---|-----|
| EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS | 205 |
| EDITORIALS: | |
| Our Premier Industry | 208 |
| Our Growing Nationalism | 209 |
| Wages and Work Relief | 209 |
| Nudismo | 210 |
| ISSUES AND MEN. THE LONDON TIMES AND OTHERS. By | |
| Oswald Garrison Villard | 211 |
| CARTOON: A VOICE FROM THE WELSH MOUNTAINS. By | |
| LOW | 212 |
| LA FOLLETTE PROGRESSIVES FACE THE FUTURE. By | |
| Louis Adamic | 213 |
| THE PURGE AT THE AAA. By R. G. S. | 216 |
| NORTH CHINA BOWS TO JAPAN. By Charles Martin | 217 |
| LLOYD GEORGE'S NEW DEAL. By Harold J. Laski | 219 |
| IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter | 220 |
| CORRESPONDENCE | 222 |
| LABOR AND INDUSTRY: | |
| "The Industry." By Heywood Brown | 223 |
| That California Dictatorship. By Norman Mini | 224 |
| CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE | 226 |
| BOOKS, MUSIC, FILMS: | |
| Hitlerism and How It Grew. By Ludwig Lore | 227 |
| Housing and America. By Douglas Haskell | 228 |
| One More Jerusalem. By Florence Codman | 228 |
| The Ideology of War. By Leo Gershoy | 229 |
| Music: What Shostakovich Adds. By Kenneth Burke | 230 |
| Films: Pictorial Journalism. By William Troy | 232 |

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8;
Three Years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN:
$1 a year additional.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second-class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation,
Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher.
Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation
Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

THE ANOMALY of the NRA being administered by a board headed by S. Clay Williams, whose own tobacco industry remained without a code, has finally been corrected. The delay was not due to neglect but to the skilful use of the greatest of all industrial weapons at Washington, obstruction. Even after a code had been drafted at the NRA it was mislaid at the White House, as the President admitted at one of his press conferences. When found it was altered and now provides a minimum wage of 25 cents an hour for a forty-hour week for unskilled labor. Armin W. Riley, NRA division administrator, proposed a 35-cent minimum and a thirty-six-hour week. A study of the industry is to be undertaken by the Division of Research and Planning, whose report on the automobile industry is a memorable chapter in our depression history. This is a concession to the A. F. of L., which demanded the Riley code and will now have an opportunity to support its case. The annual income of wage-earners in the cigarette industry has steadily declined in the face of increased production and profits. In 1919 it was $853, in 1931 it had fallen to $727, and in 1933 it was $613. In 1919 some 25,000 workers made some 53 billion cigarettes; in 1931 some 21,000 workers made 117 billion cigarettes. The industry had taken $270,000,000 out of profits and invested it in labor-saving machinery. It was earning 10 per cent in the years 1920-24; in 1931 its profits rose to 16.3 per cent, or 25.5 per cent on original investment. It is stated at the NRA that wages increased 15 per cent after August, 1933, and that the present code will increase the pay of unskilled labor 20 to 40 per cent. Mr. Riley, who knows the industry thoroughly, obviously believes it can pay much more.

NOT TO BE OUTDONE by the half-billion-dollar naval budget, the chief of staff of the army has hastened to present a $400,000,000 plan for modernizing our national "defense." The proposals include an appropriation of $190,000,000 for the construction of air bases around the nation's boundaries, $11,000,000 for a similar base in Hawaii, $90,000,000 for the purchase of 800 armored aircraft, $10,000,000 for coast-defense and army posts, $16,000,000 for the acquisition of tanks, armored cars, and other mechanical equipment, and $8,000,000 for general munitions. Plans are also under way to increase the army by 50,000 men, and to build up a reserve force of 100,000 from the CCC camps. This vast appropriation—four times as large as the estimated cost of the President's security plan—would be in addition to the regular army budget of over $300,000,000. Why this huge sum is required at the present moment is not revealed. It is significant, however, that no one has even suggested that the United States is in danger of invasion by a foreign foe. Obviously there is no country or group of countries which is in a position to dispatch and maintain an expeditionary force on American soil, nor is there any foe which could send an air armada to overwhelm our army's 1,500 modern fighting planes. The fact is that the army is merely interested in obtaining a share of the vast sums being spent in Washington. With the peace forces of the country disheartened and demoralized by the defeat of the World Court, the jingoists may be expected to marshal their forces for a supreme attack. The munitions inquiry has revealed a few of the powerful influences behind a program of this kind, but it will have represented just so much wasted energy if the American people are not sufficiently aroused to check this wave of war preparations.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S rejection of the proposal to barter 500,000 bales of cotton for German goods may be construed as a clear-cut victory for the internationalist wing of the Administration. Under most circumstances the barter plan, sponsored by George N. Peek, special trade adviser to the President, would have little effect on the total volume of trade and merely serve to divert it into restricted channels. In the case of Germany, however, there was at least a suspicion that the scheme was deliberately concocted to counteract the effects of the anti-Nazi boycott. The President also seems to have realized that the disposal of the German goods obtained in the barter agreement might lead to a violation of the spirit if not the letter of existing anti-dumping legislation. By throwing his support to Secretary Hull rather than Mr. Peek in this instance, Mr. Roosevelt has again aroused hope that he will support the State Department in its desire for a genuine reduction of tariffs in the pending reciprocity negotiations. If he does so he will have to act quickly, for it is no secret that vested interests are constantly bringing increased pressure to bear to prevent any important reductions. Another transfer for Mr. Peek would perhaps do more than anything else to expedite the Administration's avowed trade policy.

THE PROPOSED CONSTITUTION of the First Commonwealth of the Philippines is notable chiefly for the unusual powers conferred upon the National Assembly in a day when the prestige of legislative bodies is almost universally declining. Unrestricted except by partial veto power in the hands of the President, the assembly will have extensive administrative duties as well as control over the judiciary. In addition, it will possess the unique right of amending or repealing any franchise given to public-utility, mining, or agricultural interests. Another feature of the constitution is a provision that practically excludes foreign capital by restricting franchises to Philippine citizens or to corporations in which 60 per cent of the capital is owned by them. Large landowners, whether corporations or individuals, are subject to special limitation by the assembly. While the latter provisions are bitterly opposed by American business groups in Manila, who speak of the great need of foreign capital for the development of the islands, experience in other undeveloped countries indicates the necessity of some such protection. In recognizing that economic independence may prove to be much more important than political independence, the Filipinos have displayed a wisdom beyond that of many older and more settled peoples. And even though they find that the pressure of foreign capital will ultimately break down these barriers, they will be none the weaker for having tried to stem the influx. Taken as a whole the constitution is a progressive social document, and it is to be hoped that President Roosevelt will give it speedy approval.

AMBASSADOR SAITO has evolved a brand-new theory to explain Japan's invasion of Manchuria in 1931. Speaking before the Chicago Council of Foreign Relations, the Ambassador declared that Japan had been forced to act because Communist propaganda had generated an anti-foreign and anti-capitalist sentiment that threatened the existence of sources of raw material essential to the empire's economic life. Like former explanations which were effectively exploded by the Lytton Commission, this one simply is not true. While there was a powerful Communist movement in China proper in 1931, it had relatively little influence in North China and practically none at all in Manchuria. What Communist influence existed in the Three Eastern Provinces was confined to the north, which at that time was completely outside the Japanese orbit. It is true that Japan's "special position" in the Three Eastern Provinces was threatened, but the threat was economic, not political, and arose because the Chinese were more efficient than the Japanese in organizing their railways, banks, and factories. Doubtless this same threat would arise again today if it were not for the continued presence of Japanese troops, which the Ambassador declared to be necessary if Kang Teh is to be kept on his throne. We used to wonder what some people would do without Communists to blame for their misconduct. We now know—they would invent Communists.

AS A COUNTER-ATTRACTION to the hearings of the Ways and Means Committee on the Administration's security program, the Labor Committee has been staging hearings on the Lundeen bill. Thanks to the proponents of the Townsend plan, the Ways and Means Committee has had a slight advantage as far as entertainment is concerned. But for a comprehensive view of the plight of America's millions of underprivileged the testimony on the Lundeen bill cannot be paralleled. Among those appearing before the committee were a blacklisted textile worker from North Carolina, a member of the United Farmers' League of North Dakota, representatives of a rank-and-file committee of the A. F. of L. and of independent metal-trades unions, transients, Negroes, seamen, architects, dramatists, and the unemployed. In addition, economists, lawyers, and social workers testified on the technical aspects of the bill. An entire session was devoted to listening to the problems of insecurity as they relate to women. Thus far the testimony has been so overwhelmingly favorable to the Lundeen bill that observers are beginning to speculate on what will happen if each of the two bills is reported out on the floor of the House. Such action would prove extremely embarrassing to the Administration in its efforts to portray the Wagner-Lewis bill as a "security" measure.

AN ASSOCIATED PRESS DISPATCH of February 4 announced that Clarence Norris, "a Negro under sentence of death for assault on a white woman near Scottsboro, Alabama, today changed his counsel." This brief notice for the present completes the record which The Nation published in its issue of November 28 and subsequently. Clarence Norris, of course, is one of the Scottsboro defendants, whose case has become world famous. Norris's counsel are now announced as Samuel S. Leibowitz and George W. Chamlee; at the same time it is announced that Walter H. Pollak and Osmond K. Fraenkel, who prepared the petition on which the Supreme Court consented to hear the argument, have withdrawn from the case. Mr. Pollak and Mr. Fraenkel will still act as counsel for Haywood Patterson. This evidently indicates a friendly compromise in the argument over counsel for the Scottsboro case which The Nation tried unsuccessfully to mediate. Everyone interested in seeing justice done will be relieved to know that such a settlement has been effected.

THE INVESTIGATION of the milk trust by the Federal Trade Commission has substantiated a charge made by The Nation more than a year ago—that the vast spread between the price paid to the dairy farmer for his milk and the price paid by the consumer is not legitimately to be charged to overhead but is exorbitant profit for the big distributors, made possible through their control of marketing cooperatives. In other words, the milk trust is a reality and not a myth. The commission is engaged in a national survey of dairy conditions and is at present holding hearings in Philadelphia. In the seven states making up the Philadelphia milkshed the marketing of milk is controlled by the Interstate Milk Producers' Association, which is nominally a farmers' cooperative but actually a tool of the distributors through its board of directors. Its president, H. D. Allebach, testifying before the commission, acknowledged correspondence which showed that the much-discussed "basic-surplus" marketing system was used to starve out insurgent farmers and reward "faithful" ones. Under this system the farmer receives his highest price for "basic" milk, which is bottled, and lower prices for the rest of his supply, known as "surplus" milk and used for by-products. By raising and lowering the "basic" quotas the Interstate controlled the farmer's income and was able not only to fill the pockets of the milk trust but to forestall any possibility of a fair election to give the farmers actual representation in their own cooperative. Allebach also admitted he had been "fighting the battles of the distributors" in the Pennsylvania Legislature. This is only the start of the investigation. Some interesting data on profits, financial juggling, holding companies, and legislative graft are expected shortly.

THE OPTIMISTIC ILLUSION persists that the United States is enjoying an unparalleled era of freedom of speech, and the vicious propaganda of such public enemies as William Randolph Hearst is apt to be lightly dismissed as of no consequence. As far as the national government is concerned it is probably true that the freedom to express any and all opinions has never been greater. But if one watches the labor press and the news reports of groups devoted to defending political prisoners, the conclusion is inescapable that locally in every section of the Union the Bill of Rights is becoming a scrap of paper and violence the order of the day. California and Louisiana in this respect are no longer news. The following notes on repression are enough to show which way the wind is blowing in many other states. In Oklahoma City federal officers have jailed twelve persons for communistic activities under a sedition law passed during the Civil War. The offense consisted of mailing to federal officials "threatening" postcards demanding the release of several unemployed persons arrested after a demonstration at relief headquarters last May. In Chicago, late in January, police raided and wrecked the West Side Workers' Forum during a dance and arrested thirty-three persons on charges of operating a disorderly house. In last week's issue we commented on the terror in Arkansas and also cited the case of Vernon Booker in Maine. In Oregon several trials for criminal syndicalism are in progress. The first was described in our issue of December 26. It was patently a travesty of justice but it ended in conviction and a seven-year sentence. In Burlington, North Carolina, as an aftermath of the textile strike, seven textile workers have been given sentences of two to ten years on what bears strong evidence of being a trumped-up charge of dynamiting a mill.

MEANWHILE LEGISLATION compelling loyalty is finding its way into various state legislatures. In Albany the Ives law is on the books and another has been introduced requiring an oath of loyalty from every college freshman. In Nebraska, the Elks, as part of a nation-wide campaign, are circulating petitions to make communism and communists illegal. The conflict of economic interests which breeds fascism is growing sharper as recovery is delayed. If, in a desperate bid for recovery, the national administration decides that certain fundamental liberties, such as the right to strike, must be curtailed, it will be met half-way in every state by those elements already trained in suppression and with a growing appetite for brutality. More than ever eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. And let no one imagine that fascism always arrives as a strange young man in a colored shirt. It is much more likely to be ushered in by an old familiar Hearst wrapped in a yellow sheet.

WE PRESENT a study in words. The Daughters of the American Revolution—a violent one if we have been correctly informed—recently tried to stop a meeting in Los Angeles at which Kirby Page, a liberal, was scheduled to speak on the question: Is Violence in Revolution Necessary? The meeting was sponsored by an organization whose name is made up of the following magic sounds: American, Civil Liberties, and Union.

THE GHOSTWRITER has never struck us as particularly sympathetic figure. We had thought of him as one skilled in words who sold his skill for a fair price to those who needed it. But we have received a letter which demonstrates that a ghost may be, after all, merely another exploited worker; and we are moved to set about organizing a ghostwriters' union. We print below excerpts of the letter, which comes from George Tichenor:

In your comment on Hunting for Hawaii you alluded to an article appearing in House Beautiful for January and signed by my name. I wish to make it very clear that my name was signed to that article without my consent, and in spite of written protest to Sidney S. Bowman, whose manipulation of Hawaiian publicity has already been described. . . . It was part of my job during my employment with Bowman, Deute, Cummings to ghostwrite newspaper articles for Betty Compson, Myrna Loy, Frank Condon, or some other celebrity who would allow sugar propaganda to be written under his name. Then Bowman began sending out propaganda under my own name, soliciting newspaper space on the strength of books I had written and a reputation I enjoyed for integrity (up to then). . . . Repeated protest, even the threat of a suit for damages if he persisted in his abuse of my name has resulted in just what you see. Bowman and his methods would be merely funny if they did not offer a serious challenge to other advertising agencies and publishers bent on preserving editorial integrity.

We commend the activities of Sidney Bowman and his agency to the American Association of Advertising Agencies, which almost certainly has a code of ethics hiding somewhere in its files.

Correction

By an unusual coincidence the name Leslie Ford was used as the pseudonym of the author of A Flier in Sugar, published in the January 30, 1935, issue of The Nation—it having been entirely overlooked that this pseudonym is also the pseudonym of a writer who is the author of "The Clue of the Judas Tree," "The Strangled Witness," and other well-known detective stories. The Nation is glad to publish this correction in order to make clear the fact that the author of "The Strangled Witness" is not the author of The Nation article, A Flier in Sugar. The pseudonym will not be used in The Nation in the future.

Our Premier Industry

THE automobile industry, the whole world has been told, is America's contribution to industrial civilization. Our first industry in importance, inventiveness, organization, and rewards, it is America's finest utilization of the machine to produce the most useful of machines. From it, through Henry Ford, came the doctrine that capitalism could build a vast structure of wealth based on high wages. Thus materially and philosophically the industry is symbolic of America. Since the depression, beyond an undetailed knowledge that the boom in the Detroit area has collapsed, little attention has been paid to its symbolic function. So the publication of the study of the conditions in the industry made for the government by Leon Henderson and Isador Lubin brings a surprise. Their story is not simply one of the distress of an industry overtaken by hard times. It is the story of the triumph of the three leading manufacturers over the depression, a victory won by the merciless exploitation of human beings, under conditions of espionage, caesarism, and fear that should arouse everyone to consider where industrial evolution is carrying us. The three major companies, General Motors, Ford, and Chrysler, now dominate the market with their cheap cars. They have reduced costs, improved the technique of manufacture, sharpened the weapons of competition, and conquered the field, surely as fine a demonstration of the power of the profit motive as any capitalist can ask. General Motors last year earned a profit of $94,000,000, made chiefly from the Chevrolet, of which some 700,000 were manufactured. Other branches of the company may have lost or merely broken even. But the Chevrolet earned for the parent company roughly $134 per car. The Henderson-Lubin report does not tell this. Neither does it tell what were the wage costs per car. They were perhaps even less than profits, and certainly not much more. But the picture of the labor conditions is not complete without the omitted counterpart of the financial consequences. The real message of the report is that American ingenuity and talent in organization have conquered a depression and done it at a price. The price is ghastly. No one can read the facts disclosed without recoiling. But the recoil must not be only from the automobile industry. We repeat, it is the symbol of American industrial civilization. Chrysler, Ford, and Sloan show how American initiative (usually called private initiative) can succeed.

The full story of the degradation of human beings in the automobile plants cannot be recounted here. The outline was given in the lengthy newspaper summary of the report published February 8. The industry needs young men; it needs a surplus of them. So it drums up its recruits from all over the country. They came by the tens of thousands before the depression, not knowing they would be discarded at forty. They bought homes and automobile stock on the installment plan. They were fooled by the glittering high figures of hourly wages, and they stormed the employment gates. One by one they were sucked into the factories, and taught to speed up. Before the depression the speed was a new high record in industrial production, but since the depression it has had to be accelerated. It now is screwed to a pitch relatively few human beings can endure. That does not matter to the employers, other workers are waiting at the gates. The industry draws them in, drives them for long hours, then shuts down and lays them off according to its needs. The report does not give a clear picture of how much the average employee earns in the average plant. It is enough to say that in a test examination of 500 men 380 earned less than $800 last year and only 35 earned more than $1,200. When the plants reopen, young men are taken back. The older ones, not told they are on the scrap-pile, apply and apply for reinstatement, and not till they see most of their former colleagues reemployed do they realize that they are done for. Wages are paid on a gang and bonus system which promises a premium for inhuman speed, but the men do not know how much they are to receive until they collect their pay envelopes. Often the gang and bonus payments are changed, the inhuman speed being accepted as a normal speed. The men stand for hours on end at their belts, unable to pause for a drink of water or to visit a convenience. Their foreman has over them the authority of a Roman galley commander. He can collect petty graft. He can dismiss them. He can write on the dismissal card, "Do not rehire," without giving reason, and if he does it will be hard for that man to find work in any other plant.

This was the report drafted for the perusal of the President and the NLRB before the renewal of the automobile code. The President did not read it. He renewed the code, with amendments making one important change, permitting though not strictly enforcing the introduction of new models in the autumn, which will ameliorate the worst faults of seasonalism. But he authorized the continuation of the forty-eight-hour week through a subterfuge, and while he appeared to give over-time pay to the tool-and-die workers, they will not get it, since the amended code expires in June before their over-time season begins. The President's excuse for his action is that the whole subject will be studied between now and June when the code comes up again for consideration. It has now been renewed three times, and not once has there been a public hearing on the subject of renewal. The NLRB preferred no code at all to the changes he imposed; the board knows the conditions in the industry. The President, who might have known, acted without reading the report drawn up at his request to guide him in continuing the code.

The labor conditions in the industry cry out for fundamental treatment. "Labor unrest," says the dispassionate report, "exists in a degree higher than warranted by the depression. The unrest flows from insecurity, low annual earnings, inequitable hiring and rehiring methods, espionage, speed-up, and displacement of workers at an extremely early age." No wonder the report quietly declares: "The automobile industry . . . is socially inadequate to meet its responsibilities." To cope with these labor conditions the President has made the Wolman board part of the code. And so we round out the picture of our number-one industry, of our government gingerly touching it, then drawing back unwilling to grasp the nettle, and of the crying problems of labor committed to a board with which organized labor cannot cooperate. We have said the industry is a symbol; so, too, is the government's treatment of it. History, when it comes to record the events of this year, will be nonplussed to explain why the President did not read the Henderson-Lubin report before he amended the automobile code. But it may write that in these days the New Deal came to an end.

Our Growing Nationalism

MANY writers have expressed alarm at what they feel to be a new trend toward nationalism in the United States as indicated by the unexpected defeat of the World Court. While it is undoubtedly disquieting that a large portion of the American public should fall victim to the cheap demagoguery of a Father Coughlin or a William Randolph Hearst, we cannot regard this as a particularly novel phenomenon. Throughout the whole of American history isolationist phrases have been the stock in trade of the demagogue, and have almost invariably met with a wide popular response. The reaction following the World War culminating in the rejection of the League of Nations was certainly far more extreme than anything with which we are confronted at present. But there has been no time since that period in which the prevailing sentiment of the country has not been strongly isolationist. Despite large investments abroad which could be paid only in goods, the American tariff was raised in 1921, again in 1922, and again—as a crowning exhibition of provincialism—in 1930. Neither Hearst nor Coughlin can be held entirely responsible for the fact that the United States has thrown away the billions of dollars owed to it in war debts rather than shoulder its world responsibility. The American attitude toward Soviet recognition has been ostrich-like from the beginning, and the passage of the Johnson Act is a choice example of the philosophy embodied in cutting off one's nose to spite one's face.

For some reason that is none too clear even today, the World Court has always been a particular anathema of the extreme isolationists. Three years were required from the time President Harding first recommended adherence to the court before the United States Senate could be induced to act upon it, and then only after the adoption of a series of crippling amendments. Similarly in the five years which elapsed between the submission of the Root protocol by President Hoover and the opening of the present Congress, the fate of the measure was in constant doubt. In fact, opposition to the court has probably never been less than at the beginning of this year. That it was reborn by virtue of the radio wizardry of an Irish-Canadian priest suggests the resurrection of the dead more than the creation of a new being.

It is a striking coincidence, moreover, that on the very day on which the Senate was rejecting the World Court, American representatives took their places for the first time on the governing body of the International Labor Office. From a realistic point of view, the entry of the United States into the latter organization is of vastly greater significance than adherence to the World Court could have possibly been. Not only is the I. L. O. intimately associated with the League, but since it deals with such concrete problems as wages, hours of labor, supervision of trade practices, and social insurance, it might easily be construed as a real threat to national sovereignty; yet the resolution for American entry encountered practically no opposition in Congress. The tendency toward greater cooperation with the League of Nations which has been evident in recent years would also seem to contradict the assumption that the United States is turning its back on the outside world.

Nevertheless, there appears to have been a definite lessening of interest in world affairs in this country since the untimely collapse of the World Economic Conference in 1933. This may be attributed in part to natural disillusionment following the extravagant hopes aroused by that conference. If it were this and nothing more, there would be no particular grounds for anxiety at the present moment. We could rest assured that the imperative necessity of world economic cooperation would sooner or later triumph over an isolationist sentiment that was essentially anachronistic. It is not impossible, however, that the isolationist lag in American economic policy has already destroyed the foundation stones of world interdependence. No one will deny that the New Deal is nationalist in character. The Roosevelt monetary policy, the AAA crop-restriction program, the Johnson Act, and the failure of the Administration to make needed tariff adjustments have all tended to nourish the dominant world trend toward economic self-sufficiency. Unless this tendency is reversed by an early agreement on monetary stabilization, and unless the Administration's tariff program exhibits far more vitality than has been evident thus far, there are real grounds to fear a rebirth of isolationist sentiment that will not be merely transitory. If this comes to pass, one can only hope that the chaos which ensues will ultimately give birth to a new and more effective international order.

Wages and Work Relief

IT was no great feat for the Administration to drive the work-relief bill through the House without a word of significant change. Quick and vigorous application of the gag rule sufficed to turn the trick. But the Senate, jealous as ever of its prerogatives and sensitive to currents of public opinion, will prove to be a tough, recalcitrant customer. The anti-Administration revolt in the Appropriations Committee was ominous of legislative storms to come.

By a vote of 12 to 8 the committee came out for the McCarran amendment, which requires that workers on all public projects shall be paid at least the "going rates" that prevail in each locality for private employment. This action was outright mutiny. It was contrary to the President's express desire that the government should not enter the labor market as a competitive bidder against private employers. Previously the committee came as close as a tie vote to transforming the measure into a pure relief bill, cut down to little more than half its present financial dimensions. This was worse than mutiny. For if there is any one point on which the President has made his desire clear, it is that the government "must and shall quit this business of relief."

The behavior of the Senate Appropriations Committee reveals a new responsiveness to the pressure of groups operating both on the right and on the left in resistance to Administration rule. Organized labor, the building trades in particular, naturally opposes the government's policy of driving wage rates down to the miserable level of $50 a month. Under the disguise of work relief, the trade unions perceive an intention to create a boom in the capital-goods industries by undermining the present structure of wage rates. In the other instance the committee was affected by the organized pressure of the business community. Compared with straightforward relief measures, a public-works program is extravagant. It necessitates not only the payment of wages but also the purchase of materials, supplies, and equipment. And the business community as a whole fears increased tax bills more than it welcomes the possibility of additional activity in certain limited fields.

Whatever its motives, the Appropriations Committee's revolt against the President was a sign of a return to legislative sanity. For so important a measure as the work-relief bill to race through the House without even the pretense of intelligent debate was sheer madness—a shameful caricature of the theory of representative government. The bill needs all the debate, be it enlightened or passionate, that Congress is capable of giving it. After two years of the New Deal, with no perceptible advance toward liquidating the frozen mass of unemployment, poverty, and destitution, the President has forfeited the right to demand that his program for the relief of working-class misery shall go through without challenge or discussion.

If pure logic were all that mattered, there would be reason to prefer almost any public-works program to the alternative of simple relief expenditures. The former scheme adds to the nation's capital resources; the latter merely redistributes the available national dividends. The former acts as a moral tonic upon workers who are drawn off from the reserve army of the jobless. The latter acts as a moral soporific. Unfortunately, however, the work-relief bill, regarded either as a public-works or a reemployment program, is inadequate for a variety of reasons. Its financial dimensions are utterly insufficient to provide jobs—at living-wages—for more than a small fraction of the ten to twelve million now without work. The bill puts forward an impractical ideal of projects which shall not be "competitive" with business enterprise. By undertaking to establish wage rates lower than those currently in force, the bill reverts to the deflationary errors of the Hoover regime. From the beginning this Administration has committed itself to the policy of spending, not starving, its way out of the depression. Wages were to be raised, if necessary by government regulation; purchasing power was to be created by employment through government agencies when private ones were insufficient. To scuttle this principle in the work-relief bill was to abandon the fundamental promise of the New Deal. To restore it is the duty of Congress—a duty ignored by the House in its haste to obey its master's voice. We hope that the Senate committee in control of the measure will find enough will power to resist further pressure—whether from business or the White House—and will stick firmly to its present role of defender of the original faith of the New Deal.

Nudismo

AL SMITH'S scheme for saving America reached its legislative phase on February 5 when the McCall-Dooley anti-nudism bill, brought forward at the instigation of Mr. Smith and his Legion of Decency, was given a hearing at Albany. Mr. Smith was not present. In fact, no one appeared to defend the bill. On the other hand, there were six defenders of nudism and a roomful of extremely interested spectators.

The bill provides that "any person who in any place wilfully exposes his person, or the private parts thereof, in the presence of two or more persons of the opposite sex whose persons, or the private parts thereof, are similarly exposed, or who aids or abets, or owns property used for the purpose, is guilty of a misdemeanor." Charles Francis Potter, founder of the Humanist Society, led off in defense of nudism. He pointed out in a spirited speech that under this law it would be illegal for a woman to give birth to twin boys. He might have pointed out that since the risk of illegality would be two and one-half times as great, the birth of quintuplets would practically cease (and this, we are sure, would constitute a threat to the freedom of the press, though, as in the Jennings case, we don't know exactly why).

Mr. Potter was followed by Talman W. Van Arsdale, speaking for the Bysun Club of Buffalo, who maintained that the terms of the bill are so ill defined that under its provisions "you could go out on the beach and pinch anyone"—which is, indeed, an uncomfortable prospect. Dr. Ilsley Boone, Baptist clergyman and secretary of the International Nudist Conference, mentioned the salutary effects of sunlight in preventing rickets and tuberculosis. He went on to say that modesty and shame are acquired traits and ended by informing the committee that in two schools in New York City the boys and girls are permitted to go nude together, with healthy results in sex education and the avoidance of morbid curiosity.

Undoubtedly the star witness in favor of nudism was Alfred J. Flynn, representing the Sunbathers' League. He stated that he had taken up sun-bathing for his health. At first he had gone to a lonely spot in New Jersey but had finally gone to Germany, where he made his "first contact with organized nudism." Mr. Flynn emphasized the decorum of nudist groups, which quickly changes the attitude of insincere persons who "come for fun," and he related that "one lady said she got more respect from the men in our nudist group than even in church circles."

We admit that we have been a bit torn in our loyalties. From the long-range point of view we have always favored nudism, though we have reserved the right to disapprove of some of its manifestations at close range. "Organized nudism" leaves us cold; we are not sure that the race would profit from the complete elimination of modesty and shame; and the experience of the lady who found a nudist group no more exciting than a church circle would not lead us to make reservations in a nudist colony. But the hearings at Albany have crystallized our position on this important question. We think Nudismo should be preserved if only in the interests of Humorismo.

Issues and Men

The London Times—and Others

A PROPOS of its one-hundred-and-fiftieth birthday, the London Times, the most famous and most distinguished journal in the world, has published a volume called "The Thunderer in the Making, 1785-1841," which has recently been brilliantly reviewed in the London New Statesman and Nation. As everyone knows, the "Thunderer" has been a class organ of the Conservatives, but few realize what the reviewer brings out, that there have been times when it has worked hard for democratic reforms—for its own purposes of course. It has been humanitarian and wise enough to see that extreme conservative measures of repression hurt rather than helped the cause for which it stood. For years the Times fought with radicals and workingmen for parliamentary reform, not because it was desirous of lodging the balance of power in the hands of the working classes, but because the men who controlled it knew "what interests they represented and who the real masters of England were to be," namely, the elements whose welfare was bound up with the commercial system. Its achievement was to make the House of Commons largely middle class. It attacked the harshness of the 1834 Poor Law because it would "sow seed of perpetual enmity between the poor and the rich" rather than because it was cruelly inhumane. When the maddened agricultural laborers rioted in 1830 and were punished with barbaric severity, the Times nobly protested, again not because it saw anything wrong with the fundamental system, but because it did not wish the defenders of that system to err by going to extremes. As the writer of the review says, it has always been the policy of the Times "to safeguard property by wise concession, to agree to reform only when it would be dangerous to refuse it, and to attack every new idea until it has become embodied in a practical proposal which renders it innocuous, to retain always the substance of power while conceding the shadow, to be generous as long as it could give without risk, to be humanitarian as long as it was not asked to alter the evils that made mercy necessary."

With this type of newspaper we in the United States are familiar, but the London Times has always shown far more leadership than our own New York Times, for example. Originally the London Times used to employ one or more men to circulate in the coffee-houses, the theaters, and other places of public resort and to talk with as many people as possible and ascertain what they were thinking. Then it would come out with a thundering leader, and of course win wide acclaim. It has always had the ear of the official world and has made and broken governments. In addition, it has fortified itself by holding to very high standards of journalism. It still has more political influence than all the rest of the London press, and what is more remarkable, it has attained this with a circulation which is tiny in comparison with that of the great sensational newspapers. A pleader for the commercial group, the Times is curiously enough guaranteed against sale to any commercial interest which might seek indirectly to control or influence it. Its reporting remains brilliant, its correspondents highly informed; but like others of its type it can do and does an immense amount of harm by false emphasis and careful suppression. It is indeed true that "it exactly reproduces the merits and defects of the British governing class."

There must be many attached to our own conservative press who would pray today for the leadership of the London Times. Our great capitalist newspapers are in a dazed state. At the outset of the Roosevelt regime, stampeded by the fear that chaos or economic disintegration seemed close at hand, they besought everybody to support the government at all cost. For the Blue Eagle they had no adequate words of praise. But when they were themselves to have a code imposed upon them they rebelled indeed. Yet they have not dared to be as outspoken in their opposition to the President as they are at heart. They loathe him, but their valor is almost wholly discretion. More than that, the New Deal gave the generating impulse which has produced a real revolt in newspaperdom; they find themselves confronted by unions of their own brain workers, who propose to have some say about their wages and conditions of labor. The bitterness with which the reactionary publishers have fought this development needs no description here. Only a small fraction of it has been allowed to appear.

Curiously enough, their last refuge is no longer patriotism but liberty. They are determined to see in every move toward their control, or better toward the regulation of the working conditions of their employees, a menace to liberty of speech, a move toward suppression of the written word—they who have always refused to say one word when the constitutional rights of minorities and unpopular groups were jeopardized. They cannot today find room to report one hundredth part of the violations of civil liberties which are going on all over the United States. Lacking the foresight of the London Times, they do not see that this misconduct of our local officials "sows seed of perpetual enmity between the poor and the rich."

They have now been warmly championed by Walter Lippmann, who insists that when the NIRA expires in June the publishers should ask "for no code and accept none, and announce that they are removing the Blue Eagle from their publications because the right to publish in America is guaranteed by the Constitution, and no license, no decoration, no official stamp of any kind is necessary, is desirable, is consistent with the American tradition of the freedom of the press." All of that may be true, but it does not alter the fact that the danger to the press today is not the American government, or any code, but the capitalist proprietors who have forgotten that journalism is a profession "affected by a public interest," with a duty to society which it has almost universally failed to perform or to honor.

Walter Garrison Villard

A Cartoon by LOW

A VOICE FROM THE WELSH MOUNTAINS.

Copyright by the Inter-Europa Press

La Follette Progressives Face the Future

By LOUIS ADAMIC

Madison, Wisconsin, February 8

FOR three decades now Wisconsin has been politically and socially the most progressive—the most consistently progressive—state in the Union. Political thinking and political developments in Wisconsin, accompanied by a long series of successful experiments in enlightened labor, business control, and general social legislation, have greatly influenced not only the lives of millions in that state but the course of things in other states and in the country as a whole. Wisconsin has become, indeed, world famous as a progressive commonwealth. All of which, of course, is an old story; there is no need of recounting it in detail in The Nation.

After the death, in 1925, of Senator Robert M. La Follette, Sr., there was much speculation in the country as to what would become of the Wisconsin Idea, which he had made so powerful and renowned. His two sons were young men: Bob in his early thirties, Phil in his late twenties, both as yet untried in public life. Much depended upon them, for the progressive cause and movement were so intimately tied up with the La Follette name that “the boys”—as many in Wisconsin refer to them—were bound to affect it. In recent years both Phil and Bob have been tested and have shown themselves to be La Follettes in the tradition created by their illustrious father, equipped in their characters, personalities, and minds to serve and continue the Idea. The old Senator—to say nothing of his wife, whose role in the affairs of Wisconsin and in building up the prestige of the La Follette name was second in importance only to his own—doubtless had seen to that in the boys’ formative years.

Last year Phil and Bob took the leadership in a step of the La Follette Progressives in their state which is of great immediate as well as long-range importance to Wisconsin, and may, toward the end of the current decade or soon after the beginning of the next, conceivably turn out to be equally significant for the United States. They broke once and for all with the Republican Party, within which Old Bob had so shrewdly developed his policies and program, and formed a third party, calling it the Progressive Party. This was in line with the Wisconsin Idea—in fact, an inevitable development of it.

From the beginning of their movement the La Follette Republicans were at sharp odds with the regular Republicans both in Wisconsin and throughout the nation. The first open break occurred in 1924, when Old Bob decided to run for President on an independent ticket. After their father’s death young Bob and Phil continued as nominal Republicans. Bob went to the United States Senate. Phil was elected governor in 1930. Two years later Phil was defeated in the Republican primaries by the millionaire Kohler machine, whereupon the La Follette Republicans supported Franklin Roosevelt and the local Democratic candidates. The Democratic national and state platforms contained several principles which were part of the Wisconsin Idea, and the La Follette people believed, as they still do, in Lincoln’s political rule: “Stand with anybody that stands right. Stand with him while he is right and part with him when he goes wrong.” Thus came the second open break of the proponents of the Wisconsin Idea with the “party of talent and wealth.”

With the help of the La Follette Progressives and the Roosevelt landslide, the Democrats were swept into power in Madison—and “went wrong” almost immediately after. They allied themselves with the Hoover Republicans, and Wisconsin, under the governorship of the weak and amiable septuagenarian, Albert Schmedeman, had two years of political reaction. The power trust was in the saddle again, as it had been during the Kohler regime from 1929 to 1931. One of the most important of Phil’s appointees, David E. Lilienthal of the public utilities commission, who had fought for lower power and light rates, was removed from office. The Democrats and Republicans in the general assembly and the senate passed reactionary taxation and other laws. They crippled the educational system with inadequate appropriations. The administration and enforcement of old progressive laws became less rigorous.

So the La Follettes and their followers broke also with the local Democrats. Nationally, of course, they continued to support President Roosevelt, who, with his New Deal, the NIRA, and what not, appeared to have the intention of applying some of the principles of the Wisconsin Idea to the country at large. Bob voted for most of the important New Deal legislation in the United States Senate. Roosevelt, in turn, played with the La Follettes. He put Lilienthal on the Tennessee Valley Authority. He offered Phil important jobs in the Administration in Washington. But Phil declined them. He did not want to leave Wisconsin. One of the La Follettes had to be there and keep in touch with things in Madison and the rest of the state. And I have cause to believe that he did not want to become too intimate with the New Deal. He was rather more than skeptical about it. Also, he did not want to get caught in the Democratic machine. He—more than Bob, I am informed—was looking ahead to 1934. He felt the time for a clean break with both of the old parties in Wisconsin was here. He knew that a multitude of people in the La Follette movement in Wisconsin felt the same way and were counting on him to take the leadership.

In the spring of 1934 various farmer, labor, farmer-labor, and simply progressive groups, all of them results of Old Bob’s thirty-year labors in the state, began to hold conferences and conventions at which resolutions were passed in favor of a third party; and Phil—he is merely “Phil” to everybody in the La Follette movement—was invited to lead it. In May the regional leaders of the movement decided that the new party would be formed only if 50,000 voters were prepared to sign petitions to be put on the ballot, though the law required far fewer. They gave themselves only three weeks to gather the signatures. The stalwarts in both the old parties said it was impossible to obtain that number in three weeks. Some reactionaries even suggested that the leading Progressives had set this high figure as a method of avoiding the creation of a new party, because they didn't know what they would do with it if it were formed. But in less than three weeks, without ballyhoo and with almost no funds, over 130,000 signatures were collected; more than fifteen times as many as required by law. It was a popular movement of the La Follette farmers, workers, teachers, and small business and professional folk.

Early in July, after the Secretary of State had thus been compelled by the voters officially to certify the creation of the Progressive Party, the Progressives met in convention at Fond du Lac. Phil made an excellent speech, during which he quoted his father: "Permanent political parties have been born in this country after, and not before, national campaigns, and they have to come from the people, not from the proclamations of individual leaders." The Progressives adopted a preliminary platform, national in scope, containing planks in favor of government sale of arms and munitions, public ownership of utilities, complete national ownership of the country's banking system, a job for everyone able to work, financial and old-age security through state and national legislation creating unemployment insurance, sickness and accident insurance, and old-age pensions, legislation guaranteeing workers the right to organize as they choose, a tax on corporate dividends, immediate payment of the soldiers' bonus, adequate legislation to secure the tenure of land for those who own it through moratorium laws, abolition of speculation and profiteering in food, and establishment of cooperative marketing to reduce the spread between prices received by the farmers and those paid by the consumers, and a reaffirmation of faith in the democratic form of government and the right of free speech. There were planks against the sales tax, the exemption of securities and governmental salaries from taxation, and the destruction of goods and wealth while the people were in need.

In his Fond du Lac speech Phil declared that the new party owed "its existence to no leader and no group of leaders." That was true in a very limited sense. It was a mass movement. But it is highly doubtful that it would have crystallized into a successful new political party had it not been for Phil and Bob, with their magic surname and the qualities they had demonstrated in the preceding few years to large sections of the Wisconsin electorate. Phil, I am informed, had more to do with the initial work of whipping the new party into shape than Bob. For one thing, Phil was in Wisconsin while Bob lived in Washington. Then, too, Phil, with his avid dynamic mind, vivid personality, adventurous character, and general brilliance, is far better fitted for such work than Bob, who—according to their mutual friends with whom I talked—is somewhat less dynamic and brilliant, a bit slower, more cautious than his younger brother, but in his own way, I am told, equally effective in the long run.

In the Progressive primary Bob was nominated for reelection to the United States Senate, while Phil became candidate for governor. Bob's reelection was practically a foregone conclusion. He had his father's first name. He had no real opposition either in the Democratic or the Republican candidates. Roosevelt was expected to indorse him at the expense of the reactionary Democratic nominee. Also, having been away from the state most of the time, he had made no enemies at home and was generally liked and respected. Phil's election, on the other hand, was in great doubt during the campaign. As governor during 1931-32 he had naturally collided with numerous influential people in the state. Thousands of voters who hung on the periphery of progressivism inclined to think he was a little "too full of ideas." They were expected to vote for Bob but not for Phil. The newspapers were much more against Phil than Bob. Phil's chief opponent, the incumbent Schmedeman, was a pre-Chicago Roosevelt booster, and as such certain to have the President's support. Besides, it was rumored that Roosevelt did not like Phil. One reason advanced for this dislike was that Phil had declined two or three offers of high federal positions. Phil's chances of election, in fine, were considered extremely slight. How could the young man buck Roosevelt's prestige, so high in Wisconsin?

President Roosevelt came and spoke in Wisconsin, indorsed Bob, but took a sharp crack at Phil and came out in favor of Schmedeman. But Phil happens to be Old Bob's son even more emphatically than is his older brother. He is a fighter and carries amazing energy in his slight frame. He can make ten, a dozen, speeches a day, and good speeches. In fact, he is considered one of the best campaigners in America today. Essentially an intellectual, he can talk simply, even ungrammatically, if that helps the folks to understand him. He is dramatic, dynamic, convincing; obviously an idealist, but nobody's fool; seemingly impetuous, actually very deliberate. He has a high quality of charm, the core of which, it seems to me, is a direct, eager, typically American simplicity. Anyhow, in the face of Presidential disapproval he went up and down the state much in the manner of his father twenty or thirty years ago. Finally Bob made a long tour and spoke in behalf of his brother; and while there can be no doubt that Bob helped hugely to elect Phil, it also is a fact that Phil added to Bob's majority.

The formation of the new party started political speculation in many quarters. What were the La Follettes thinking of? A new national party? The Presidency in 1940? Had a third party any future in this country? And so on. After the Progressive victory in Wisconsin speculation became even keener. Speculation continues. In the Middle West I find a good deal of interest in "what they are doing or trying to do in Wisconsin." In Madison I found most of the Progressives ready, even eager, to talk about the future of their party, and the following is a composite and, for brevity's sake, much simplified report of the various ideas, guesses, hopes, fears, and misgivings that were expressed to me:

"Progressivism, we believe, has a big future in this country. The idea of progress is a powerful factor in the American mind. Progress is a good American word. It's our national middle name. It has more vital meaning in the United States than anywhere else in the world. Progress, change; the two go together. They used to fire American imagination. They are part of our tradition. They will fire American imagination again. If we are wrong in this, it's just too bad—not only for us, but for the country.

"Our program, our ideology? We refer you to our platform. Our political method? Democracy. Opportunism along the lines of the Wisconsin Idea. We'll try to take the masses just as far as we feel fairly sure they'll be willing to go from time to time. If our social-economic order continues for any length of time in its present state, the people will soon be willing to go a long way toward a new social order, to be built on the American pattern, which is a matter of our past and our present. We are realists. We believe in practical politics. In action. The Wisconsin Idea always led to action. We consider the people, their mentality, the fact that they are Americans, which means that they are great optimists and inclined to consider and deal with their problems only from moment to moment, as they develop, not before. That's the American way; whether it is good or bad is immaterial. It's our way; we are Americans. It was the way of Jefferson, Lincoln, and Old Bob.

"The American mind is being stirred today as it has never been stirred before. The people's social and economic conditions are critical and growing worse in many sections. Their personal problems are becoming more acute daily. They are being forced to think, to seek an explanation of their plight. They are hearing all sorts of explanations. They listen to Franklin Roosevelt and Father Coughlin. Then there is Huey Long. There was EPIC. There was Technocracy. There is Townsend with his plan. There is Utopia, Inc. There are the Socialists and Communists and the radical writers and lecturers. There will be other persons and movements, many of them pretty crazy, unlinked to the American past, not geared to our current material and psychological realities, and most of them have no future by themselves. They pop up and go. Some leave no trace. Others do. They become—they will become—factors in the radicalization of the American mind, in the intensification of the American wrath, if this depression continues or becomes worse, which is likely. When the time comes for progressive political action, the people will have become disillusioned with Coughlin, Long, and the others and will be ready for us. And we hope to be ready for them. We have the real thing. Of course everybody thinks the same but we can prove it. The Wisconsin Idea has been tried. It is the logical continuation of the best basic American traditions. No doubt about it.

"No, we have no immediate national plans. Ideologically and programmatically we are closest to the Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota. There are groups in other states which can become the core of a new political state organization. They will be useful. For the time being, we probably shall not participate in any immediate effort to start a third party upon a country-wide basis. It's too early for that. If a new national party arises, the chances are nine to one it will be ours. The vitality of the word "Progressive" and the magic of the La Follette name are important.

"Significant things are happening all over the country. For the first time in the history of America the federal government is supporting millions of citizens. The government is engaging in vast public-works projects. It can't possibly stop. The old order has cracked. The South is being loosened up and awakened by the advent of cheap power and other forces. The solidness of the South may not last much beyond 1936, and the political changes there are extremely likely to be in our favor.

"We figure that within the next few years organized labor will succeed in freeing itself from the strangle-hold of its present corrupt and intellectually bankrupt bureaucracy. That, too, will be in our favor, as it already is here in Wisconsin, where we have the higher type of labor leader.

"Nationally, we continue to support what good we think there still is in the New Deal. We believe that Roosevelt will be reelected. He wants to be and it seems that nothing short of death can stop him. In 1936 we plan to get on the ballot in various states, but that is all—just to get on the ballot, not to win. We know we can't win. We'll probably support Roosevelt for the Presidency. His victory very likely will be a landslide, which will bury a good part of what is left of the Republican Party. It is quite possible that in 1937 there will be eighty-five Democrats in the United States Senate. In short, the Republican Party will practically cease to exist. The Democratic majority will be so great that it will be unwieldy and embarrassing. Roosevelt will go farther and farther to the right. Inevitably so. Since he is not really against it, the system will drive him that way.

In consequence, his prestige will have diminished by 1940. He may or may not have the power then to dictate who will be the Democratic nominee for President. If he has the power, he probably will pick someone like himself, a conservative with a liberal front. If he does not have the power, the big-money boys, having meanwhile lost all interest in the Grand Old Party, will dictate whom the Democrats will nominate. They will pick a conservative. But we expect that long before that the Democrats will have started to split into conservatives and progressives. By 1939, perhaps, the situation will be quite clear, and the progressive or radical Democrats, many of them farther left by then than we are now, will come to us. They will have to come to us. There will be no other place for them to go. We'll have the new party all ready for them. And in 1940 the Progressive Party, the outgrowth of the Wisconsin Idea, will have a good chance of sweeping the country and gaining national power."

At this point, talking with a prominent La Follette Progressive, I mentioned Charles A. Beard's powerful article, National Politics and War, in the February Scribner's, in which he hints that such developments as outlined above up to about 1939 are very probable, but argues that by 1940 Roosevelt, faced by terrific domestic problems and a split in his own party, torn by conflicting emotions and unable to develop a "strong" domestic policy, will adopt a "strong" foreign policy and thus cause the country to "stumble" into war, beyond which "lies the Shadowy Shape of Things to Come."

"Of course," said this La Follette Progressive with an uneasy smile, "much is liable to happen between now and 1940 that will play the very devil with our expectations. A new war is possible, even probable. Then, too, some form of outright fascism is not impossible. . . ."

Phil, with whom I had a long conversation, talked rather differently.

[Mr. Adamic's report of his interview with Governor Philip F. La Follette will appear in next week's issue.]

The Purge at the AAA

Washington, February 11

EVERY political action has at least two explanations. It means what the actors tell themselves as they act. And it means something far deeper, which moves them to act. So it is with the purge at the AAA. Chester Davis, Administrator, has rid himself of Jerome Frank and four members of the legal department—Lee Pressman, Victor Rotnem, Alger Hiss, and Francis J. Shea. He has demoted Frederick C. Howe as consumers' counsel and dismissed Gardner Jackson, one of Mr. Howe's most active staff members. He can give himself a reasonable account of it. Secretary Wallace, who had to sanction the dismissal of the men who had striven against odds to carry out his own policies, also can supply a surface justification. But their rationalizations of the deed are far from being the complete story. The deeper reason is the more important. The purge spells the end of an era. It is the defeat of the social outlook in agricultural policy.

The surface explanation, however, is worth relating at some length, and not without sympathy. Imagine yourself in the place of Chester Davis, ultimately responsible for the policy and the success of one of the great enterprises of the New Deal. You strike out on a line, feeling your way between the interests of the agricultural producers and distributors. You make concessions here and there, simply to get something done. You may have to whittle away from what you really would like to achieve, but you think you know where you are going, and you are willing to risk half-measures because you feel you are proceeding in the right direction. Along come the consumers' counsel and the legal department, and tell you you are giving away a fundamental principle. You are annoyed, and you argue with them. They are stubborn. And in the end you send up your plan to the Secretary of Agriculture as final arbiter, and the consumers' counsel and the legal department send up their objections. And possibly the Secretary rules against you, and a scheme you have worked out has to be changed or abandoned altogether, because those obstreperous fellows in the legal department and the consumers' office stand in the way. You cry out against the "split docket," the conflicting opinion laid before the Secretary. You endure this for a time, but one day you go to the Secretary and you tell him you can't stand it any longer. He has to choose between letting you run your own show or finding somebody else to do the job. He has to clear away those obstructing fellows downstairs. That puts the Secretary on the spot. He likes the fellows downstairs; they are the ones who are trying to put into reality the very principles the Secretary has been talking and writing about. But if he puts up a fight for them his administrator will quit, and will be able to say he wasn't given a free hand to do his job. That will be a national scandal. The administrator's friends, big powerful men among distributors, processors, and certain groups of producers, will be offended. And anyhow the practice, when there are strains in departments, is that the top man is vindicated and the lesser men are sacrificed. Top men don't get pushed out till dozens and dozens of lesser men have bled and died. So the Secretary ruefully contemplates the perplexities of public office, and gives you his O. K. And you oust the lesser fellows.

That is precisely what happened before the purge at the AAA. The "split docket" was over a canned-asparagus agreement. The legal department and the consumers' counsel insisted that the new agreement should provide for a full inspection of books and records. The agreement of the year before, according to much evidence, had been unfair to the producers and to the public. If there was to be a new agreement giving a virtual monopoly to the canners, there also should be full knowledge. The terms of the proposed agreement contained only a narrow "books and records" clause, not a wide one. The consumers' counsel wrote a memorandum asking for the standard clause. Mr. Davis was in a hurry, as the asparagus season was near. He believed he could not get the industry to accept the standard clause. So he sent the memorandum back to Mr. Howe, and asked him to change it. What he was trying to avoid was having to lay a "split docket" before Secretary Wallace. But Mr. Howe would not withdraw or modify his memorandum, and the divided opinion had to go to the Secretary. And Mr. Wallace, looking over the material, decided Mr. Howe was right and that no agreement would be better than a weak one. Thereupon came the drama as I have already outlined it. Mr. Davis rebelled, he demanded a show-down; Mr. Wallace had to justify the dismissal of the very men who had been fighting for his own ideas.

It happened that Under Secretary Rexford Tugwell was in the South recuperating from flu, a godsend if there had to be a purge, since Tugwell could be trusted to rush over to the White House. In fact, he did rush back and to the White House. First consequence was that another job was sought for Jerome Frank, if he would take it. Second consequence was that Tugwell was named to the board of the AAA, giving him a voice in policy hitherto denied him. And Mr. Davis hastily announced the appointment of Professor Calvin Hoover to head the consumers' division (hereafter to be a research section), replacing Dr. Howe, who agreed to remain and serve under Professor Hoover. And since Professor Hoover has all the views about social needs in agricultural policy of Dr. Howe and his assistants, and of Mr. Frank and his staff, some of the damage of the purge appears to have been repaired.

But now to look again below the surface. If Chester Davis burned with zeal for the public interest, as distinct from the special interest, would there ever have been "split dockets"? Obviously not. Obviously Mr. Davis is not administering the AAA as Dr. Howe and Mr. Frank believe it should and can be administered. And this raises another simple question. Is Mr. Davis pursuing a better policy than they? It may not be a fair question. Mr. Davis is dealing with realities, with things as they are, with processors and distributors who are strong, with certain banded producers who are mighty in their field and can exert formidable political pressure. He has to get them to "come along." And their interests are oftener than not diametrically opposed to the public interest, or the interest of the small producer, as served by the Howe-Frank faction. In fairness to Mr. Davis let it be said that politics continually presents this dilemma, and that most men who stay in office solve it as he has solved it.

With Tugwell on the policy-making board of the AAA, with Professor Hoover as consumers' representative, it may look to the innocent as though Chester Davis has had his purge, has solved his administrative problem, without the public interest having been sacrificed after all. Moreover, Jerome Frank has fought all along for a standard "books and records" clause, and this, it is predicted, will be in the new legislation sponsored by the Administration. The two sets of facts do not jibe. Now that Mr. Davis is rid of the public-interest pressure should he do himself what was a frustration to him when Frank and Howe did it? The "victory" of the public interest is window dressing, or else Chester Davis has suffered the defeat, a remarkable way to look upon the executions of last week. If there is any doubt about Mr. Davis's victory, Secretary Wallace has set it at rest. He has reversed his decision on the canned-asparagus agreement.

The story preliminary to the purge is much longer than I have suggested. It began two years ago and there has been a struggle the whole time. Anyone knowing the nature of the agricultural problem would expect a fight the whole time. Here were Frank and Howe trying to inject some of Wallace's public-good doctrine into practical affairs. They were denounced as the bottle-neck. They held up innumerable proposals. They insisted on studying agriculture from the standpoint of the public and the small producer; they tried to reduce the spread between the prices received by the producer and those paid by the ultimate consumer.

They strove to maintain elements of competition, so as to keep retail prices as low as could be justified. They warned of the tragic situation of share-croppers. They bucked when two excellent men, Einar Jensen and R. K. Froker, were dismissed for affronting big distributors and producers of milk. They were consistent crusaders for a new cause, one never yet espoused by an American government, of planning agriculture to save the small man in production and the consumer from the triumphant greed of the processors, distributors, and big producers. ("Greed" is Secretary Wallace's word for it.) But it was unreasonable to suppose that the New Deal, in giving them their first insecure seat in the saddle, was going to survive the realities of politics. The representation of the consumer all along has been artificial. It could only have been real if there had been a fighting spirit inspired by the White House. It meant the shift of economic power from those who had it, the big men, to the public through the government. It could not be shifted without a fight. Conceivably this might have been waged had the President understood the nature of the conflict and had he been a fighter. There is no sign that he understood; and his technique of battle, as the country is rapidly learning, is what the British know as the "wangle." He is a marvelous wangler, but not even the smartest wangler in history could wangle economic power from the interests in agriculture who hold it and are increasing it. That can only be taken in frontal attack. It is not enough to make promises, appoint good men, and announce good intentions. They are as ineffectual as the inscription on the building of the Department of Agriculture: "Dedicated to the service of agriculture for the public welfare."

R. G. S.

North China Bows to Japan

By CHARLES MARTIN

Peiping, January 5

A SWIFT military plane, the Japanese sun glowing on its wings, soars over Peiping. The curious look aloft. But nobody pays special attention to it. There have been many such recently, swooping out of the skies after a swift flight from Manchoukuo or rising and disappearing eastward toward Chengteh, Chinchow, or Mukden. If the local newspapers were permitted to note these passages they might have reported in a mild paragraph that an officer of the Kwantung army, Colonel Giga, or the Manchoukuo Minister of Communications, Mr. Fugiwara, had arrived for "a brief visit." If they were particularly perspicacious or daring they might have added that the visitors were meeting with representatives of the Nanking government to discuss the resumption of normal postal relations between China and Manchoukuo. And if they were especially interested in being forced to suspend publication, they might have reported that a Sino-Japanese-Manchoukuo postal agreement had been signed in a suite at the Grand Hotel de Pekin.

But no such reports appeared until long after all arrangements had been completed. One or two Chinese papers timidly tried to inform their readers that "certain talks are proceeding between certain parties on a certain subject." But no more than that. For the cementing of new and amicable relations between Japan and the Nanking government is strictly "not news." Nor has the Western press adequately reported the extension of Japanese influence in North China. The spectacular Japanese invasion of Manchuria, Shanghai, and North China was played up throughout the world, but no one has money to spend on cable tolls to describe the systematic and thorough but prosaic manner in which the Japanese have consolidated their victories, or the extent to which the Nanking government has become a vassal holding fief by pleasure of its Japanese suzerain. Nevertheless, the tightening Japanese strangle-hold on China is today the most important single development in Far Eastern politics. Let no one ignore the fact that Japan's adamant stand at the London naval conversations was in no small measure the result of its enormously strengthened position on the continent of Asia.

This is particularly evident in North China. The regional government is headed by the notoriously pro-Japanese Huang Fu, a member of the Anfu clique which almost sold China to Japan lock, stock, and barrel during the Great War. In the demilitarized zone south of the Great Wall

Chinese authority is so tenuous that even a large part of the currency in circulation bears the stamp of Manchoukuo. The Hopei provincial government was recently reorganized in order to eliminate all those who had the temerity to object to Japanese dictation. Not content with this, the Japanese are pushing a plan to enlarge the municipalities of Peiping and Tientsin in such a way as to bring under their complete sway half a dozen hsien, or counties, contiguous to the demilitarized zone. Reports are even current that the political council here will be abolished, and that Huang Fu will go to Nanking as Minister of the Interior. This would leave the Japanese to deal with two groups of hand-picked municipal authorities. But Japanese control over North China will be no less complete even if this plan falls through. Should the Japanese decide tomorrow to pack Henry Pu Yi into an airplane, fly him down to Peiping, and deposit him on the Dragon Throne of his Manchu ancestors, they could do so without the slightest difficulty. For the time being, however, the Japanese can play through to a grand slam without uncovering their Manchu ace until the last round. Nanking has become a pliable and obliging dummy.

That Chiang Kai-shek has fully acquiesced in these developments is beyond dispute. It is significant, for example, that after his recent tour of the north he ordered approximately 150,000 northern troops to be sent to central China, presumably for use against the Communists. Of these, 50,000 were taken from General Sung Chih-yuan, governor of Chahar, despite the fact that the Japanese have long been threatening to invade that province. Chiang also appears to be responsible for the order permitting towns and villages in the demilitarized zone to employ Japanese "advisers."

Immediately after his visit the North China authorities launched a wave of terrorism against all groups suspected of anti-Japanese activity. The best-known victim thus far has been General Chi Hung-chang, who led the expedition which captured the important city of Dolonor in Inner Mongolia from the Japanese in the summer of 1933. A national figure, Chi had recently incurred official displeasure by joining the League for Armed Resistance against Japanese Aggression, founded by Madam Sun Yat-sen. On November 11 two members of the Blue Jackets, Chiang's secret terrorist society, broke into Chi's room in a Tientsin hotel and shot him and two of his friends—one an anti-Japanese general named Jen Ying-chi and the other a Mr. Liu Shao-nan. The latter was killed, while the two generals, severely wounded, were removed to a hospital in the French concession. A few days later they were extradited at the request of the Chinese authorities and brought to Peiping, where they were given a summary hearing and shot.

During the first half of December the purge was carried into the universities and middle schools. Within ten days more than two hundred teachers and students were arrested in Peiping and vicinity, charged with "communism." The accusation is a blanket one which may be directed against anyone from a drug peddler to a political enemy, but in this case it appears to have been applied chiefly to those who were suspected of harboring resentment against Japan. Some of those arrested, notably Professor Feng Yu-lan, dean of Tsing Hua University, were later released; but the majority, including Mr. Shen Kuo-kwang, principal of the Peiping First Middle School, are reported to have been sent south for trial. Their actual fate is unknown. In addition many students have disappeared, but because of the secrecy employed by the Kuomintang it is difficult to learn whether they have been arrested or have merely taken flight in order to avoid detention. None are safe unless they take an openly reactionary stand. The victims are rarely brought before a regular court, but are detained at the Kuomintang headquarters until they "confess." No torture is too brutal to be used in obtaining these confessions.

As a means of buttressing their political and economic control of North China, the Japanese are continuously strengthening their military position. The "demilitarized" zone is controlled by Japanese troops stationed along the Peiping-Mukden railway. A large airdrome capable of accommodating twenty planes was recently opened at Tientsin, while a smaller one for seven planes is reported to have been erected at Dolonor. The Japanese also maintain a military mission at Kalgan, the southern terminus of the international caravan route leading to Soviet Siberia via Urga.

Elsewhere in the country Japanese influence is likely to be confined more closely to the economic sphere. One hears, for instance, much talk about Sino-Japanese "cooperation." But every Chinese knows that this is merely a euphemism for the extension of special privileges to Japan. Tokyo has already won a major victory in the field of trade, where the Nanking government "cooperated" by establishing a tariff distinctly favorable to Japanese interests. The schedule which went into effect last July reduced the duty on cotton goods 5 per cent and raised the duty on raw cotton 40 per cent. This meant at the same time trading advantages for the Japanese and a mortal blow at the native Chinese cotton-goods industry. The same tariff schedules recorded increases of from 2 to 7 per cent on machinery and other items usually imported from the United States and Great Britain.

But aside from tariffs and trade the Japanese are driving forward a number of grandiose railway projects, notably the Tangku-Shihchiachwang line, a 400-mile link between the Peiping-Hankow and Tientsin-Pukow lines. A more ambitious project is the extension of the Peiping-Suiyuan Railway from its present terminus at Paotao westward into Sinkiang along a route which has just been surveyed by the Swedish explorer, Sven Hedin. This road, in conjunction with the Peipiao-Chengteh line, now finished, and the eventual lines to Dolonor and Kalgan, will make possible the extension of Japanese trade and military control over the vast areas of the Northwest, Inner Mongolia, and North China, much as the South Manchuria Railway developed such control over the Northeast.

The chief danger in the present situation does not lie in the possibility that the Japanese will forcibly annex North China. Nothing could stop them if they chose to do so, but they have very little to gain from such a step. A more likely development is a Japanese advance into Inner Mongolia as a strategic move in preparation for an eventual war with the Soviet Union. Already there are signs of renewed military activity in Chahar, and all through Inner and even Outer Mongolia the Japanese are at work seeking to bolster up the declining power of the princes and lamas against the vigorous and democratic Young Mongol movement. The whole trend of recent events makes it clear that neither Nanking nor the Western powers are likely to make any real effort to check Japan as long as it moves in this direction.

Lloyd George's New Deal

By HAROLD J. LASKI

London, January 26

WE have at last had in general outline the principles of the program with which Mr. Lloyd George has superbly staged his reentry into politics after almost four years of silence. Let it be said at once that he has accomplished that reentry with all the verve and power which make him still the incomparable virtuoso in our politics. He arranged to admiration that proper period of breathless expectancy which should precede the emergence of the star performer. The air was thick with rumors; no one quite knew what he was going to say. And viewed merely as a piece of stagecraft, the speech was, on any showing, masterly. There are not more than two other men in British politics who could compel all parties in the state to discuss the issues of the day in the terms they choose.

But we must distinguish between the actor's quality and the importance of the play in which he performs. No Socialist, certainly, could look upon Mr. Lloyd George's "new deal" with even a faint flush of enthusiasm. He might be grateful for the insistence upon the need for a new energy in affairs, foreign not less than domestic. He would be glad that Mr. Lloyd George is prepared to attack the Bank of England. He would be grateful for the insistence that we need a drastic reform of cabinet and parliamentary procedure. But I think he could not do other than conclude that, as a substitute for socialism, the program outlined is thin and meager in an amazing degree.

What does Mr. Lloyd George propose? (1) There is to be a return to his war-time experiment of a small Cabinet free from preoccupation with administrative detail. (2) There is to be an Economic General Staff composed of the best expert minds available. Working in conjunction with the appropriate departments, but without administrative responsibility, it is (a) to survey the national needs and (b) to propose a big development and reconstruction program in the light of this survey. (3) A million workers are to be resettled on the land. (4) There is to be a big step forward in telephone development, road-building, and slum clearance. Partly by these means many who are now living idly on unemployment insurance are to be found the opportunity of useful work. (5) The constitution of the Bank of England is to be changed so as to bring it into closer touch with industry. It is, however, to remain free from political influence, and the control of the joint-stock banks is to remain in private hands. (6) There must be a more spirited and determined foreign policy, especially in relation to the grave menace of the Far East. (7) Mr. Lloyd George is willing to cooperate with "a" National Government for these ends. But he thinks Mr. MacDonald an impossible Prime Minister, and some of his colleagues also must go.

This, then, in principle is the new deal. The first things that will strike a Socialist are (1) that it accepts all the postulates of the capitalist system. It would not change by a hair's breadth existing class relations. If it went fully into operation, the few would still remain rich and the many poor. (2) It does not touch that issue of capitalism as imperialism which all Socialists now accept as the essential factor making toward war. (3) It assumes that a million people can go back to the land without grave repercussions on British exports which would affect exactly those industries—coal, cotton, iron and steel, shipping—which have been hardest hit by the present depression. (4) It suggests that a mere change in the personnel of banking direction will alter the foundations of credit policy without relating these to the postulates of class relations in Great Britain. (5) It assumes that an Economic General Staff of experts of varied views will give a unified direction to policy. But anyone who visualizes such a General Staff, with, say, Mr. Keynes and Professor Robbins among its members, will see at once that its reflections upon the making of policy will only result, in all fundamental matters, in the issue of majority and minority reports. (6) His proposal for a "War Cabinet" is built upon a mistaken analogy between the war objective and the peace objective. In the first there could be a separation between policy and administration because there was a single end at which to aim. In the second, except in verbal terms, there is no such single end; and while cabinet reform is wholly desirable, all that Mr. Lloyd George's proposals would do would be to infuse a little extra energy into the present objectives of the National Government. These may be described as simply the consolidation of a weather-beaten capitalist system at the least possible sacrifice. Whether that is done efficiently or, as now, inefficiently, it is clearly not an adventure in which the Labor Party could participate. Mr. Lloyd George, indeed, does not seem to expect this participation; for he has uttered the interesting warning—which has been emphasized again and again by Socialists of my particular school—that the adoption of the Labor Party program on finance and banking would mean "catastrophe."

The reception of the new deal has been significant. Ministers from Mr. Chamberlain downward have tumbled over each other to explain that it will be examined sympathetically and impartially. Mr. Churchill has blessed it, with special emphasis on its attack against the "maundering" Mr. MacDonald. The younger Tories, especially Lord Eustace Percy, have supported it in the recognition that it represents their own outlook. It has the cautious and restrained approval of the Times, now the chief government organ. The Liberal Party and, even more, the Liberal press have greeted it with unrestrained enthusiasm. That ardent Gladstonian Liberal, Lord Snowden, has wired his congratulations, and has announced that he proposes to appear on the platform in behalf of its principles. Among Labor leaders even of the right wing it has aroused interest without even an approach to support. Even Mr. Herbert Morrison is well to the left of a program of this kind.

What will be its effect? That will, I suspect, depend very largely on personal factors. For the next six months it cannot influence government policy seriously, for the House of Commons will be fully occupied with the India bill and that on slum clearance. It therefore, effectively, assumes the appearance of an election manifesto. Mr. Lloyd George is going to set the pace for the older parties. If they accept his plans, he will emerge as the effective author of their policy. If they reject them, then those who resent the inactivity of the MacDonald government will vote against it, and Mr. Lloyd George will emerge as a pivotal factor in its destruction. In either event, his personal position is bound to be incomparably stronger than at any time since he laid down the premiership.

It is important in this contest that powerful influences, including the Times, are urging the reconstruction of the Cabinet. Mr. Lloyd George's program may well form the touchstone on which that reconstruction might turn, especially if it came after a general election. It would enable the Tories to get rid of Mr. MacDonald, who is rapidly becoming their Old Man of the Sea, and Sir John Simon, who has friends nowhere. It would facilitate a much more real fusion of the older parties than Mr. MacDonald was able to effect by combining acceptance of protection with a forward economic policy. It would enable Sir Herbert Samuel and Mr. Lloyd George himself to serve under Mr. Baldwin. The Tories would have an assurance against the splitting of votes by three-party contests. The Liberals would have a chance—at present dim—of survival. Mr. Lloyd George himself would be in office; and he would sacrifice formal leadership for that reality of power which his energy and skill would give him in any Cabinet to which he belonged. If, in short, this maneuver were successful, he would have built that Center Party toward which men so various as himself, Mr. Churchill, Lord Birkenhead, and Sir Austen Chamberlain looked forward in the first years after the close of the war. It would restore at once the simplicity of the two-party system and, in my judgment, keep the Labor Party out of office for the next ten years.

Its weaknesses as a tactic are of course obvious. No party in the country has any confidence in Mr. Lloyd George; the memory of the Coalition government is still an unpleasant one. It is doubtful, too, whether those Conservatives with whom he has influence mean much in the councils of the party. Most of them, like Mr. Macmillan and Mr. Loder, represent industrial constituencies which are pretty certain to go Labor at the next election. Alliance with him might bring over an uncertain number of Liberal votes, but the Liberals are in any case a wasting asset, and those who are keen on the defeat of Labor are pretty certain to vote Conservative next time. Then, as is well known, Mr. Baldwin is not the kind of man to like association with Mr. Lloyd George; their character and their methods are too dissimilar. A striking series of Labor victories in by-elections might force him into a partnership; but it would be the kind of partnership built on necessity and not desire. For Mr. Baldwin knows only too well that Mr. Lloyd George is not the kind of man to be the junior partner in any enterprise to which he belongs.

There are observers who think that the rejection of his overtures by the National Government will lead Mr. Lloyd George to the left, and they suggest possible overtures to the Labor Party. I think that it is true to say not only that Mr. Lloyd George has toyed with this possibility, but also that there are some elements in the Labor Party to whom his advent would not be unwelcome. They would not object to anything which made the party one of social reform and postponed once more the prospect of a victory for socialist principles. But I think this event unlikely. In the first place, it would split the party from top to bottom. Many of its best workers would leave rather than act with Mr. Lloyd George. In the second place, his program is inadequate even for the main part of its right wing; and he cannot afford, in the year or so between now and the general election, to alter its basic principles. In the third place, criticism of the plan in the next few months is bound to make the distance between them wider than it has been these last few years, for Mr. Lloyd George is now definitely the protagonist of a renovated capitalism. That is not a doctrine one can take with any confidence either to the left wing of the party, or even to the rank and file of the trade unions. Such an alliance would be only less fatal to Labor than the readmission of Ramsay MacDonald into the party.

I think, therefore, that the real problem is whether Mr. Lloyd George has still a following big enough to force him on the Conservative Party. Only time can answer that question. I think it is probable that he has sounded Mr. MacDonald's death knell. The spectacle of the daily press giving four columns to the speech of an ex-Prime Minister free from party ties, and hardly half a column to a speech on the same day by Mr. MacDonald is evidence of the position the latter now holds. No one quite so important has held high office since Lord Goderich a hundred years ago; even the pretense of respect for his views has disappeared from among his followers. He will be defeated at the next election without any doubt, and his future has become wholly devoid of significance for British politics.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter is in receipt of a letter from a friend which he believes his readers will relish as much as he does. He has changed the names a bit, but otherwise it is as it was written. High Mountain is the name of the family estate of the Westons.

We spent Christmas at High Mountain. You will not have forgotten the Mountain. Well, we had a real old-fashioned Christmas there. Fortunately all the in-laws were absent, and all us Westons sat around the fire and said how nice it is there is nobody here to suffer from inconveniences. It was a little strenuous—we started the day in what my aunt insisted was the proper old-fashioned way—with eggnog before breakfast. It knocked me out, all us younger ones in fact, but the older generation stood up under it, all except Nick Dudley (colored) who got quite drunk and made a fine oration on the subject of the government and my grandmother. He isn't quite sure about how the government should be run, though he says he knows how to raise forty-cent tobacco and ought to get forty cents for it, but he maintains that no man living, white or black, knows how to manage my grandmother except him.

IT is not the Drifter's intention to labor the moral that this is but another example of our present-day weaklings defeated by a little bit of eggnog in the early part of the day; nor does he propose to point out that Nick Dudley's economics might be recommended to the guardians of the New Deal. What impressed as much as it delighted him, in reading this letter, was its evidence of the continuity of society, the pull of tradition that holds families together, even large, widely dispersed families such as the Westons are, with no money and no worldly goods to speak of except the burden of some 20,000 acres of none too fertile land. He likes to think of that large family group about the fire, with no in-laws to whom the ritual of the day would be strange, and with Nick Dudley (colored) to make an oration. Although we sometimes tend to forget it, there are many such families in the United States. Gradually, after two or three centuries, we are developing a past, a social tradition which we like to remember. We were a raw, brash country at first, and we hastened to throw off the European memories that had formerly governed our conduct. Everything was new, and we looked only forward. Our lives were concerned with the future, and to our children the millennium would seem as customary as an old coin.

* * * * *

IT is hardly necessary to point out that our Utopian dreams were not all realized. But as the future became less promising the past became more solid and more rich. The Drifter is aware that his uncomplaining acceptance of this state of affairs will mark him once more as an ostrich with his head in the sand who cannot see the torrents that are sweeping us all into a still newer day. But he will go farther and declare that on that new frontier, in that other country where the millennium seems just a few steps ahead, the same process is almost certain to happen. After a few generations of Soviet commissars have gone the way of all flesh, a young Comsomol will be engaged in conversation with his grandfather about the young days of the revolution. Together they will remember—the one from books, perhaps, the other out of the dim recollections of his childhood—how once there wasn't any means of communication in Moscow except street cars with passengers crammed in to the very roofs; they will talk about the ancient years of famine, when millions of men were said to have died in a year; about the old wars long since ended. And they will look out quietly through the windows to the new world around them with a juster appreciation of it because it too has a past, a racial memory. They will break their bread in a certain way because their people have always done it so, or at least since the old days of that first Red October. And it is altogether likely that when they have finished their talk an elderly female, who used to work in the house and since old age came upon her has merely lived there, will scold the old grandfather as familiarly as Nick Dudley scolded Grandmother Weston. It is fitting that man should develop new frontiers; but in the process he is also creating a new past.

THE DRIFTER

Coming Soon

Dr. Townsend Solves It All
The New Arithmetic: Multiplying Wealth
by Dividing It
by Raymond Gram Swing

Is Fascism Coming?* FACE THE FACTS!

Will the world-wide trend toward fascism reach America? Why have democratic governments all over the world crumbled before armed dictatorships?

Do such things "just happen"? Or is there some fundamental reason for this "series of coincidences"?

HERE is the book that supplies the answer

DEMOCRACY AND MILITARY POWER

By SILAS BENT MCKINLEY, Ph.D.

"It is a pleasure to commend this volume to all who care anything about democracy (or the common run of people), to statesmen who pretend to be defending it, and to all who scan the horizon of the future with troubled eyes."

CHARLES A. BEARD
in his introduction to this volume

$3. At bookstores VANGUARD

Mail this coupon to your bookseller or to

VANGUARD PRESS,
100 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C.

☐ I enclose check for $3.15 (including 15c for postage and handling) for which send me, or

☐ Please send C.O.D.

DEMOCRACY AND MILITARY POWER
By Silas Bent McKinley, Ph.D.
Introduction by Charles A. Beard

Signed

Address

City State

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

Correspondence

Refreshing

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

It is so refreshing to read such a good, honest, forthright review as the one published in your issue of January 30 under the caption of Pass the Salt, by Mary McCarthy, that I cannot refrain from commenting on it. It is a brave thing to "knock" a best-seller like "Lost Horizon" when everyone is raving about it and men like Alexander Woollcott go out of their way to herald its merit in glowing language over the radio.

Had your review appeared sooner it might have saved others, like myself, from squandering $2.50 on a book that hardly merited the time required to read it, when time is so limited for reading really good books. I wish I had my money back.

New York, January 30

C. DAVIDSON

Benighted Sophistication

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Book reviewing is so largely a matter of opinion and of taste, concerning which "non disputandum est," that I would hesitate to dispute a review at all had I not detected in one of yours a form of benighted sophistication which I should think The Nation would abhor.

Mary McCarthy, in your issue of January 30, disposed in one fell swoop of five best-sellers, among them "Lightship" and "Lost Horizon." I have not read the other three, but if Miss McCarthy has been as just to them as she has been to these two, then her review is truly a masterpiece of misinformation.

If Miss McCarthy had heard "Street Scene" dismissed contemptuously as a badly done murder story, or "Tobacco Road" sneered at because its frank scenes were not pretty enough to be pleasantly libidinous, I am sure she would have been as irritated as I was to read that "Lost Horizon" was a "competently written," "conventional" "adventure story," and "Lightship" a "sea story" written by one who knows that "a disaster at sea can give a reader—or a movie-goer—a sound emotional wallop." Perhaps they are not masterpieces, but to compare "Lost Horizon" to a Sax Rohmer Fu Manchu mystery is sheer inanity. It is not an adventure story. Nor is "Lightship" a sea story. Such criticism shows a total absence of appreciation of what the two books were all about. Suffice it to say that "Lost Horizon" concerns itself with a most intriguing philosophical speculation, and that "Lightship" is an interesting analysis of a phase of human behavior.

The reviewer is right in saying that they are escape novels but woefully wrong in her statement that "the action . . . is never at any time concerned with problems which are to contemporary human beings real and pressing." This indicates that benighted sophistication which provoked this letter. The reviewer would have resented the silly criticisms of the two plays mentioned above, criticisms actually overheard, because the plays were commentaries on society and its economic inequalities, but must literature necessarily concern itself with this problem to be worthy as literature?

New York, January 29

WILLIAM M. LAAS

"It brings an undying book to new life."—Carl Van Doren

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF MONTAIGNE

Comprising the Life, told by himself, of the Wisest Man of his Times; his Adventures in Love and Marriage, at Court, and in War; his Travels, Tastes, Whims, and Opinions. Selected, edited, and largely translated anew by Marvin Lowenthal.

Montaigne left behind him an autobiography of unexampled richness,—not in biographical form but in isolated passages of self-revelation buried in his essays and less accessible works. A judicious selection and re-arrangement of these passages has given to literature a superb self-portrait in Montaigne's own words. Into his books Montaigne poured all the amazing wealth of his personality—his nonsense and his wisdom, his loves and his hates, his joys and weaknesses. Every page sparkles with his incomparable joie de vivre. $3.50

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN CO.

Unfair

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

"Shipmates," by Isabel Carter, is very unfairly treated by your reviewer in The Nation of January 30. As a member of a seafaring family I say it is a fine book, a story told with truth and restraint. You should have had Lincoln Colcord review it.

Orono, Maine, February 1

ALBERT A. WHITMORE

A New Cooperative Theater

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

May we call the attention of Nation readers to the formation of a cooperative theater, the Social Repertory Theater, whose objective is the production of plays of definite social content. The Social Repertory Theater is seeking plays on social themes, preferably dealing with the contemporary American scene. It asks that playwrights send it such plays at 5 East Nineteenth Street, New York.

New York, February 1

LEE PRENTIS

Correction

[In our Washington Letter entitled Richberg Misinforms the President, appearing in the issue of February 6, it was incorrectly stated that Generoso Pope, publisher of Il Progresso-Italo-Americano, was not a member of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association. We are informed that Mr. Pope's newspaper has been a member of both the A. N. P. A. and the Publishers' Association of New York City for many years.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

"The Industry"

By HEYWOOD BROWN

ORGANIZED labor is still following a strategy which is insufficiently candid. A. F. of L. leaders choose to say in their attacks on the policies of the national Administration that President Roosevelt is "being deceived" by Donald Richberg. It is entirely proper that many of the blows should fall upon Richberg's head. He is vulnerable and convenient and without any great personal following. It is quite possible that if sufficient pressure is maintained he may be forced out. But it is well to inquire just what would be gained by that. Not long ago labor took the position that General Johnson was deceiving the President and eventually the General gave way to Richberg. But this merely intensifies the run around. In place of Richberg the A. F. of L. might find itself facing a Leo Wolman. It would be better to face the facts. The fact is that labor's quarrel is now and always has been with Franklin D. Roosevelt himself. Complaint against the NRA lies less against its administration than against the fundamental philosophy under which it was conceived. I ask from The Nation leave to print an argument made along these lines in Washington last week. I ask for this permission because I think it's a good speech and because nobody else has been willing to print it.

My name is Heywood Brown. I am speaking on behalf of the American Newspaper Guild. I understand that these public hearings are granted for discussion of employment conditions under the NRA. And I am informed that in certain industries certain boons have been granted. For instance, I read that in the automobile code, which didn't happen to get lost, it is now arranged that the employee who works more than forty-eight hours a week is to get something extra if he keeps on till seventy hours a week. But in spite of such sweeping gestures to bring about reemployment it is utterly impossible to discuss employment conditions in the newspaper code or any other without facing the fundamental fallacy on which these codes are created and the monstrous manner in which they are interpreted.

When an employer speaks of the industry—usually with bated breath—he refers only to the property rights of himself and his fellow-employers. He isn't even thinking of the rights of labor and the rights of the public if any. Into the NRA conception there has crept from time to time the word "partnership." The publishers take that to mean a partnership of the employers. Indeed, to them a code is a sort of land grant giving them complete and exclusive right to hunt, fish, and exterminate the Indians.

And that explains the most curious phrase of all—the freedom of the press. The publishers construe the freedom of the press to mean that no governmental agency has any right to compel them to do anything whatsoever. If you ask a newspaper owner to put in a rope on the fifth floor so that somebody may slide down in case of fire he may very well draw himself up and say, "How dare you interfere with the freedom of the press?" Until there is a good newspaper code there will be no good codes, because if you boil all the publishers of America down—a consummation greatly to be desired—you will find that you have in essence automobiles, textiles, steel, munitions, utilities, and all the leading industries of the country.

In this country the publishers have beaten Huey Long by many years in one idea—every man a king. Each publisher has always been a king—self-anointed. But now official ordination has followed and their cup runneth over. In fact, this holy oil of publisher authority floods the land and seeps into high places. We, the members of the American Newspaper Guild, a union of newspaper workers, begin to feel that no board, nor court, nor legislative decision, nor executive decision is fit taking home to frame until the newspaper publishers of America have had the chance to say yea or nay. Even the mighty ones in Washington turn their faces toward the West at night and murmur in great fear, "I hope Mr. Hearst is not going to object to this." Mr. Hearst did not like the decision in the Jennings case and so the Jennings case has been entombed. It will be known again and faith will live again only on that Labor Easter when all workers have combined to roll away the stone.

But it would not be just to say that the American Newspaper Publishers constitute an invisible government under which we writhe. They are very visible. On the numerous occasions upon which Howard Davis has called his cohorts into convention to threaten the government with a publisher walkout on the code, that action has been taken openly and brazenly. And it has worked. Secession is secession, but Howard Davis succeeded where Jeff Davis did not prevail.

How can it be said that newspaper men and women have the right of collective bargaining with a group which will not even consider the timid suggestions of the rulers of the NRA? The publishers have construed collective bargaining as meaning their right to say, "No! No! No! and don't bother us again." Indeed, I might say that the one gain secured by the editorial worker under the code is the privilege of hearing the boss say "No" in person instead of being compelled to read his refusal on the bulletin board. But even that slim right is in dispute. On the Newark Ledger L. T. Russell met the request for collective bargaining with a bulletin that sixteen of the staff would be fired for their temerity in daring to request discussion, and that after a brief vacation in Hot Springs he would fire sixteen more. We did not appeal from one publishing Philip drunk with power to any other publishing Philip. The Guild called a strike. The Guild's experience with the NRA is that mostly you lose, and if you do by any chance grab the brass ring, somebody cuts your hand off.

That has happened in other industries. Donald Richberg has a long reach. And so in speaking for the Newspaper Guild we think that we are speaking for and with all labor. We deny the neutrality of the NRA. We contend that even the President of the United States has been argued into accepting the interpretations of employers. And we will come no more to stand and wait for Donald Richberg to pass around the pottage. We say the service is something terrible and the pottage is a little worse.

That California Dictatorship

By NORMAN MINI

Sacramento, February 4

WHY is California the most fascist state in the Union? Why did such a wave of terror break out against the workers at the end of the San Francisco general strike? Why were workers' halls destroyed, their homes broken into, hundreds of workers arrested, beaten up, injured? Why were all civil rights of the militant labor movement suppressed by well-organized vigilantes assisted by the police? Why are the agricultural workers of California today living under a virtual dictatorship?

Could all this have happened just because there was a strike in San Francisco? Other sections of the country have had even worse strikes, and no such wholesale mopping up has taken place. Were liberals and radicals surprised at what happened? From the howls of indignant protest they sent up it appears that they were; they seem to have regarded the vigilante frenzy as a spontaneous outbreak conceived during the general strike and consummated in its decline. But the repression was, as a matter of fact, the climax of a class struggle that had been maturing for over a year; and the center of the struggle was not in San Francisco at all, but in the great agricultural valleys of California.

Fantastic? Not at all. Consider the economic structure of California. These great valleys are monstrous agricultural units; and the principal income of large groups of growers and bankers—the ruling class—comes from great estates where perishable fruits and vegetables are raised for Eastern and foreign markets. Profits depend largely on the vicious exploitation of cheap transient labor for cultivation and harvest. Thousands of laborers, mostly Mexicans, swarm into the fields during the season; they work like hell for miserable wages ranging from 15 to 25 cents an hour; then they are herded out of the valleys for the winter, left to semi-starvation until the next season.

It is plain that this system does not tend to create harmony between the growers and the workers. The struggle of the agricultural "stiff" to gain some measure of recognition from his temporary bosses is one of the bloodiest incidents in American labor history. The first battle between the classes was fought out during the period of the growth of the I. W. W. For more than ten years the wobblies made the California valleys one of their principal battlegrounds. The bosses finally won that battle by using the criminal-syndicalism law, the famous Busick injunction, and a wave of terror similar to that now going on.

The second round in the series was started by a small strike of tree pruners in Vacaville in the fall of 1932, led by the Cannery and Agricultural Workers' Industrial Union. This first strike was broken, but that did not stop the union movement. As each crop came along—peas, lettuce, cherries, apricots—in the spring and early summer of 1933, small strikes took place. Some of these strikes were partially successful; small wage increases were won, in some places union recognition was granted. But for the most part the strikes were broken, and the leaders, the "red agitators" as the press called them, were sent to jail for vagrancy, inciting to riot, and so on. But the movement could not be checked, the union usually gained some measure of organization whether the strike was won or lost, and in every field and orchard and vineyard that summer the workers were filled with the will to organization.

The peach harvest really started things moving fast. In August, just as the peach picking was reaching its height, the pickers on the Tagus ranch, a large corporation farm near Tulare, walked out. It was a well-prepared strike. Pat Chambers, whose name was soon to become the symbol of militant union organization in the state, had worked slowly and patiently to build up a union nucleus on the great ranch. Against such a formidable walkout, the growers, the sheriffs, and the state police were slow to use the full force of their terror; they wavered just long enough to allow the strike to get well under way. Then the movement began to spread; soon the whole region was out, with the entire peach harvest south of Fresno tied up. The canning corporations, the banks, and the growers were helpless, there was nothing to do but give in, and the union won its demands completely. The news of the workers' first big victory spread north with amazing speed. Wherever peaches were being picked, workers walked out—in Merced, Modesto, Stockton, clear on up to the "peachbowl of the world," the Marysville-Chico district, almost three hundred miles from Tulare. Without organization, without any preparation, the workers struck. And in every case they won.

That was the start of the fireworks. The union became a state-wide organization; its membership grew from a few doubtful hundreds in January to around 3,000 in July, and to more than 8,000 in August. At first the growers and bankers seemed to be confused; their only defense came from the sheriff's offices and loud shouts of "red agitators" in the press. But in September, during the grape harvest, the counter-organization of employers began. In Fresno a grape strike of more than 3,000 workers was brutally crushed. At Lodi, 150 miles north, the vigilantes made their first appearance, growers resorted to mass arrests and wholesale deportations, and more than 1,100 workers were driven out of the county. But all the time the work of organizing the workers was going on. Nothing could stop it. A few victories had shown the pickers what they could do, and in each strike the workers had the tactical experience of all the previous strikes back of them.

The showdown came in cotton. In the last weeks of September, with more than 20,000 workers concentrated in the cotton fields, the union issued a call for a general strike when the demands for higher wages and union recognition were refused. Almost before the growers knew what was happening more than 18,000 pickers were out solidly on a front a hundred miles long, from Bakersfield to Merced. For over a month there was veiled civil war in the San Joaquin Valley. Armed bands of vigilantes fired on the workers' meetings and assaulted picket lines; sheriffs' deputies and state police put hundreds of militant workers in jail; two workers were killed by vigilante guns and scores more wounded; Pat Chambers was arrested on criminal-syndicalism charges; every paper in the state demanded that the strike be broken immediately. The pickers on their side organized mass-picketing caravans. In the regions of greatest terror they grouped together in camps guarded by well-organized defense squads. Communist organizations all over California raised funds.

The strike ended with victory for the workers. Only in a few insignificant sections did the growers succeed in crushing the pickers' resistance. Throughout the whole valley there were wage increases, and many growers signed contracts with the union. And most important of all, workers went back to the fields satisfied they had won a great victory, behind the union 100 per cent.

That victory put the union solidly on its feet. As the 1933 season ended, the membership was well over 20,000. The union's prestige was enormous. Agricultural stiffies were facing the next season more hopefully than in any year since the heyday of the I. W. W. As they went into "winter quarters" in the cities—families trying to beg a miserable existence from the charities or relief, single men on the bum, in transient concentration shelters, in the flophouses, pan-handling—every worker was confident that the union would be the victor in the bigger struggles for recognition and better conditions that were inevitable in 1934. These workers had met everything the bosses could send against them—hunger, terror, mass deportations. What more had they to fear?

But it was plain to everyone that 1934 would see the class battle fought out to a decisive finish: either the union would gain full control of the workers or it would be wiped out. There was no middle course. The union leaders, mostly Communists, had taken an extremely hostile stand toward the growers from the very first: no compromise was possible to them. On the other hand, the growers, the propertied gentlemen, began to have uneasy visions of more than 300,000 cannery and agricultural workers united under revolutionary leadership, demanding decent living conditions. A great class battle was impending, and both sides knew it would be well to start preparing feverishly.

The growers lost no time. No sooner had the wave of strikes ended in the valleys than the growers, the banks, the land companies, and the great canneries started their work. Permanent organizations were formed to carry on vigilante work more efficiently in the future. An organization called Associated Farmers was started with the express purpose of carrying on patient and systematic propaganda against the union among workers and farmers and valley business men. Nearly every agricultural county passed an "anti-picketing" ordinance to help prevent future strikes. Associated Farmers began a campaign of slander, trying to paint Pat Chambers and Caroline Decker, the union secretary, as the worst kind of farm-destroying red terrorists. Nothing was left undone in the drive to safeguard future profits.

During that winter the union, while not exactly resting on its laurels, was not doing itself any good. When the picking season was ended, the workers left the valleys, leaving the union leadership with a fine paper membership of more than 20,000 and a real following of around 1,000 of the most active, class-conscious, militant workers, who had been drawn close to the Communist movement by the strike wave. In spite of the efforts of Pat Chambers, who really

Harper & Brothers present the outstanding book on the subject, endorsed by medical authorities

BIRTH CONTROL

Its Use and Misuse

By DOROTHY DUNBAR BROMLEY

Introduction by Dr. Robert Latou Dickinson
Secretary of the National Committee on Maternal Health

At last the facts you have always wanted to know

The first clear, practical discussion for the layman of the whole birth control subject—based on authoritative medical opinion and published in response to the vital need for sound information on this important subject. Endorsed by leading physicians and lay authorities.

Brief CONTENTS

- I. A VITAL QUESTION TODAY.
- II. SPACING AND NUMBERING OF CHILDREN.
- III. ABSTINENCE.
- IV. THE "SAFE PERIOD."
- V. AN ANCIENT PRACTICE WITH A VARIATION.
- VI. POPULAR FALLACIES.
- VII. DANGEROUS DRUGS AND DEVICES.
- VIII. ADVERTISED METHODS.
- IX. SELECTED METHODS.
- X. WHEN PREGNANCY IS DANGEROUS.
- XI. ABORTION.
- XII. STERILIZATION WITH-OUT UNSEXING.
- XIII. THE DOCTORS AND BIRTH CONTROL.
- XIV. CLINIC SERVICE.
- XV. THE PROBLEM OF STERILITY.
- XVI. A GLIMPSE INTO THE FUTURE.

Your Most Urgent Questions Now Answered

"What we have long wanted is a clear, well-written book that would give to the public the essential facts about birth control. This requirement has now been splendidly met," says Dr. F. J. Taussig, Professor of Gynecology at Washington University and author of the White House Conference Report on Abortion. You will agree with Dr. Taussig's estimate when you have examined the complete contents for yourself. This new book draws on medical research and clinical observation to answer hundreds of questions like: Is the "safe period" really safe? Can advertised methods be trusted? How are doctors and clinics handling the problem of contraception? What devices and drugs are dangerous? Can sterility be overcome? Etc.

What Dr. Alice Hamilton Says

"By far the best book on the subject . . . Not propaganda," says Dr. ALICE HAMILTON of Harvard Medical School. Dr. ROBERT LATOU DICKINSON, in the introduction, says, "I know of no other volume covering anything like as much ground." MARY R. BEARD, co-author of The Rise of American Civilization, says, "A most difficult task exceedingly well performed." JOHN HAYNES HOLMES says, "Gives indispensable information and wise counsel."

SEND NO MONEY

No advertisement can adequately convey the value and importance of this book. But one glance at the actual contents will convince you that it will help you solve one of your most pressing problems. Send no money, unless you wish to do so. Merely send us the coupon or write our Mail Sales Dept. If you are not completely satisfied after examining the book, return it within 5 days and your money will be refunded without question. Full size, cloth bound. Price only $2.50.

N-1
HARPER & BROTHERS (Est. 1817)
43 East 33rd St., New York, N. Y.

Send me a copy of Birth Control. I will pay $2.50 plus a few cents delivery charges when the book arrives. I understand that if it is not entirely satisfactory, I may return it within 5 days and my money will be refunded.

Name

Address

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $2.50 with coupon, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money back guarantee.)

understood the agricultural workers' problems, this active vanguard failed to organize into an efficient, disciplined body of traveling organizers who could live with the workers and become their actual leaders winter and summer. Instead, the union—controlled by the Communist Party, remember—moved in the opposite direction, setting up small local organizations in the valley towns and issuing to each local a charter with a nice gold seal. Next, it signed up its militant vanguard with the Communist Party and “siphoned over” most of them from the union into the thousand and one mass organizations—I. L. D., W. I. R., F. S. U., or Friends of the New Masses. The result was an organization that looked fine on the records of the Trade Union Unity League in New York, but whose practical value was absolutely zero.

The year 1934 was started off with a bang. In late January 3,000 lettuce pickers struck in the Imperial Valley. The growers and shippers let loose a reign of terror on them which made all previous terrors look like the merest practice. All suspected organizers were arrested. Lawyers coming into the valley to defend strikers in court were kidnapped by vigilantes and beaten up; other lawyers were sent to jail for vagrancy. The Imperial Valley “peace” officers defied federal court injunctions and broke up all workers’ meetings. The strikes were crushed, but such terrible conditions prevailed that state and federal investigations were started. The reports of these investigations all concluded that it was practically impossible for workers to exercise any of their rights of organization, assembly, or free speech. The growers boldly admitted all this and promised to murder Pat Chambers and any other “agitators” that came near the valley.

The attention of all was then turned to the union, for it was clear that its reputation was endangered. A strike in the Imperial Valley was impossible at the time, as the leaders of the union understood very well. But instead of accepting the inevitable and basing their Imperial Valley campaign on the workers’ rights, the union and the Communist press issued boasting statements that “not one carload of melons would leave Imperial Valley unless the demands of the workers were granted.” Of course, when the melons were ripe at the end of April, the campaign of intimidation against pickers was at its height; and an unorganized strike was impossible. The union was defeated by its own words.

That was the beginning of the retreat. Sporadic strikes similar to the strikes of the preceding year started in the pea fields. But all were quickly beaten down by the organized vigilantes and highway police. The growers had learned valuable lessons from the Imperial Valley; the most extreme violence had been used against strikers there and nothing had happened. The same methods could be used wherever a strike started among the workers. Why not? In June the union made one last heroic stand: it called a strike in the apricot orchards at Brentwood, near Stockton. But strikes were no longer a problem to the growers; the forces of reaction were willing to do anything to help them. When 400 workers turned out to picket in Brentwood, deputies calmly herded the entire group into a railroad cattle pen, picked out all the leaders, and escorted most of the rest to the county line. As a result of the strike wages were reduced from 20 cents to 15 cents an hour. After that the union folded up. With it the main support of the Communist Party in California faded away. The leaders kept up a pretense of organization at the state headquarters in Sacramento, but they knew that the vast reservoir of hatred that the governor, bankers, growers, canners, and police had built up would be released at the first opportunity.

Viewed against the background of this agricultural struggle, the San Francisco affair takes on an entirely different look. The growers’ offensive against the union and all radicals advanced more rapidly as union resistance weakened. When the union collapsed altogether, a savage wave of repression against Communists in the towns where they were still active became inevitable. The longshoremen’s strike offered the pretext. In fact, the San Francisco Industrial Association’s move to open the port, which precipitated the general strike, and Governor Merriam’s red-baiting speeches, which were directed against the agricultural union more than against the stevedores, took place at the precise moment when it was most important that the union should be completely broken up—just when growers wanted to be doubly sure that Pat Chambers and Caroline Decker were not roaming around the state, just when the peach crop was ready. Probably this also explains the comparatively easy acceptance of “leadership” in the general strike by the notoriously reactionary San Francisco A. F. of L. leaders.

Today things go on in San Francisco and Los Angeles just about as they did before the general strike. Communist halls are open. Communists even make talks on the radio! In fact, the bosses are quite willing to let the reds propagandize one another—as long as they stay away from the workers!

But the valleys are quiet: the Cannery and Agricultural Workers’ Union is dead. During the general strike it could not call one single worker out of the fields to help the longshoremen. Its leaders, including Pat Chambers and Caroline Decker, have been in jail in Sacramento since July 20, and they are only now being tried, facing from six to eighty-four years in San Quentin. No agricultural unions are allowed anywhere in California; no meetings are held; no speeches are made; papers are sold secretly. It is criminal syndicalism even to attempt these things, and vigilantes are organized to see that no attempts are made. And that, my friends, is fascism, any way you look at it. The agricultural workers, the key to the California situation, have been defeated again. But their very slavery will force another attempt, with, we hope, better success.

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS ADAMIC is the author of “Dynamite” and “The Native’s Return.”

CHARLES MARTIN is the pseudonym of an American journalist in North China.

HAROLD J. LASKI, of the faculty of the University of London, is the author of “Democracy in Crisis.”

NORMAN MINI is one of the eighteen defendants in the criminal-syndicalism trials in California.

LUDWIG LORE, formerly editor of the New York Volkszeitung, writes a daily column, “Behind the Cables,” for the New York Post.

DOUGLAS HASKELL was formerly assistant editor of the Architectural Record.

FLORENCE CODMAN is the head of the publishing house of Arrow Editions.

LEO GERSHOY is the author of “The French Revolution and Napoleon.”

Books, Music, Films

Hitlerism and How It Grew

A History of National Socialism. By Konrad Heiden. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.50.

TO me it has always been incomprehensible that serious Germany, usually so thorough in political affairs, arrived so late and then only in a partisan, propagandist sense, at anything like an intelligent evaluation of the National Socialist movement, which was destined in a few short years to play so important and tragic a role in the life of the German people. Leaflets and propaganda material were plentiful, but as late as 1931 the student of political affairs, seeking for something which would explain this extraordinary phenomenon, found nothing by either friend or foe more fundamental than Feder's party program of twenty-five points. To some extent this may explain the failure of the German labor movement to credit its opponent with serious potentialities.

Not until the appearance in 1932 of Konrad Heiden's "Geschichte des Nationalsozialismus—Die Karriere einer Idee" was this deficiency in contemporary German literature at least partially overcome. Heiden saw the movement grow and its leader with it. Living in Munich first as a young student and later as a journalist, he attended National Socialist meetings at a time when they were not yet the reflection of a mighty movement. Out of the experiences of this period of growth, this classic history of the National Socialist idea was born. Heiden's second work, "Geburt des Dritten Reiches—Geschichte des Nationalsozialismus bis Herbst, 1933," which appeared early in 1934, showed the unfolding of the movement in the first year of its regime. Both works have now been published in translation under a single cover and are presented under the unassuming title "A History of National Socialism." A final chapter dealing with the most recent history of the Reich brings the book up to date.

The non-German reader is here given an opportunity for the first time to study the development of this peculiar movement as seen by an unprejudiced German's eye. For the conscientious student of this epochal development it is indispensable. The fundamental theoretical work on National Socialism, if such a thing is conceivable at all, has yet to be written. But as a photographic representation of the consecutive phases of the birth and growth of the movement, Heiden's work has great objective value. One appreciates the author's attitude all the more since he won his political spurs as leader of the republican students of Munich in the early post-war period and in the active fight against Nazi ideology in its early phases.

The first part of the book describes the growth of the party, the adoption of its program, the efforts of rival leaders—among them Julius Streicher, the Nazi specialist in anti-Semitism—to combat Hitler's pretensions to leadership, and the formation of the Storm Troop divisions—all with the justly celebrated thoroughness of the German historian. It traces the first stirrings of the National Socialist idea to its origins, going even farther back than the tool-maker Anton Drexler, father of the German Workers' Party and originator of the Nazi philosophy (his humble part in the creation of a new social theory performed, he dropped out of sight after a quarrel with the domineering Hitler), to those who inspired his confused and ill-digested philosophy. Peculiarly, those aspects of National Socialism which have weathered the storm of the last two years—its Aryan program, its superman philosophy, and its idea of world domination by propaganda—were derived from non-German sources. From the British Houston Stewart Chamberlain, who later married into the family of Richard Wagner, it derived its racial opinions. The Frenchman Gobineau first developed the theories on which Nietzsche built and tried to organize them into a political system. The Austrian Hitler gave it its leadership; the Balto-Russian Dr. Alfred Rosenberg its conspirative character, its tremendous propaganda apparatus, and its dreams of a world revolution. The book traces the trends of economic, social, legal, foreign, and church policy with a wealth of valuable information, always based on official and party documentary material. It makes illuminating comparisons between the original ideals and ideas of the movement and the compromises forced upon it by political facts and economic developments.

Hitler, naturally, is the hero and central figure of Heiden's ambitious work. He is described as a molder rather than an originator of ideas and opinions, as an able organizer and forceful orator whose positive qualities cannot conceal those deficiencies of character and intellect which make his rise to power so inexplicable to the average observer. Hitler's congenital opportunism, to which the author attributes the fantastic fluctuations in the domestic and foreign policies of the Third Reich, are an important theme in Heiden's delineation. Hitler rids himself of Drexler because the latter refuses to depart from the once accepted point of view. He dickers with the German Nationalists, whom he hates for their haughty disdain of a man they regard as a political upstart. He removes Otto Strasser and his followers from the party when they insist on a realization of its "socialist" demands. He murders Ernst Röhm, the creator of his private army, when the Brown Shirt chief's insistence on the privileged position of the S. A. stands in the way of an understanding with the great powers. He orders the execution of Gregor Strasser, the real organizer of the party, who resents the dominant position of industrialists in the Third Reich. He throws Gottfried Feder, the author of the Nazi program, overboard and makes Dr. Schacht, prototype of predatory capital, the dictator of Germany's economy. Is it intuition or uncanny understanding of political undercurrents that enables Hitler to navigate each dangerous shoal? Heiden does not attempt to answer.

The author is weakest in his evaluation of the events which immediately preceded Hitler's victory. He belongs among those shortsighted politicians who believed that Hitler might still have been checked just before January, 1933, if either Schleicher or Brüning had met his challenge by cooperating with the labor movement. He overlooks the fact that Schleicher's efforts in this direction were one of the important reasons for his overthrow and that every one of the great political parties preferred coalition with Hitler—at that time an unknown quantity in politics—to cooperation with the Socialist masses. In 1927-29, before the Communist Party entered on the period of rapid growth which threw the bourgeoisie into a panic of fear, a united front of democratic liberals and labor against fascism might have been conceivable—but under different leadership, for Brüning and Schleicher were so little anti-fascist that each was anxious to take Hitler into his Cabinet. By 1930 it was no longer possible to eliminate Hitler from the German scene by parliamentary machinations. There was only one alternative to fascism—a united fighting front of trade unionists, Socialists, Communists, and determined democrats ready for socialism as the only way out of the crisis.

Unfortunately for the American reader, this excellent sourcebook has suffered in the process of abridgment. To include both works in its 430 pages the translator was forced to omit much that is essential to a real understanding of the Hitler movement. He who is sufficiently familiar with the language will do well to choose the German volumes.

LUDWIG LORE

Housing and America

Modern Housing. By Catherine Bauer. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

THIS is a book for Americans, since it is concerned with the great step in civilization that left America out. During the twenties something phenomenal was occurring in Europe. Four and a half million families were put into a new kind of home. Miss Bauer calls it the beginning of a "new physical environment." For the first time that we know of, the efforts of the finest statesmen, the best planners, the ablest architects, the biggest builders, and the most skilful financial jugglers were directed toward the houses of all the people. They succeeded with a handsome part.

All this went under the name of "housing," and Miss Bauer tells how it was done. The story is such that even the technicalities make fascinating reading. Here you find recapitulated, for example, Raymond Unwin's famous proof that even in hard cash there is "nothing gained by overcrowding." Or you may follow the astonishing results in Germany from the rediscovery of the fact that a good house like a plant is always heliotropic. Entirely new community patterns were evolved just by turning all the houses to benefit by the sun. Then there is an exposure of the trap laid by shrewd operators for sentimentalists in the fraud of "slum clearance," which results whenever and wherever applied in a brand-new future slum. Miss Bauer goes at her subject thoroughly, from many sides: the social policies, the architecture, the economics are all treated, and a critical historical introduction is supplied very similar in manner to Lewis Mumford's "Sticks and Stones." This breadth distinguishes the book from others on the subject, as does also the fact that the author is not social-workerish, which in a book on housing is an unexpected blessing.

The book does remarkably well, in fact, until it returns to the United States, toward which the entire demonstration is directed. Here it meets a stunner. Why should there be only a thimbleful of "modern housing" over here? Miss Bauer canvasses the reasons, and the gist of her findings is that we lack the European training and preparation. Meanwhile we continue some unfortunate inheritances from the frontier. This leaves the housing leaders without a following; and consequently not much can be done until the American people are brought around to present an "effective demand."

It is here that another alternative appears that has not occurred to the author. The housing leaders might do better if they would stop working for us quite so much in order to work more with us. Instead of turning us into Europeans let them try to take us as we are. Not all the American peculiarities are helpful, of course, but many have a deeper, healthier foundation than has been suspected by Miss Bauer or Mr. Lewis Mumford. No one yet has succeeded in searching the useful ones out and turning them to account; and that is a still better reason than any that Miss Bauer cites why we have so little modern American housing.

At another point the book needs to be brought into its own line. Miss Bauer makes sharp comments here and there on "capitalism," but she continues the habit of thinking in terms of "income groups," "interest," "amortization," "rent," and other similar capitalistic book-keeping terms. Now it is true that through what is loosely called "capitalism" the twentieth century is entering upon a new Dark Age. The book-keeping that guides us no longer gives any sort of account of the true resources, capacities, or aspirations of the people. It binds us hand and foot; we are as helpless in its grasp as a Negro under voodoo. Soil, climate, tools, and people may all remain perfectly good, but the whole Western world goes into a five-year period of trance during which our mumbo-jumbo proves to us that despite all our resources nothing can be done. None of us may be able yet wholly to penetrate the nature of this illusion; but let us take the first steps. In proposals for "modern" shelter let us no longer rely on those "practical" dollar calculations that can only lead into the quagmire. They are at best a poor stop-gap.

These criticisms may seem remote, exercised on a very able book by a fresh writer giving the first rounded account of a great decade of modern or nearly modern shelter. But we need more than ability. We need new pioneers such as Unwin or Geddes tried in their time to be; and we need them bigger and more daring.

DOUGLAS HASKELL

One More Jerusalem

Road of Ages. By Robert Nathan. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

FOR those who began and stopped with Mr. Nathan's "One More Spring," this book should lead back to "Jonah." And this would be enough were it not that Mr. Nathan deserves more than summary. Moreover, the fanfare that precedes and accompanies publication nowadays, including the accolade of the choice-of-the-next-twenty-four-hours ("Road of Ages" is one-half the February Book of the Month), imposes a responsibility on the reviewer to make distinctions clear.

Mr. Nathan is a minor novelist, that is to say, his talents are restricted but of decent quality, which is a first distinction to novelists of greater and cheaper variety. Since the question of major and minor includes degrees of depth and breadth of talent and of robustness of talent, it is incongruous to anticipate from Mr. Nathan a "Don Quixote," but it is not incorrect to speak of him in the same breath with the author either of "Lolly Willows" or of "Le Grand Meaulnes." His gift is for fantasy, as his blurb writer says, for satiric fantasy. His world is an enchanted place, both here and not here, filled with people doing improbable things in a perfectly probable way and so by paradox pointing a satire. Because by their nature the enchantment is mild, the humor delicate, and the language lithe, the effect is limited. Yet within its circumference are wholeness and firmness, complete in their way.

Of his eleven novels three are notable. Two of these have been mentioned above. "Road of Ages" is the third. In such pieces as "The Fiddler in Barley" and "The Woodcutter's House," Mr. Nathan's greatest temptation, sentimentality, got the better of him, his measure of humor ran out, and his plots remained very ordinary plots. In his latest book his talent for mixing pathos and farce, ideals and fact, and for gently manipulating the symbolism of an old, old theme until it becomes gradually fresh again and happily contemporary is manifest. Manifest, it is true, in miniature, in the slight, pleasing, miniature whole that is his best accomplishment.

Madame Perez from the Avenue Friedland, who can read Gautier but does not know the language of Mrs. Blumenthal; the Gentile wife of Dr. Kohn; the ragged dancing chassidim from Galicia; Mr. and Mrs. Cohen from Columbus Avenue, who have only a pushcart; the shepherds with their flocks; and the messianic David are all going into exile again with the same dreams, the same humility, the same fears, the same resentment as on a hundred similar occasions. The New Jerusalem this time lies across Europe and half across Asia, somewhere in the Gobi Desert, in an unknown, unbuilt, magic future. The road is long, as the title suggests, and it follows the entire round of death and life; it is described with all the manifold subtle symbolism of class, of orthodoxy, and of liberalism that Mr. Nathan can put into it (the scene in which one rabbi rides pickaback upon the other shows his art in its neatest fusion).

Despite the quotation at the beginning, the book is no jeremiad. To a Christian, at least, it has the simpler, sweeter exhortation of an Amos.

FLORENCE CODMAN

The Ideology of War

The Ghost of Napoleon. By Liddell Hart. Yale University Press. $2.50.

The Hundred Days. By Philip Guedalla. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.75.

IN his little book, most of which was presented in the Lee Knowles Lectures for 1932-33 at Trinity College, Cambridge, Captain Hart develops two main themes. The one is that during the last two centuries the historical importance of military thought and its creators—in contradistinction to military action—have been signally underrated; the other, that during these two centuries, and at many other important moments during the past two thousand years as well, military ideas have changed the course of history.

Captain Hart is a professional student of warfare, a thoughtful and illuminating critic, manifestly as keen with the pen as with the sword. What he has to say concerning "the inspiration of new ideas and the introduction of new methods in military organization, strategy, and tactics" makes fascinating reading for the layman and, in all likelihood, convincing reading for the specialist. His account of the theories and methods of the great innovators—Marshal Saxe, Bourcet, Guibert, and du Teil—and of Napoleon's translation into practice, under conditions that fulfilled the requirements, of their teaching concerning mobility, organized dispersion, skirmishers, field artillery, and surprise concentration against an unbalanced enemy is a brilliant piece of expository writing. Not less convincing and more eloquent still is his grimmer story of how the nineteenth-century commentators, Jomini and Clausewitz, particularly the latter, and after them Foch and Grandmaison, distorted the great ideas of the eighteenth-century military reformers and built up a "system that wrecked Europe," that led to the mass suicide and the mutual massacre of 1914-18.

On the other hand, Captain Hart's ultimate evaluation, first, of Clausewitz's posthumous influence, especially during the frantic July days of 1914, and, secondly, of the influence of military ideas in general upon the course of history, is less persuasive. It may very well be that the philosophy of Clausewitz helped bring on the World War and that it acted as a check upon impulses to maintain peace. But as one studies the broader background of the World War, examines the memoirs of responsible civilian leaders, follows the testimony, let us say, of a Nye committee, one must remain convinced that it was not the misleading appeal of Clausewitz's philosophy that was a fundamental factor in the diplomatists' surrender to the militarists. Military thought, like patriotism, is not enough; and Captain Hart for all his forceful arguments is a special pleader, like many another, engaged in "earning his bread."

The reviewer does not for a single moment doubt that Mr. Guedalla has as much special competence in the field of military history, to which his talents are largely devoted in his charming essay, as Captain Hart has in the immensely broader field of his lectures. But the disrespectful thought occurs that if Mr. Guedalla had written part of Captain Hart's book and Captain Hart most of Mr. Guedalla's, neither work would have lost too much and both might have gained a great deal. It is one of the aims of the latter, in dealing with the period that elapsed from Napoleon's escape from Elba to the crushing defeat at Waterloo, to show that Wellington did not win the campaign solely because of the blunders of Napoleon's marshals, but that he won it on his own merits as the greatest fighting

CHARLES A. BEARD says:

NEW FRONTIERS

By HENRY A. WALLACE

"is an indispensable book for those who want to know what is happening . . . a historic and social document of prime importance." Sterling North of the Chicago News adds: "It should be required reading for every literate American." A Book-of-the-Month Club Selection. 53rd thousand $2.00

THE SECRET WAR FOR OIL

By FRANK C. HANIGHEN

A "dramatic fearsome" revelation of the titanic struggle for oil supremacy. "It will leave you open-mouthed in shocked amazement."—New York Post. "More interesting and more important than the munitions exposure."—New Yorker. a JOHN DAY book $2.75

SEA POWER in the MODERN WORLD

By Admiral Sir Herbert Richmond

Provides an indispensable background for the understanding of naval policies of the day, the demands of Japan, and the needs of America. "Whatever Admiral Richmond writes is well worth reading."—N. Y. Times. $3.00

THE SEARCH for TRUTH

By ERIC T. BELL

"If you are genuinely interested in the history of thought as a tool for mankind, you will do well to read this extraordinary book. . . . Very brilliant, witty, lucid."—Dorothy Canfield. $2.50

SUN YAT-SEN

By LYON SHARMAN

An interpretative biography of the great Chinese revolutionary leader who has influenced the lives of more men and women than any other figure in our times. a JOHN DAY book $3.50

THE SMART SET ANTHOLOGY

Edited by RASCOE and CONKLIN

The best of the Smart Set magazine in the days when Wright, Mencken and Nathan were making it the delight of two continents. Scores of genuine first editions of famous authors, never before in book form. 896 pages $3.50

REYNAL & HITCHCOCK, INC.

386 Fourth Avenue

New York

□ PLAYS □ FILMS □ LECTURES □

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
S. N. BEHRMAN'S play
RAIN FROM HEAVEN

with JANE COWL
and JOHN HALLIDAY
GOLDEN THEATRE, 45th Street, West of Broadway.
Evenings 8:30. Matinees Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
(in association with Charles B. Cochran)
for a limited engagement
ELISABETH BERGNER in
ESCAPE ME NEVER
by MARGARET KENNEDY
SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway.
Evenings 8:30. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

"A genuine contribution to the American theatre."—Gabriel, American,
HERMAN SHUMLIN presents

The Children's Hour

By LILLIAN HELLMAN
MAXINE ELLIOTT'S THEATRE WEST 39th STREET
Evenings 8:30—50c ■ $3. Matinees Wed. and Sat.—2:40—50c ■ $2.
Extra Matinee Washington's Birthday, February 22nd

6th
CAPACITY WEEK!

CHAPAYEV

"THE RED COMMANDER"

"A CLASSIC!" William Troy, Nation. "Possibly Representative Fish should look out for it," Richard Watts, Jr., Herald Tribune. "SUPERB!"
Andre Sennwald, N. Y. Times

CAMEO - 42nd St. E. OF B'WAY | Eng. Dialogue
Con. from 9 a.m. Titles

S. HUROK presents
MICHEL CHEKHOV
and
MOSCOW ART PLAYERS
with P. PAVLOV in modern Soviet and classic Russian plays

OPENS SAT. EVE.
February 16

"REVISOR" ("The Inspector General")—also Mon., Feb. 18,
Tues., Feb. 19. Wed. Mat.,
Feb. 20, Sat. Eve., Feb. 23.

"POVERTY IS NO CRIME"—Wed., Feb. 20,
Thurs., Feb. 21, Fri., Feb.
22, Sat. Mat., Feb. 23.

"CHEKHOV EVEN-ING"—Sun., Feb. 24.
Scenes from plays of Anton Chekhov with MICHEL CHEK-HOV in leading roles.

Office Sale Now
44th STREET, W. of B'WAY
Tel. CHL 4-3141

MAJESTIC THEATRE

Eves. incl. Sun. 75c, $1.10, $1.65, $2.20 (incl. tax). Mats. Wed. and Sat. 55c, 75c, $1.10, $1.65 (incl. tax). 500 SEATS ■ 75c and $1.10 (incl. tax)

FELIX FRANKFURTER

ON

Some Problems of

AMERICAN FEDERALISM

Six lectures, beginning Monday, February 18th
Series $5 Single Admission $1

NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH

66 West 12th Street

Telephone: AL 4-2567

man of his time. To support this contention the author makes clear—that is, as clear as a very urbane and precious prose allows him to practice the lowly method of argumentation—that in yielding to his political obsession to reconquer the Belgian provinces and in fashioning the campaign that he did, Napoleon overrode "the most exacting considerations of military prudence," considerations which Wellington was very far from ignoring.

Mr. Guedalla's points are well taken, particularly his skillful and artistically disguised proof of Napoleon's idée fixe about the recapture of Brussels. But maintaining that Napoleon was guilty of egregious blunders at Waterloo does not alter the fact, as Mr. Guedalla feels it does, that Grouchy, Ney, and d'Erlon generously supplemented their chief's blunders and by their shortcomings helped make the rout possible. It seems a chauvinistic endeavor, unworthy of Mr. Guedalla's talents and attainments, to single out the Waterloo campaign for the heroization of Wellington and the denigration of Napoleon. It might be more to the point to link up Napoleon's course at Waterloo with his general and consistent defiance of "the most exacting considerations of military prudence" and to show, in Captain Hart's admirable phrase, that "the General Bonaparte applied a theory which created an empire for him. The Emperor Napoleon developed a practice which wrecked his empire."

LEO GERSHOY

Music

What Shostakovich Adds

NOT even if you belonged to "the enemy" could you, while witnessing the lively performance of Shostakovich's opera, "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk," bring yourself to deny that you were witnessing sights and sounds of a highly intelligent order. A libretto that showed its origins in the realistic novel to good advantage provided many opportunities for acting of a less remote sort than usually goes with the "music temple" of the Wagnerian tradition; and the actors responded with suppleness. The sets by Rychtarik, whose draftsmanship I remember from the old days of the Dial, had a gratifying architectural sturdiness. The singers were fluent, with a spontaneous coordination of voice and movement that could arise only from a firm belief in their roles. Mr. Rodzinski had trained an orchestra which, on occasion, became even sweeping in its authoritativeness. And the music itself, if not exceptional in its texture, was written with a confidence which kept a large audience constantly engrossed, for all that the richest of musical illuminations (as in the rounded song) were lacking.

The work was as topical as "Madame Bovary," and in much the same manner. And since we heard here and there the customary complaints about the intrusion of propaganda into art, and the unfeasibility of same, it might be relevant to remember that the French master of "pure art" wrote books practically all of which were redoubted at the time of their appearance for their sharp political implications. I even recall a passage in Flaubert's correspondence where we learn that a large percentage of his presentation copies went unacknowledged because, though he had become a national celebrity, bureaucratic obligations—correlating political and aesthetic alignment—made it dangerous for public figures to indorse his art lest they incidentally involve themselves in an indorsement of his social criticism. In any event, as one who is still disgruntled at the memory of how unfairly the radical critics in America treated the "aesthetic" movement when the first zest of political criticism was on, I was pleased to see a contemporary Soviet composer following the patterns of anti-bourgeois thought quite as Flaubert had laid them down.

To restate the plot briefly: The curtain rises upon Katerina's boredom. She is Emma Bovary, victimized by her useless position, surrounded by bores and fops, and seeking to get some better quality of living out of the flimsy materials at hand. By the course of events, her pretentious husband goes away for a time and she becomes involved in a love affair with Sergei, a self-satisfied young clerk. The orchestral version of their union, imitating with progressive rapidity a movement which, if I remember my Catullus accurately, was called argutatio lecti, and ending in crude trombone sighs, was received by the audience with an uproar of civilized delight. But her lewd father-in-law discovers their amour, threatens to expose her; and when he flogs Sergei, Katerina poisons him. The husband returning finds Sergei's belt in the bedroom. Sergei remains in hiding until the husband starts to beat her; he then strangles the husband; and to some very doleful music they bury him in the cellar. The body is discovered just as Sergei and Katerina are to be married (and for comic interlude here, we have a somewhat obvious ridicule of the police, who move like automata, and effective belittling of the priest during the revels of the marriage scene). The last act shows a troop of convicts on the way to imprisonment in Siberia, with Katerina and Sergei among them. Sergei has lost interest in Katerina. Pleading that his feet are sore, he so touches her sympathy that she gives him her stockings, which he promptly uses to buy the favors of the prostitute Sonetka. Katerina, in anguish, seizes Sonetka and plunges with her into cold and desolate waters (Rychtarik's stark setting has helped us to know how cold and desolate they are); and the curtain falls with the convicts softly moaning in chorus as they are ferried off into the darkness across the stream, a scene which transcends its subject and suggests hardly less than the last mournful journey of the shades beyond the Styx. Snow falling—forms fading—and subsidence.

When considering Greek tragedy I have often felt that modern drama suffers an important artistic loss because there is no justification in our society for perpetuating the conventions of the tragic chorus. The chorus could pass judgment upon the course of the drama. When the Elizabethans dispensed with it as a convention surviving solely from an alien system of religion, they still had something of its prophetic equivalent in their use of witches, soothsayers, and grave meteorological portents. And as these have gone in turn, the only formal substitute I can think of is the operatic orchestra, whereby the composer can tonally foresee. Wagner contrives such a process somewhat bluntly in his use of the leit-motif, which he can introduce reminiscently or forebodingly to accompany some apparently unrelated bit of action. But Shostakovich seems to have moved a step farther. In fact, at times he almost brings us to that Chinese way of thinking whereby the orchestra grows gay to counterbalance the plot's sorrow, and vice versa. Is Katerina in dead earnest? Then let the orchestra inject a different spirit precisely at this moment. Critics have complained of the too obvious satire in Shostakovich's use of this dualistic device; and I admit that on many occasions his resources have been too rudimentary. Yet I think there is something instinctively sounder than mere musical wisecracking behind his method, that he is not merely aiming to give his orchestra the realistic or impressionistic function of restating tonally the temporary mood of the action, but is also endowing it with a very important intellectualistic task of interpretation.

One may quarrel with his specific use of this method. One may rightly discern little that is "new" in the kinds of sound that he has assembled for our entertainment. Furthermore, I found the device confusing, particularly as I must admit that a few passages which struck me as very beautiful, in the way that the love duet of "Tristan und Isolde" might be, seem to have been written by the composer with his tongue in his cheek. (I do not consider this a very damning admission, however, since the burlesque of a manner is often but a slightly more sophisticated way of restoring the lure which that manner possesses in its own right.) But while granting the absence of "newness," and admitting that the work seems merely to consolidate technical advances made by "decadent," "bourgeois" precursors, I do hold that the opera points to a firmer kind of newness in its attempt to put forward the orchestra as independent critic of the play's action, as intellectual judge rather than mere reinforcement of mood; and I should think that this is a kind of "rational" trend which need not, like a trick, be confined to one man but could be developed by operatic composers of many different hues.

KENNETH BURKE

A VIKING PRESS PUBLICATION

THE STORY WERFEL HEARD

In the summer of 1915, 5000 Armenian men and women made history. Facing exile which meant certain death, this band of simple, peaceful country people rallied to the summit of imposing Musa Dagh (The Mountain of Moses) and there, for forty days, struggled heroically against the might of the Turkish Empire.

In 1929, Franz Werfel, standing in the shadow of Musa Dagh, heard at first hand an account of this incident of the Great War. His author's mind recognized at once an epic theme.

Once more, the moving record of history was to be transformed into a living work of art.

For his hero he took Gabriel Bagradian, Armenian by birth, Parisian by education and inclination, who, as the story opens, returns to his native land and, with annihilation threatening his race, leads these 5000 peaceful villagers up the slopes of Musa Dagh, to resist until death the Turks led by their war lord, Enver Pasha.

Simply, clearly, Werfel tells how the courageous little band dug themselves in, organized for battle, arranged a strange communal life, and, from a rock jutting out over the sea, flung a banner: "Christians in Need".

In prose which keeps pace with the excitement of his story, Werfel describes the mounting suspense of those forty days of constant struggle against the Turks, starvation and internal strife.

As for the overpowering climax, only Werfel can recount the happenings of that fortieth day when the Turkish forces gather for a final not-to-be-denied onslaught, and Gabriel, standing among the remnants of his decimated forces, hears the sound that rose from off the sea. . . .

Early last year, The Forty Days of Musa Dagh was published in Europe. Quickly the word spread that here was a work of literature worthy to rank with the truly great novels of our time. Since reaching America just before Christmas, it has won the endorsement of four book clubs and a critical reception of unique proportions. In ten weeks it has sold more copies than any other novel published within the last year. Today, it is talked of throughout America. Every day, hundreds of new readers discover its excitement. 832 pages. $3.00.

THE FORTY

DAYS OF

MUSA DAGH

by FRANZ WERFEL

Films

"Pictorial Journalism"

IT has long been the opinion of patient film-goers, exposed year after year to the same monotonous round of baby parades in Atlantic City, Kentucky Derbies, battleships undergoing baptism, and smiling contests by the Roosevelts, that something drastic should be done about the newsreel. Not only are the events selected for recording usually lacking in any kind of significance, but the photography is without distinction and the editing innocent of either wit or intention. It was with considerable hopefulness, therefore, that I attended the first issue of "The March of Time," which has just appeared after more than a year of experimental work on the part of its producers. According to the editors of Time and Fortune, who are responsible for the enterprise, this new feature is to bear the same relation to the ordinary newsreel that the weekly news magazine bears to the daily newspaper. It is to be designated by the somewhat high-sounding label of "pictorial journalism." Another and perhaps more important variation from the old-fashioned newsreel is its supplementing of actual shots with studio-enacted scenes wherever these are necessary for the proper interpretation of recent events.

For its initial table of contents "March of Time" has chosen a heterogeneous collection of items: a New York speak-easy before and after the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment; a back-stage glimpse of Gatti-Casazza on his last opening night as director of the Metropolitan; a small employer's test case against the NRA; the refusal of an American motorist in France to pay a fine in protest against the failure of that country to settle its war debts; and the domestic life of Prince Saionji, the last of the elder statesmen of Japan. Any criticism of this offering must of course be tempered by the consideration that it is after all an experiment, a venture in a form of journalism that has never before been attempted. Improvement of a technical sort—in photography, in montage, and in the enacting of the staged scenes—is bound to take place when the enterprise loses some of its novelty. At present the new feature is in all these departments somewhat below the level of both the ordinary newsreel and the regular Hollywood enacted film. A more fundamental query concerns itself with the question of how feasible it is, in view of the present state of the public mind, to attempt to bring a truly "interpretative" or critical attitude to the screen. Sooner or later the producers will be forced to recognize the distinction between a news magazine, like Time or the Literary Digest, and a journal of opinion, like The Nation or the New Republic. And the moment that they realize the hazards which the latter choice would involve they will undoubtedly be forced to turn out a product which is not essentially very different from the old-fashioned newsreel. The choice is clearly between bare presentation and critical interpretation of the news; and only the most sanguine optimism can persuade anyone that the great motion-picture audience is ready for the latter.

For admirers of Leslie Howard, especially for those who have recently seen him in Mr. Sherwood's "Petrified Forest" on the New York stage, "The Scarlet Pimpernel" (Radio City Music Hall) will justify itself as providing the richest role that he has yet been assigned on the screen. Based on the Baroness Orczy's none too credible account of a band of young Englishmen who devoted themselves to rescuing French noblemen from the guillotine during the Terror, this newest importation from the British studios is certain to displease the historically informed spectator who does not feel that Robespierre was a butcher or that the common people were a pack of depraved animals. Nor will the shameless appropriation of certain theatrical effects from earlier dramas—the knitting women by the guillotine out of "Tale of Two Cities," the episode of the Prince Regent and the tailor out of "Beau Brummel," and the recitation of the celebrated "this England" speech from "Henry V"—add much to one's enjoyment. But on the other hand the film is well directed; it has been elegantly mounted by Alexander Korda; and the eighteenth-century backgrounds are rendered with a miraculous rightness of details and effect. Mr. Howard, as the English nobleman who disguises himself as a loquacious fop in order to distract attention from his expeditions in behalf of the condemned French aristocracy, has the kind of role which is a test for any actor, the kind of fourth-dimensional role, if the term may be used, in which the actor is required to play a part within a part. And his success confirms the belief that he is one of the few players on stage or screen who possess the sort of detachment toward their materials which is the mark of the authentic artist.

WILLIAM TROY

☐ DANCE ☐ LECTURES ☐

FRIDAY EVENING, at nine
MARCH 1st
 New York City Committee
DANCE
 AMERICAN LEAGUE AGAINST WAR AND FASCISM
 MECCA TEMPLE CASINO
 133 WEST 55TH STREET
 TICKETS at New York City Comm. Office:
 213 - 4th Ave. GRA. 5-2042.
 50 East 13th St. All branches American League Against War and Fascism.
 ADMISSION
 49 cents in advance
 60 cents at door
 (star of "Stevedore") and GROUP in "Drums of the Bayou," THE NEW SINGERS, HOT MUSIC, others!

MEANING OF FASCISM
 Series of 8 Lectures conducted by DR. H. SLOCHOWER and DR. C. HAIDER
 at 168 West 23rd St., N. Y. C.
 Series of lectures: Feb. 15, Monopoly Capitalism; Feb. 22, Italian Fascism; Mar. 3, Italian Fascism continued, and Spanish Fascism; Mar. 8, Post War Germany; Mar. 15, German Fascism; Mar. 22, Fascist Trend and Nazi Propaganda in the United States.
 $1.00 for entire series — 25c single lecture
 Auspices Anti-Nazi Federation

Joseph Wood Krutch will resume his drama column in the next issue

NEXT WEEK

Lincoln Kirstein will contribute a review of American Dancers including Doris Humphries, Charles Weidman, Martha Graham and Agnes de Mille.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXL

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1935

No. 3634

Contents

| | |
|---|-----|
| EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS | 233 |
| EDITORIALS: | |
| A Vestige of the New Deal | 236 |
| Italian Sword-Rattling | 237 |
| The Wolman Elections | 237 |
| Do the Justices Own Gold-Clause Bonds? | 238 |
| ISSUES AND MEN. ENGLAND'S NEW SHIP SUBSIDIES. By | |
| Oswald Garrison Villard | 239 |
| CARTOON: BUT ADOLF HAS SOME MAPS, TOO. By LOW | 240 |
| PURSUING A PREVARICATION. By R. G. S. | 241 |
| A TALK WITH PHIL LA FOLLETTE. By Louis Adamic | 242 |
| MEN WHO MAKE AMERICA'S GODS. By Left Wing | 245 |
| CONGRESS DISCOVERS THE CLASS STRUGGLE. By Maxwell | |
| S. Stewart | 247 |
| IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter | 249 |
| CORRESPONDENCE | 250 |
| LABOR AND INDUSTRY: | |
| "Confessions of an Opium Eater." By Heywood Broun | 251 |
| Nick Bins, Kidnapper. By Hans Christian | 252 |
| BOOKS, THE DANCE, DRAMA: | |
| Canopy of Death. By William Troy | 254 |
| A New Monument to Lee. By George Fort Milton | 254 |
| East Side World. By Horace Gregory | 255 |
| Agricultural Utopia. By Benjamin Horace Hibbard | 255 |
| Newspapers and War. By Bailey W. Diffie | 256 |
| Shorter Notices | 257 |
| Contributors to This Issue | 257 |
| The Dance: Some American Dancers. By Lincoln Kirstein | 258 |
| Drama: Noah Has His Doubts. By Joseph Wood Krutch | 259 |

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three Years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN: $1 a year addition.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by the Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

THE SUPREME COURT'S decision on the gold cases is the more heartening to the Administration because it was not fully expected. Although it had generally been taken for granted that the court would uphold the right of Congress to abrogate the gold clause in private contracts, there was much uncertainty regarding the ruling on the government's own obligations. By declaring that Congress lacked the power to invalidate the clause in its own bonds and at the same time ruling that owners of the bonds were powerless to force the government to make payment in gold, the court has found legal grounds for dismissing all claims for alleged losses resulting from the revaluation of the dollar. While to many persons this will seem to be a subterfuge unworthy of the highest court in the land, it serves the purpose of giving final legal sanction to the government's action quite as well as any other decision could have done. In this sense it may be taken as one more indication of the court's growing sense of social responsibility. The only regret is that the court could not have followed the precedent established by ex-Justice Holmes and based its decision frankly on social rather than merely legal considerations. But even as it stands the ruling indicates that the Administration has little to fear regarding the remainder of the New Deal legislation. Although the abrogation of the gold clause was by no means the most fundamental step in the Administration's program, it was one of the most difficult to defend on constitutional grounds. With this obstacle surmounted, there is no longer an excuse for timidity and procrastination in formulating policies to meet the needs of the day.

WHEN JUSTICE McREYNOLDS, in expressing his dissent, declared the Constitution to be "gone," he vividly characterized the difference between this ruling and the narrow legalistic position which the court has frequently taken in the past. The bitterness with which the four dissenting justices assailed the decision serves as a disquieting reminder of how easily the die might have fallen the other way. With all due regard for the sincerity and integrity of the court, the fact remains that the intellectual bias of individual justices may become the determining factor in the decision. This has been so patent in recent years that the opinion of certain justices has been confidently foretold, the final decision being in the hands of two or three men whose social philosophy is not so clearly formulated. We may applaud the court's action in this particular instance, yet be more than ever convinced of the undesirability of having legislation subject to the review of the judiciary. It is largely accidental that the court is dominated at present by justices who are described as liberal. Otherwise the New Deal legislation as a whole might have been outlawed. There is but one protection against such a disastrous possibility—a constitutional amendment depriving the Supreme Court of its self-arrogated right to invalidate legislation duly enacted by Congress.

THE GERMAN REPLY to the Anglo-French note of February 3 is a masterpiece of skilful diplomacy, but disappointing to those who had hoped that the Reich might be maneuvered back into the League merely by an ex post facto recognition of the legality of its rearmament. Although conciliatory in tone, the reply is essentially a notice to the powers that Germany will not accept anything which is not clearly in its interest. It welcomes discussion of the proposed aviation convention, both because this implies tacit recognition of the legality of the German air force and out of fear lest England, France, and Italy conclude a three-power pact against the Reich. But beyond this there is not the slightest evidence that Hitler has modified his position either on rearmament or on collective security. The German government goes out of its way to reiterate its traditional contention that the threatened armament race arises from "the abandonment by the heavily armed states of disarmament as prescribed by the treaties." It ignores the Eastern Locarno and gives no indication of a willingness to reopen the larger questions of European disarmament. Most disturbing of all is the deliberate snubbing of France in the suggestion of an early interchange of views between Britain and Germany. While this rather clumsy effort to drive a wedge between the allied powers is not likely to succeed, it has aroused such resentment in France as virtually to eliminate the possibility of an early settlement.

A NEW GENERAL has risen on the Washington horizon, like General Johnson a man with a worthy army record capped by experience in big business. He is Brigadier General Robert E. Wood (retired), and the President has chosen him chairman of the committee to advise on the spending of the four-billion-dollar public-works fund. He is president of Sears, Roebuck, and director of two banks and a railroad. He is not a newcomer to Washington, having been an associate on the Industrial Advisory Board of the NRA with Gerard Swope, Walter Teagle, and Pierre du Pont, and is a member of the Consumers' Advisory Board of the NRA. His choice as spender-in-chief indicates the rise of the right wing of the President's Cabinet, since he bears the hallmark of Secretary Roper and is one of the big shots in the new business lobby which is to advise the Administration. If he makes a name for himself in the new task he might look forward to filling the shoes of dictatorship at the NRA left empty by General Johnson. It has been denied that he is in line for the revived office of administrator, or that the five-man board is to go. But the denial really means that the suggestion is premature. General Wood's army career includes fighting in the Philippine insurrection, useful service in the construction of the Panama Canal, and important duties in the World War. He was acting quartermaster general in 1918-19. His business affiliations have been chiefly with mail-order houses and that has made him an expert on the mentality of farmers. On labor questions the opinion in Washington is that he stands much to the right of General Johnson.

THE FASCIST PLOT revealed by General Smedley Butler to the so-called Dickstein committee, and received with derision by most of the leading newspapers of this democracy, was given official authentication in the committee's report to Congress. "There is no question," it says, "that these [fascist] attempts were discussed, were planned, and might have been placed in execution when and if the financial backers deemed it expedient." Suppressed portions of the Butler testimony should now be published. The New Masses supplies its version of the suppressions and includes many important names—the du Ponts, Al Smith, Hugh Johnson, Douglas MacArthur, Hanford MacNider, and in particular the American Liberty League. It is plain that the committee bungled into the inner privacy of some of our most respectable financial and political gentlemen and was at pains not to pursue its investigation to a logical conclusion. Instead, its recommendations deal with the need for registering foreign propagandists, deporting them if need be, and outlawing disobedience by members of our armed forces. It ends with a demand for legislation making it unlawful to advocate overthrow of government by force. Advocacy of violence thus would become criminal, but high financial strategists could plot it with impunity. For our part we believed the Butler story at the time chiefly because it bore out our conception of the inanity of the financial mind in the realms of revolutionary conspiracy. Fascism, if it comes, will not be cooked up in Wall Street. It will be a pseudo-radical movement with a popular following, which Wall Street will eventually see the wisdom of supporting. We are much more frightened by Father Coughlin and Huey Long than by the brokers who were set to bait the trap for General Butler.

THE HAUPTMANN TRIAL is over—and the American public may recover as best it can from a glut of vicarious emotional excitement ranging from a mother's grief over her lost child to a convict's terror of the electric chair. The story of the kidnapping and its aftermath is an extremely dramatic one and we should be the last to deny its fascination or condescend to those who find it interesting. But it is also true that one by one every simple human response has been distended and distorted into monstrous shapes of unreality; day by day legitimate human curiosity has been whipped into a craving for ever larger doses of the yellow drug dispensed by press and radio, culminating on the last day of the trial in a blood lust that brought a screaming mob to the white courthouse in Flemington and even found its way into the summation of the state's attorney, Mr. Wilentz, who proclaimed himself the leader of the mob outside when he stood before his victim and uttered these words: "He will be thawed out, he is cold, yes, he will be thawed out when he hears that switch . . ." But Mr. Wilentz, whose political ambitions are everybody's secret, was only one of hundreds who hitched their personal sideshows to the weird circus at Flemington, until the legal proceeding itself became merely another sideshow, and the central issue of a man's guilt or innocence, his life or death, became the pin point on which thousands of newspapermen, special writers, radio announcers, public officials, and mere citizens danced for a populace which had been rendered insatiable. The tale of their excesses would surely read, to the proverbial man from Mars, like the record of a society gone berserk on an unheard-of scale.

IF ANY NEW EVIDENCE was needed to support The Nation's charges that the Casa Italiana at Columbia University is under fascist control, it was furnished on Monday, February 11, when a reception was held there in honor of Dr. George M. Ryan, president of the New York City Board of Education. Dr. Ryan on his recent return from Italy had candidly informed the New York press that he was "full of enthusiasm" for Italian education and wished that its methods could be applied in the United States. Only the week before the reception Giuseppe Prezzolini, director of the Casa, had been accused publicly of being a fascist spy, a member of the Opera Volontaria Repressione Anti-fascista. This charge was made by Girolamo Valenti, editor of La Stampa Libera, an independent New York Italian newspaper, and has so far not been denied by Prezzolini, who merely declares that he knows "nothing at all about the case." The Graduate Club of Italian Studies had previously withdrawn from the Casa because Prezzolini refused to cooperate in an invitation to Professor Salvemini of Harvard, distinguished historian and anti-fascist. This refusal, as The Nation pointed out, was a clear proof of the Casa's continued discrimination against anti-fascists. Yet Dr. Ryan, in return for his support of Mussolini's educational methods, was the recipient of an official reception at the Casa. How did the Casa dare expose itself to further attack by such a gesture? The answer is that the reception to Dr. Ryan was ordered by Italian government authorities in New York, who themselves were under direct orders from Rome. Prezzolini, in spite of the serious charges standing against him, could not refuse.

OSCAR G. JOHNSTON, general manager of the cotton producers' pool of the AAA, is shortly to depart for Europe to explore the possibilities of a world-wide stabilization of cotton production. This is a belated recognition of the impracticability of a strictly national solution of another of our so-called domestic problems. If there is any important commodity in which a purely national policy appears justified, it is cotton. Prior to the depression this country had a virtual strangle-hold on the market, producing approximately three-fifths of the world's supply. During the early years of the crisis the volume of demand remained relatively stable, but the price declined catastrophically along with that of other basic commodities. To meet this crisis the Roosevelt Administration subsidized the farmers to reduce production, and stimulated a marked rise in prices. While the effect has been temporarily beneficial for the majority of producers, it has encouraged foreign cotton growers to increase their output by an amount which is almost identical with the extent of curtailment in the United States. As a result of the relatively high price of American cotton, exports have declined nearly 50 per cent in volume in a year, leaving the United States with a large surplus for which there is no market. To meet the new crisis by further crop reduction would obviously be suicidal; we must either adjust our costs to those of the outside world—which means reduced incomes for cotton growers—or seek an international agreement which would extend the benefits of regulation on a world-wide basis.

RATIFICATION of the child-labor amendment by four states—Wyoming, Utah, Idaho, and Indiana—since the first of the year brings the total to twenty-four, two-thirds of the number required to place it in the Constitution. From now on, however, the amendment will have much harder going on its trip through the legislatures. This becomes clearly evident if one checks the states which have ratified against the child-labor chart in Children's Bureau Publication No. 197, "Child Labor: Facts and Figures." Of the ten states which have the fewest children per thousand of population fourteen and fifteen years of age engaged in agricultural and non-agricultural occupations, nine—Ohio, California, Indiana, Michigan, Maine, Washington, New Hampshire, Illinois, and Idaho—have approved the amendment. Six of the ten next best from the standpoint of child-labor conditions—Utah, Minnesota, West Virginia, Montana, Oregon, and Wyoming—have ratified. Of the third best group, eight states—Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, Iowa, North Dakota, Arizona, New Jersey, Oklahoma, and Colorado—have acted favorably. Thus, while there is a chance that the amendment will receive some further support in the states with the better child-labor records, its fate will depend chiefly on the states at the bottom of the list—from Connecticut and Missouri, which have eighty-eight children at work for every one thousand in the population fourteen and fifteen years of age, on down to Mississippi, which has more than three hundred per thousand. The one shining exception among states with poor child-labor conditions is Arkansas, the thirty-second on the list, which curiously enough, was the first state to ratify the amendment eleven years ago. The fact that the amendment has been ratified by the states with the best records and rejected by those with the worst, for the most part Southern states, is all the answer needed to the pious profession of the opponents of the amendment that the states can be relied on to enact suitable remedial laws.

WHAT IS WRONG with the A. F. of L. was abundantly demonstrated by Mr. Tighe's recent purge of the rank-and-file leaders from the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers. It was charged (1) that the rank-and-file leaders were arrant reds, downright Communists; and (2) that they had been paid by the steel employers to split the union. How, in fact, have the rank-and-file leaders sinned? They see in the mass of iron-and-steel workers a group of wage-earners ripe for organization. They propose to carry out the organizational task by a vigorous recognition campaign supplemented by a general strike call. They see through the mockery of the Steel Labor Board, which has never used its powers until too late. They draw back in disgust from the lethargic tactics of the incredible Mr. Tighe, who belongs in an old men's home rather than at the head of the iron-and-steel workers' union. They seek to replace the present leadership with a new, vigorous leadership which will not shrink from militant action. Mr. Tighe's reactions are understandable: he likes his job; he likes the slumbers of the pre-code days; he likes to conserve the financial resources and the spiritual energy of the union. Why undertake to "organize the unorganized" in iron and steel, when that may destroy the system whereby the employers have tolerated the Amalgamated in a few skilled crafts in a few sheet mills? That Mr. Tighe is acting altogether on his own initiative, however, is doubtful. His move is probably the first step in a general A. F. of L. program of "mopping up the reds," a program agreed upon by the Executive Council at Atlantic City in 1934.

CLEVELAND, like several other large cities, is in the throes of a red scare, this time without the direct assistance of Mr. Hearst. The Cleveland Chamber of Commerce and the Associated Industries have issued a report revealing the existence of a "Secret Seven" who represent the city's "better elements" in mortal combat against "subversive activities." This document denounces the activities of "reds," "pinks," and "liberals," and discloses preparations for putting down an expected "rebellion." It also declares that trade chambers in other cities are planning similar action. The report naturally aroused derisive laughter when it appeared, but two days later the Cuyahoga County commander of the American Legion admitted that Legion posts were drilling in uniform for this rebellion-breaking service, and added that arms were easily accessible. The laughter died away. The anti-red program was read again, with its proposal to outlaw Communists and their literature, to suppress "intellectual pinks" by prosecution under the Ohio criminal-syndicalism law, and to carry the fight to schools and churches by a public-education campaign. Cleveland labor has been aroused by the "Secret Seven" and has joined with liberal forces in a counter-offensive. The City Council has ordered an investigation of the Chamber of Commerce's activities, and measures have been introduced in the state legislature to repeal the war-time sedition law. The Nazi-like tendencies in Cleveland have been unearthed in time and are apparently being scotched; it is to be hoped that other cities will profit by the example.

A Vestige of the New Deal

THE reform of the Federal Reserve system proposed in the Banking Bill of 1935 goes far enough to infuriate the conservative banking interests but not nearly far enough to satisfy those who want open-faced government banking. The bill can be described as a belated recognition of the truth that money is not only cash but also checking deposits in commercial banks. The government already regulates the conditions under which cash can be issued, but the amount of checking deposits, if left to banking supervision, can be varied without regard to the public welfare. The bulk of our money supply today is about twenty-four billion dollars, nearly nineteen billions of it in checking accounts. It is a truism that a change in the amount of available money affects business activity. The effect is not one to be simply calculated, and it varies in varying circumstances. But all the monetary theories agree that the amount of money is a concern of the greatest moment to the whole community. Hence, the responsibility for the amount of money should rest with those charged with defending the public good. Under the original Federal Reserve system the government was without any control whatever. The prime consideration of the system was to make sure that all reasonable demands for loans could be met. The original act did not provide a direct means for regulating the amount of money, and such practice as has grown up to change the amount has been uncertain and slow. The main purpose of the new bill is to give the government direct control.

Stated in this way the case for the bill in an inflexible economic system is unanswerable except to those who do not believe that government can govern. There are those who obstinately contend that bankers are better servants of the people than politicians. The record of politicians may be poor enough, but the bankers are in a bad stance to say they would do better. Between 1929 and 1933, when the national income was being cut in half by deflation, the supply of deposit money decreased by about one-third. So far as the bankers were concerned that was all part of the game. In a deflation, that would be one of the consequences. Banks would fail, wiping out deposits; deposits would be withdrawn for hoarding; and loans to the banks would be called. It did not occur to them that without money the nation could not fight the deflation, and was bound to lose and continue to lose its income. Or if it occurred to them, they saw no way for bankers to change the laws of deflation, sacred as the very laws of nature. Bankers had the power to increase the supply of deposit money but they did not have the statesmanship to use it. That is not a criticism of bankers, for it is not their role to be statesmen. But it is the role of the state to control its own destiny. The old-fashioned people, led by Senator Carter Glass, would be plausible in opposing this shift of economic power to the state as trustee of the people if we still lived in an age of old-fashioned capitalism. A completely flexible capitalist system would take care of inflations and deflations quickly. But it could do so only if capitalists accepted their losses promptly, if wages could fall quickly, and if the state did not come indiscriminately to the rescue of credit institutions with loans. Flexible capitalism has ceased to exist, and with our excess of gold the automatic nature of control has vanished.

The monetary reformers are not satisfied with this bill because it does not go far enough. It does not even define what the aim of the new governmental power shall be. Shall it be stability? Then, they ask, let the bill state it, so that the power will surely be used to maintain a stable price level. But most of them would prefer straightaway government banking. The checking services of the commercial banks could be performed cheaply by the post office, down to the smallest hamlet. The loan services could be performed by state institutions. And since what they really want is the social control of credit, they see no reason for halting far from the goal. The argument that the state cannot control credit for the common good, and that bankers can control it better, is a poor one, since it relies on bankers being disinterested and the public not knowing its own needs. Bankers are biased in favor of high interest rates. To expect disinterestedness from them is an absurdity.

A good deal of talk is heard these days about the "100 per cent principle," advocated by one school of liberal economists. By this banks would keep 100 per cent assets to cover deposits. That would make them into straight deposit institutions, and their loan functions then would pass to investment trusts. The proposal is made by Professor Henry C. Simons in a widely discussed pamphlet, "A Positive Program for Laissez Faire," issued by the University of Chicago Press. Professor Simons is a black pessimist about saving the capitalist system, and believes it and democracy are doomed unless some fairly revolutionary steps are taken. He would nationalize all business which cannot be made competitive, like the railroads and the public utilities. Then he would ruthlessly break up all monopolies and make the forming of monopolies the great social sin. In monopolies he includes trade unions. He would remove tariffs, and he cannot see how capitalism can be saved without the adoption of social taxation. If this program is all that can save democracy, the role of the President in history will after all be that of a Kerensky. Only fascism rather than communism is the likelier next step here. We cannot imagine the President or Congress accepting a fraction of Professor Simons's reforms at this time. But we agree that the new banking bill is not enough, and we too are frightened by the failure of the Administration to make a beginning of social taxation. But so far as it goes, we have no criticism to make of the new legislation. Governor Marriner Eccles of the Federal Reserve Board, who devised it, has at least divested himself of the traditional "banker's outlook." The New Deal has been much curtailed in the last months. The shift in economic power from the few to the many is not going to be realized in industry; if anything, employer strength is being increased and monopolistic tendencies are being fortified. Social control over money is good as far as it goes and control over credit should follow. This and the probable gradual socialization of electric power appear to us the remaining vestiges of the brave program the President once sponsored.

Italian Sword-Rattling

THE dispatch of two fully equipped divisions of the Italian army to Africa has again aroused fear lest Mussolini is planning the seizure and partition of Abyssinia. This development is the more disquieting because three weeks ago it appeared that the combined pressure of the powers at the League Council had forced Rome to abandon its insistence on an apology and an indemnity. A new incident near Ualual, only slightly less serious than the earlier one, has been seized upon as occasion for a renewal of all the original demands. As in the previous clashes, each side has charged the other with responsibility for the attack, but since the territory itself is in dispute it is virtually impossible to determine the aggressor. It is significant, however, that in each case Abyssinian losses have been far greater than those of Italy.

A further complication has arisen from Abyssinia's proud intransigence in the face of overwhelming odds. Resting on the memory of his country's sensational victory over Italy in 1896, Emperor Haile Selassie has stood his ground and asked for arbitration, apparently unimpressed by the indubitable superiority of the Fascist army. He has done so even though recent events have made it clear that Abyssinia cannot count on the support of any of the major European powers. While Italy is bound by the League Covenant and the Pact of Paris not to wage war on Abyssinia, nothing more than a formal objection will be raised to a "punitive expedition" such as Japan sent against China three years ago. France, the traditional ally and protector of the African state, is apparently committed by the recent Rome agreement to give Italy a free hand, while Britain's interests appear to lie definitely on the side of Italy. The attitude of these two countries has been so obviously pro-Italian as to revive the rumor that the three powers have entered into a definite agreement along the lines of the 1915 treaty for the partition of Abyssinia, with the largest portion going to Italy as compensation for its failure to receive colonies at the close of the World War. It is possible, of course, that Il Duce is only blustering, but it seems unlikely that he would go to the trouble and expense of extensive mobilization merely for effect.

At first thought the United States would seem to be practically helpless to aid Abyssinia even if it desired to do so. It is not a member of the League, it is not committed by any multilateral pact to protect the integrity of Ethiopia, and it has no important commercial interests in that part of Africa. Yet precisely because it has no such political or economic entanglements it is in a peculiarly favorable position to exert moral influence against the sort of territorial brigandage which all nations have renounced in principle. The Kellogg Pact still stands as the supreme law of the nations. It has been violated and trampled upon by certain countries, but never without censure. This is the first time that a great European power has threatened to destroy the very existence of another sovereign state, signatory to that treaty. Irrespective of our recent isolationist tendencies, it would seem obvious that we have a very special responsibility as sponsor of the pact. If it becomes clear that actual warfare is threatened, there are several steps which could be taken, none of them involving the use of force. We might dispatch a strong note to both governments calling attention to the threatened breach of their agreement and suggesting mediation; and we might follow this with a summons to all the signatory nations for an immediate conference to discuss means of peaceful settlement. If these measures failed it would be possible under the recent arms legislation to obtain an embargo on the sale of arms to the aggressor nation. These steps may sound weak in view of the failure of the League's attempt at moral suasion in the Manchurian crisis, but in this particular instance the one thing that the powers least desire is open discussion of the matter. If the United States took the leadership in forcing such a discussion, it is quite possible that some way would suddenly be discovered whereby the controversy could be settled.

The Wolman Elections

THE protests of the American Federation of Labor against the Automobile Labor Board and its elections in Detroit have been dismissed in Administration circles as an example of sour grapes. Donald Richberg has told the Federation that it cannot expect to have any part in negotiating the terms for extension of the automobile code since the early returns from Detroit gave it only 5 per cent of the workers, while from 80 to 90 per cent registered themselves as unaffiliated. Just how are these elections conducted? Do they promote collective bargaining? Why have they been boycotted by organized labor?

The workers in each department of a plant are asked to nominate by ballot a man or woman to represent them. The worker may add the name of the organization to which his nominee belongs. In each department the two workers receiving the highest number of nominations are asked to be candidates in the election; they are also asked what organization labels, if any, they wish put after their names. The winners in the elections then constitute the plant committee. If the A. F. of L. is designated on, say, 10 per cent of the nominating ballots in a plant and the committee has nine or ten members, the board notes whether any elected member ran under the label of the A. F. of L.; if not, it adds to the committee the A. F. of L. candidate receiving the largest number of votes, thus securing "proportional representation."

In the first place, the Federation contends, it is an election of individuals, not of organizations, differing in this respect from other government-supervised elections. Conceivably, such an election of individuals could be a real battle between organizations. A union might pick candidates in each district, specifically instruct all its members to nominate these candidates and designate the organization; the union might also try to get the same specific instructions to workers who are merely sympathizers. But only by some such cumbersome procedure could the union get a complete count of its strength. It is not only unable to nominate its representatives directly, but it cannot prevent anyone who wants to from running as its representative. Such a "union" candidate, or even a real union member, may owe his election to non-union votes in his department. In any case the union has no control over him. His department, which he is supposed to represent, has no control either, since the board has made no provision for recall and has set up no procedure by which a department may instruct its elected representative. Under this arrangement, which places all the emphasis on the individual, there is no incentive for the workers to register their affiliation with a company union, the Federation, or any other organization. Any bargain the committee might conceivably make with the company would be based on the decision of its individual members. This is not collective bargaining. It is much closer to Mussolini's system of workers' syndicates.

Another important reason for the boycott lies in the fact that the works council, or "government union," which the Wolman board contemplates would have no more economic strength than a company union. It might adjust many grievances, since the company would find it judicious to cooperate, but it would not "represent" the workers, affiliated or unaffiliated, in the sense that they are represented by a union which is geared for strikes.

Why did almost all the men vote? Contrary to general practice, the elections were held in the plants, during working hours. In most cases the production lines were shut down so that the men could vote. The foreman—whom the NRA report paints as a powerful figure—could easily take note of any man who failed to vote. Also, the board sent its agent around to urge those who had not voted to do so. Only the reckless few would refuse.

Elections were devised as a sort of substitute for strikes. The present government policy in the automobile industry leaves labor only the strike as a substitute for elections.

Do the Justices Own Gold-Clause Bonds?

PROFESSOR CHARLES A. BEARD in his "Economic Interpretation of the Constitution of the United States" has analyzed the interests which motivated the men who framed the Constitution and brought about its adoption. "The members of the Philadelphia Convention," he says, "were, with a few exceptions, immediately, directly, and personally interested in, and derived economic advantages from, the establishment of the new system." A hundred years from now, or sooner, some scholar following in Dr. Beard's footsteps will doubtless write a similar interpretation of the opinions of the United States Supreme Court. He will discuss our curious system of government by judicial decision, will interpret from the point of view of economic determinism the record of legislative acts sustained and outlawed, and will analyze the personal interests of our distinguished line of supreme jurists. He will find plenty of material in the social and business background of the judges to support a theory of economic motivation; but he will also find an impressive record of individual probity. It has been the habit of the judges not only to divest themselves before taking office of all possible economic connections which might impair their judicial impartiality but also to disqualify themselves from passing on specific cases in which, by reason of family or business or professional relationships, past or present, they might be suspected of any tinge of personal interest. In doing this the justices of the Supreme Court have acted according to the accepted dictates of the common law as well as many judicial decisions governing the disqualification of judges in lower courts. But then our future Professor Beard would stumble on the perplexing fact that in one of its most important cases, a case involving the constitutionality of acts abrogating the gold clauses in private contracts and government securities, the court proceeded to render a decision in spite of the obvious possibility that its members had a direct pecuniary interest in the outcome.

Under our present law it would be impertinent to ask whether any members of the court own Liberty bonds or other bonds containing the gold clause. But it is not impertinent to suppose for the purpose of this discussion that this is the case. The general assumption that before ascending the bench the justices divest themselves of the ownership of common or preferred stocks makes it highly probable that government and other bonds affected by the decision in the present cases form at least a part of their personal holdings. If this is so, can it be doubted that under a strict application of their own past rulings, any justices holding such bonds would have been disqualified from passing on the present cases? Perhaps the question sounds unduly legalistic. If the Supreme Court was not qualified to pass on the gold-clause cases, what body was? Must we appoint a bench composed of men without property in order to get a qualified decision? Or should the court have refused to review the decision of the lower court? The Nation would not drive the argument to any such ultimate absurdity. Under our existing legislative-judicial system it was necessary that the case be decided by a supreme tribunal. And we are not prepared at the moment to advocate a law prohibiting judges from accumulating and investing private fortunes. But neither are we so trustful as to believe that any set of men can fail to be affected, unconsciously if not knowingly, by their personal financial interests. It is an ancient legal maxim, founded in good morals, that no man should be judge in his own case.

The dilemma created by the gold-clause cases must have been in the mind of every member of the Supreme Bench. Undoubtedly the court dismissed the question of possible self-disqualification by invoking what is conveniently known as "the doctrine of necessity." Technical rules and the subtler sanctions of judicial ethics had to give way to the obvious need of a final adjudication. With this probable conclusion we have no quarrel. Our immediate concern is not with the question whether individual justices who may hold gold-clause bonds should have been disqualified. On the contrary we believe that the court was called upon to render an opinion. But in doing so the justices would have rendered a service by stating whether and to what extent they hold securities whose values might have been affected by their decision.

Nor is this all. We believe that the probable existence of a pecuniary interest on the part of the justices in a case on which they must none the less pass points to the need of federal and state laws which will make it obligatory upon all judges to disclose at regular intervals their personal security holdings. This practice would protect the judiciary from suspicion and embarrassment as it would the public from the possibility of hidden reasons for judicial bias.

Issues and Men

England's New Ship Subsidies

THE news that England has again followed the bad example of other nations and passed an act subsidizing the owners of tramp steamers to the tune of $10,000,000 in 1935 is enough to make the leaders of the historic Manchester School turn in their graves. This is not parceling out money to steamships with regular sailings like the White Star-Cunard or the Royal Mail or the Castle Line. It is giving government aid to those venturesome shipowners who from time immemorial have had their ships range the seas picking up a cargo here, a half-load there, sometimes going around the world before returning to their home port. The very man who engineered this subsidy, Walter Runciman, president of the Board of Trade, bears the name of a family long famous in this sort of ocean trade. For at least one hundred and fifty years Runcimans have sent their ships out over the seven seas and kept pace with all the changes, from lumbering old armed brigs and East Indiamen, to clippers, to steamships, and now to oil-burning cargo vessels. His father and grandfather would have been shocked indeed at the suggestion that all the taxpayers of Great Britain should help them out in their trade. They could stand on their own feet, thank you. They had built up a magnificent organization, decade after decade. They had great technical skill and vast knowledge of world maritime conditions and knew all the tricks of the trade. That was the British government's chief reason for seeing that the technical staffs of these great shipping companies were not destroyed by the World War; it wanted them on hand after the war to pick up all the trade the Germans were to lose. Only in our own clipper-ship era from 1840 to 1861 were these British shipowners seriously challenged. Then the Yankee skippers outsailed them and out-bargained them, and turned their ships around in foreign ports in half the time of anybody else. For generations, of course, there has been real competition from Scandinavian shipowners, among whom, also, the continuing knowledge of the sea and its trade passed, in accumulating measure, from one generation to the other.

But now England has fallen from grace and gone a step farther than most other countries. We have built up line after line of regular passenger and freight ships by what are falsely called mail subsidies, paying ridiculous sums—no less than $300,000 in one case for the transportation of four pounds of mail—to lines for which there was no demand, which cannot possibly stand on their own feet, and which on the existing evidence will never be able to stand on their own feet. Our Postmaster General has finally revolted against this barefaced "honest graft" and a new outright subsidy scheme is scheduled to appear in Congress any day. We now pay out annually some $25,000,000, France pays about the same amount, Italy $15,000,000, and Japan $5,000,000. Just what Hitler is paying out to keep the German lines from collapsing it is hard to discover, particularly as there are constant shifts in the set-up; the North German Lloyd and Hamburg-American companies, after having been firmly married a year or so ago, have just been half-divorced. The British government has heretofore been content to advance money for shipbuilding, as it did years ago for the Mauretania and the Lusitania and is doing now for the Queen Mary. Of course Mr. Runciman's aid to tramps carries with it the stipulation that hopelessly antiquated freighters are to be scrapped and new and speedy ones built, and the owners have had to promise to cooperate for the good of all. But there the fact is—the National Government, which denounces everything socialistic, has begun to mix in private business in a way which usually leads to rigid control if not eventually to government ownership.

How insane it all is! Under the pretext that we must have a great merchant fleet to stand behind our navy in the next war we crowd the seas with ships that are economically unnecessary and, as Congressional inquiry has shown, are extravagantly and inefficiently run. The American taxpayers pay the bill. This in turn arouses bitter feelings in England, France, Germany, Italy, and Japan, and the shipowners in those countries demand that their governments be just as "wise" and "helpful" as the American—and then their subsidies go up. It is all part of the world's crazy nationalism, so tremendously fostered by the World War. The pretense that American goods must be carried in American bottoms, French in French, English in English, is pure bunkum. We had no merchant fleet from 1865 to 1917, and not thrice in that long period were we really pinched by high rates and a dearth of available ships. Such losses as we had in 1914-15 would bear an interesting relationship to the sums we have squandered needlessly since we built our war fleet and began our subsidy policy.

The most serious feature of this kind of government aid is that it creates vested interests which speedily become intrenched and very powerful. Mr. Runciman, of course, assures the British public that this aid to shipping is only for a short time, that it is necessary because of disturbed world trade conditions. But those shipowners who profit will never willingly admit that trade conditions have become right for them again or that they can get on without Treasury aid. Our American shipbuilders and shipping men are already a dangerously powerful crowd—with the army and navy squarely behind them. Our tariff vested interests have dictated our economic life ever since 1880. England, too, will find how difficult it is to stop giving out government pap, if it ever tries to end its present tariffs. As to the ships, the Allies found no difficulty whatever in handling the fleets of the world as one in 1917-18, and supplying to every country, allied or neutral, its needed quota. Would not sane and sound statesmen bring about a similar pooling—plus a wise limitation of fleets—at least until this world economic crisis is over?

Isabel Garrison Villard

A Cartoon by LOW

BUT ADOLF HAS SOME MAPS, TOO.

Pursuing a Prevarication

Washington, February 18

AT the time the automobile code was amended by the President, Mr. Richberg told the newspapermen that labor had been consulted. But beyond this generalization he would not go. Labor leaders, in particular Mr. Green, denied that they had been consulted. In reporting on this I assumed that Mr. Richberg was referring to some letters written by labor representatives to the White House as though they constituted a consultation and I called this a prevarication. I have been taken to task for this by Mr. Richberg, and quite rightly so. If there was a prevarication it was not Mr. Richberg's, and I withdraw the word as applying to him.

Mr. Richberg had been authorized to announce that labor had been consulted, and he believed it had. He believed the person consulted was William Green, president of the A. F. of L. With this fact to elucidate, I approached Mr. Green. He repeated his denial that he had been consulted. I explained that somewhere there was either a misunderstanding or a prevarication. Was it not possible, I asked, that the President had sent someone to him to tell him about the automobile code, and that he had consulted with this person not knowing it was an official consultation? No, said Mr. Green. What had happened was that he had discussed with Miss Perkins what labor wanted in the automobile code if it were extended. But it was not a consultation on the settlement which was adopted. Mr. Green was not told any of the terms of that settlement. He actually waited about, expecting to be called to the White House for consultation, and ultimately he learned the terms after the President had himself made the settlement and let it be announced.

Since Miss Perkins was out of town during the weekend, I could not question her. But from reliable quarters I learn that Mr. Green's account of his conference with her is correct. He met with her on Monday. He told her that labor would accept a forty-hour week, and time and a half for over time above forty hours. It wanted the merit clause expunged. It wanted the abolition of the Wolman board. Miss Perkins took these views to Mr. Richberg, who was running the negotiations with the automobile manufacturers. The day the code expired Miss Perkins had not heard from Mr. Richberg and tried to reach him by telephone. She called his office, she called wherever she thought he might be reached, she left word that she was trying to reach him. But Mr. Richberg did not telephone Miss Perkins. And that evening, after a reception at the White House, Miss Perkins herself learned the terms of the settlement from a newspaperman who questioned her as she was leaving. Not only was Mr. Green not consulted, but Miss Perkins herself was not consulted. And Miss Perkins later bore Mr. Green out in his assertion that his talks with her were not a consultation on the terms of the settlement.

Since this discussion between Mr. Green and Miss Perkins was the only official contact Mr. Green had, and since he had no opportunity to say whether he would accept the terms as finally adopted, it remains a prevarication to say that he was consulted. Who is author of the prevarication? Certainly not Miss Perkins. I have already absolved Mr. Richberg. But Mr. Richberg says he was authorized to make the announcement, so the prevaricator may be the person who gave that authorization. He did not tell me who it was, and I shall not press the pursuit any farther. It may turn out to be just one of those "misunderstandings." Mr. Green having told Miss Perkins what labor wanted, Miss Perkins having told Mr. Richberg, Mr. Richberg having told the President, the President may have felt sufficiently informed of labor's views. He even may have considered that labor had been consulted. But when it was announced that a settlement had been reached, and that labor had been consulted, the public was given the impression that labor had been consulted about the settlement. It was not. It is worth noting again that the President at his press conference the day after the settlement said nothing about a consultation that week. He referred simply to the month-old letters which had made labor's position plain to him.

* * * * *

In other words, the President had not bothered to consult labor about the settlement, and the fact is that he was in a position to disregard the American Federation of Labor. He had before him the results of the elections of the Wolman board. These make a bad showing for the unions. By February 14, out of 66,122 votes, the A. F. of L. had registered only 2,596, which is not to be explained away by the fact that the plants chosen for the early elections were the ones where the unions were weak or by the order of the A. F. of L. that its men should not participate. There are extenuating circumstances for the unions. For instance, the ballots are so made out that a vote for the union as such is not possible, the choice must be for individuals. And each ballot has on the corner a number which is supposedly torn off by the election officer. But the men believe that the number is used for identification, and that they will be punished if they vote the union ticket.

But the real truth is that the A. F. of L. has let the automobile industry go by default. Whatever organization work it has done has been timorous and dilatory. Only last week did it come to charter a federal international for automobile workers, and it went about this as if no lessons can ever be learned by old-time labor officialdom. Instead of allowing the new international to choose its own officers, it provided that provisional officers should be chosen by the Federation. And worse than that, instead of going out for a straight industrial union, it carefully separated machinists and maintenance men and kept them in craft unions. Here are two incredible blunders, which might discourage anyone, and certainly the President, about the ability of the A. F. of L. to cope with the problem of organizing labor in the America of today.

Nor is this a lone instance. The situation in steel would be humorous if it were not tragic. The tiny Amalgamated Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers' union, headed by Michael F. Tighe, has excommunicated the only lively membership of unions in the industry. It is not a case of the tail wagging the dog, but of the tail cutting off the dog. Tighe's little union, with perhaps 5,000 members (and at its peak with not more than 9,000), has dismissed lodges whose membership last spring was between 75,000 and 90,000. Tighe's conduct is according to the old principle of self-interest, for the new lodges would oust him the first moment they had a chance. Now he nestles back in the comfort of his sovereignty and defies even the Federation to do anything about it. The rebellious lodges rushed to Washington for last week's meeting of the A. F. of L. council, as though the Federation might somehow be interested not in formal affairs but in getting the steel industry organized. But out of eighteen council members only three voted for a clean-up, with the establishment of a new industrial union which relegated Tighe to a subordinate status.

John Lewis is interested in industrial unionism; so is President Green. The council set up a committee to deal with the problem, but it named A. O. Wharton of the machinists, by the nature of things an enemy of the industrial union, and Dan Tobin of the teamsters, who always is fighting to save his men from being absorbed by the brewery workers, and these two were charged to work with Lewis for a settlement. This move naturally failed, and now Green is to find a solution alone. There is a chance that he may discover someone around whom the rebel lodges will rally, and that Tighe can be induced to take some face-saving job, but it is no foregone conclusion. In any event time will be lost. The time to strike, if there is to be a strike, would be now, both in the steel and automobile industries. The best to be hoped for in steel is action in the autumn. And by then the company unions will have had two years to establish themselves. The same delay is being invited in the automobile industry. Mr. Green will address a big meeting in Detroit on February 23, but officially he still denies that the A. F. of L. will ratify a strike. The peak season in automobiles is nearing an end, and the companies can breathe freely. At the worst the A. F. of L. can provoke strikes in the auto-parts and assembly plants, but it will be too late to do great harm to earnings. By another year the company unions will be still more in favor, and their growth will be all the easier for the feeling now prevalent in the district that they are being sponsored by the government.

The A. F. of L. council meeting did not rise to the crying tasks before it. At least half its time was spent on the old wrangles over jurisdiction. Lewis and Green were actually chided for having attacked Mr. Richberg and appearing to be hostile to the Administration. The mentality of last year survives that the Federation somehow is part of the Administration, and is telling it where to go. So organized labor still clings to the running board of the New Deal, despite the face-slaps of the last month.

What this means is that unless rank-and-file disturbances break out, as they did last year, and set things in motion which develop a great natural momentum, the role of the A. F. of L. in wielding economic power for industrial workers has already pretty well played out. Industrial unionism was only recognized at San Francisco after a struggle, and then with no enthusiasm. For all practical purposes the field has been abandoned in both automobiles and steel, and even the gains made in forming an industrial union in the rubber industry are being sacrificed by inaction. If these three fields are utterly lost, industrial unionism is lost with it, and only the craft unions remain. And by that token the great mass of industrial workers will be surrendered to company unions and a set-up which is one of the essentials of fascism. A chance remains that Congress will play Santa Claus for labor in the way that the President had been expected to do. It might pass the Wagner bill, even though the White House has declined to sponsor it. But the Federation is in want of a capable legislative agent, and cannot pretend to have organized its legislative efforts any more wisely than its affairs in automobiles and steel.

R. G. S.

A Talk with Phil La Follette

By LOUIS ADAMIC

Madison, Wisconsin

WHEN I visited him in the last days of January, Philip La Follette had been not quite a month in office in his second term as Governor of Wisconsin, and he was confronted by a difficult situation. There were of course the pressing problems of unemployment, taxation, and security for the farmer. There was the old question of public utilities. There was the immediate necessity of doing something about the school system, badly crippled by lowered appropriations during the Democratic regime. There was the plank in the Progressive Party's platform, on which Phil had been elected, for virtually outlawing company unions in Wisconsin; and "no La Follette ever broke a platform pledge."

Phil, I gathered, had very definite ideas on all these matters and several others coming up for consideration, but both houses of the legislature were controlled by conservative anti-La Follette Democrats and Republicans. The senate, in fact, was preponderantly anti-La Follette. And a fight between the young Governor and the lawmakers was just around the corner. Phil was at his desk in the Capitol fourteen, fifteen hours a day, overworked but in a cheerful mood. "In six weeks or so," he said, smiling, "we'll probably see what turn things will take." I surmised, not so much from what he said as the way he said it, that if the legislature decided to buck him and his Progressive program, he would go to the people, make a swing around the state, and deliver half a dozen speeches a day, as was the wont of his father—whose portrait faces him as he sits at his desk in the executive chamber—in similar situations. The legislature, in all likelihood, will buck him, and there is scant doubt that Wisconsin will be a very interesting state this spring, to say nothing of the rest of Phil's term as governor.

Meanwhile Phil is calm about it all, rather deliberately so, curbing his energy, ambition, impatience, and fighting proclivities, and—unlike other Progressives in Madison, whose views I reported last week—is not inclined to discuss 1936 or 1940, or anything else as remote and, at the same time, as specific as that. He is, as a matter of fact, not especially eager to talk about anything in particular. "There's been much too much talking in recent years about everything," he said—to quote him perhaps a bit freely.

He continued: "The country's been flooded with words and speeches, ballyhoo and blah, ideas and resolutions, theories and writings of all sorts, which for the most part have not clarified but only confused matters. Most of them have been no more related to the practical, urgent problems we face than is the metaphysical issue of how many spirits can dance on the point of a needle. . . . Understand, I'm not an anti-theorist; I'm not against ideas. I do my share of theorizing. Theory, of course, is necessary, but theories, discussion, resolutions are empty, futile, provocative of wasteful dissension if they do not soon lead to practical, constructive action. The important, the practical thing about the Wisconsin Idea has been—and still is—that it produced the Progressive movement, which has been—and is—dedicated to action, to doing things for the people, making for progress, not on some distant tomorrow but now, as soon as humanly possible; or perhaps I should say that the Wisconsin Idea and the Progressive movement developed almost simultaneously, one because of the other. It is no accident that nearly every forward-looking, concrete achievement in public affairs during the past thirty years has had its origin in action in Wisconsin. . . . Today, more than ever before in this country, we need action, the right kind. And we're going to have it in this state, in one way or another."

The manner in which he said this seemed to imply that he believed action was necessary in Wisconsin for the sake both of Wisconsin and of the United States. A while later, as our conversation continued, I became sure that this was what he meant to suggest. I gathered that his immediate ambition was to do things in Wisconsin along the old La Follette lines which would continue to make Wisconsin an example for other states and the country as a whole. Just what he would do or try to do, and how, he appeared unwilling to say. "There's been too much talk already," he repeated, smiling.

But he spoke freely of things in general.

He said that everything depended upon recovery, and the present effort for recovery on the part of the federal government was a race between time and the translation of federal plans into action. Too much delay might even bring collapse of a national effort for recovery, which might throw back upon states or sectional groups of states the burden of maintaining our civilization; he hoped, he hinted, to achieve things in Wisconsin during the next two—or the next four—years which would serve the other commonwealths as a model, a plan of action.

"Action" was a frequent word in his conversation. Somewhere in this connection he said rather suddenly: "Understand, I'm no soft, middle-of-the-road liberal. I'm a Progressive." And the vivid, sincere expression of his youthful face, with its high, straight forehead under the thick, graying pompadour, its shrewd nose, lively blue eyes behind spectacles, and quick, mobile mouth, seemed to add that he believed in progress with everything in him; that there must be progress, progress through aggressive, deliberate action; and there was nothing, or almost nothing, at which he would stop to achieve progress. We sat in his office at the Capitol. The night before he and Mrs. La Follette had given a simple party in the executive residence, during which some of us had become involved in a discussion of various political struggles and horrors in contemporary Europe. Phil now remarked to me: "I didn't cringe when you described the tortures inflicted upon revolutionaries in Yugoslavia."

Phil and I sat in silence after this and I looked at him for several moments, wondering what he meant. On the train from Chicago I had heard a man who told me he was a Milwaukee manufacturer refer to him by an unprintable name. The cab-driver who took me from the depot in Madison, when I asked him what he thought of the new governor, had said, "Oh, Phil's a great guy!" I had been hearing for years that Phil might become President some day. That he is ambitious one cannot doubt, looking at him; nor that he is a young man to be reckoned with.

Some time ago John Strachey declared in New York that he had interviewed Phil, I don't know just when, and that Phil's remarks to him had led him to the conclusion that Phil was a fascist—a potential American fascist leader. I mentioned this to Phil and said: "Some of us in New York were disturbed by Strachey's idea of you. What do you say about it?"

Phil smiled. "The trouble with these fellows from abroad is that they come here and look at America with eyes accustomed to pictures in the European pattern. They come to Wisconsin because someone in the East has told them about us here in the Middle West, and they visit me. They inquire about the peasantry in Wisconsin, and I tell them we have in this state a lot of farmers, whom we don't call peasants and who, I think, are somewhat different from the peasants in Europe. Well, in what way are they different? And I explain that our farmers here in Wisconsin own the land, some quite a bit of it, others less; and own pretty good homes and implements and farm machinery, trucks and flivvers, and so on. Whereupon my visitors from afar, experiencing a flash of insight, smile, and I'm told that these farmers are kulaks of course.

"I'm stunned by this; so the next question is about the workers, the class-conscious proletariat. I say that we have some workers in Wisconsin—not many, though—who describe themselves as class-conscious proletarians, in the European sense. The overwhelming majority of them, however, are just workers, citizens, not especially class-conscious or anything like that. In fact, I venture to say, they're not class-conscious at all. Most of them are Progressives. We get along fine. They're fine people. I know hundreds of them. They were here the other day for the inauguration, thousands of workers of all kinds. I was inaugurated governor, but it was their affair as much as mine. After the ceremony at the Capitol we had a reception at the executive residence, and they came and we shook hands and talked and had a great time.

"No, I say to my European visitors, most of our workers are not class-conscious in their sense, but like our farmers, who are in danger of losing their land and homes, and our teachers, whose salaries have been reduced, and our small-business and professional people, whose income has dribbled away, they're sharply conscious of the fact that they're being robbed by the system under which we live; and I add that I see no reason why I or any other radical—for I am a radical—should try to make them class-conscious. The idea of classes has no vital tradition in our American past, and in my opinion any effort to make them class-conscious would only confuse them, delay the whole thing, produce endless dissension among many who now have nothing against each other; for we Americans, I insist, are different from the Europeans. America is different from Europe. We in the North here skipped feudalism entirely, while Europe still has a terrible psychological hangover from it. For hundreds of years we were the freest people the sun ever shone upon. The frontier has influenced our minds, our manner in personal intercourse, our political methods. We're a democratic people if there ever was one. But there is, as I say, this sharp consciousness on the part of multitudes of our people that they are being ruined by the existing economic system, and I for one believe that to organize this consciousness is basically all we need as a start to bring drastic changes in our social-economic structure which will be in line with our American experience and tradition.

"I usually say all this to my brilliant visitors from abroad, and they, with their eyes used to gaze upon things and figures in the Old World pattern, swiftly decide that I'm a fascist. Fascism of some sort is not impossible in this country, but if I have any authority to say so, it will not develop out of the Wisconsin Idea and the Progressive movement. . . ."

A pause.

"Of course," Phil continued, "we are not Socialists. We Progressives don't agree with certain things in the Socialist program at all. But that, I maintain, does not make us fascists. The Socialists want collective ownership of all the means of production and distribution. If this idea were carried into action, our farmers (a farm is a 'means of production') would be deprived of the ownership of their farms and homes. They would become employees of the government. . . . We Progressives believe in the right of men and women to own their homes, their farms, and their places of employment. What we believe to be the curse of our present system is the greed of corporate and absentee owners. Our aim is to restore to those who work on the farm and in the city the ownership that has been wrung from them by the exploitation of private monopoly.

"In those great utilities of common necessity which cannot function efficiently except in centralized organizations we recognize the necessity of public ownership. Progressives believe that municipalities and other units of government should be encouraged to own and operate those utilities.

"We recognize the basic law of the margin of diminishing returns in size. Organizations, whether publicly or privately owned and operated, can be so large that their very size works against their efficient and satisfactory operation.

"There is no alternative to conscious distribution of income. To this end the Socialists and Communists advocate complete nationalization. Reactionaries advocate 'everybody for himself and the devil take the hindmost,' relying solely on the lure of private profit to entice investment in capital enterprises to diffuse the unexpendable income now received by the holders of great fortunes.

"The purely private investment of capital worked while frontiers still beckoned for development. But it is a failure when the great enterprises demanding investment are in the realm of housing, slum-clearance, education, and other phases of life here at home. Purely private capital will invest horizontally, but it will not invest perpendicularly. It will raise the standard of living on frontiers, but not at home.

"Nationalization of all property breaks down with the unmanageable task of administration. It is not theory that fails, but the definite limitation of the capacity of the human brain. We're a vast country, very complicated.

"The purely private investment of capital has failed. That failure has produced untold misery and suffering in this land of abundance. We Progressives hold that the alternative is not nationalization of all property or adherence to private monopoly. It is rather the assumption by government of the distribution of national income; or, in other words, the clear recognition of a new social obligation of property.

"The methods by which that distribution of the national income can be accomplished are not by any means limited to a single measure. There are the income tax, the inheritance tax, public ownership of necessary utilities such as light, heat, power, certain phases of transportation, central banks. But the basic law that Progressives recognize must be obeyed is the limitation of the capacity of human beings to administer units, whether privately or publicly owned, that are too large.

"It is one thing for the government to assume the function of distribution of income to support purchasing power and quite another to assume the administrative responsibility for millions of farms, every corner grocery store, and hundreds of thousands of factories."

How, I asked him, would or could all this change be brought about? He was not ready to particularize. I asked him if he didn't think any action in the direction of socialization would straightway collide with the Constitution, or rather with those who consider the federal and state constitutions static instruments designed to perpetuate the existing social order.

In reply Phil proceeded to give me his views of the Constitution as a factor in the matter, which in the main were a restatement of what he had declared in his brief inaugural address a few weeks before:

"The constitutions of this state and of the United States, which I swore to uphold on taking my office, are to me living documents. They embody the principle of American government. To preserve that principle is the supreme duty of our time. It is essential that we recognize the fact that this American principle of popular government, and the constitutions conceived to secure it, were not designed to sustain any particular economic system. The assumption made at one time that under the Constitution we were committed to the perpetuation of Negro slavery was the tragic error which produced the Civil War.

"Our paramount task is to maintain the kind of government which had its birth on this continent, which it took a Revolutionary War to establish, a Civil War to preserve, and a century and a half of day-to-day work on the part of countless men and women to put into operation as a functioning instrument—an instrument for realizing the great human end for which it was designed, the material and spiritual well-being of our people.

"The founders of this country made their intentions clear, 'to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.' These, to my mind, are the chief concepts of our fundamental law, and it is our privilege today to give vitality—through action—to these concepts. It is our duty to apply them to the conditions of our time, and so prove loyal, in the truest sense, to our traditions. . . . This is the challenge of our times."

[This is the second of two articles on the La Follettes by Mr. Adamic. Next week he will report on the possibilities of a strike in the rubber industry.]

Men Who Make America's Gods

By LEFT WING

THE morning newspaper in a big city runs to about thirty pages, dividing its space in somewhat these proportions: news, ten pages; finance, seven pages; sports, five pages; advertisements, two pages; theater, music, and the movies, two pages; society, one page; shipping, one page; radio, one page; and a page devoted to women. In summer the amount devoted to sports is usually augmented by a page or two borrowed from other departments.

The sports section is one of the most important in the American newspaper of 1935. You can understand how important it is by observing that whereas a music critic with one assistant takes care of the activities of the concert field, a dramatic critic with a dramatic editor covers all openings even in Manhattan, and three or four competent or incompetent men compose the financial section, sport needs a staff all its own. An editor, an assistant editor, make-up men, reporters, specialists, and of course, a columnist are attached to every big newspaper. Whether it is situated in New York or Denver, the men in the sports department are often the best paid on the sheet and not infrequently they are the best writers, or at least, because of the latitude allowed them, the most amusing. The Great Names who run columns syndicated over the country have an enormous influence, their thoughts are household words, and during the height of the football season or at the time of a championship fight their mail rivals Mr. Farley's.

These are the men who make America's gods. Our gods are the heroes of sport—the one and only Babe, the perennial Mr. Tilden, the Deans of the College of Hard Knocks and Three-Base Hits, the track or hockey or golf sensation of the particular season. They are unimportant to you? Possibly, but remember that to millions and millions of your fellow-citizens who turn first to the sports pages when they open their newspaper they are the breath of life. The World Court? Unemployment? Rising taxes? Yeah, but what about the Babe, izzy gonga play nex' year or not? Yes, these are our gods, more important than Father Coughlin, more important than Roosevelt himself. Or even, yes, even than Rudy Vallée. And here are the men who make them.

Since the death of W. O. McGeehan, the head of the profession is Henry Grantland Rice. He graduated from Vanderbilt, where he captained the baseball team in 1901; after ten years on Southern newspapers he came north just before the war with an ability to turn out light verse to order, prose that at times came close to poetry, an unquenchable enthusiasm for things athletic, and a background in sports remarkable in a reporter. Certain phrases coined in his more ecstatic moments are now sporting classics; it was

Rice who called the famous Rockne back field "The Four Horsemen," and nicknamed Grange "the Galloping Ghost."

A first-class newspaperman with a real flair for sports himself—he now shoots a low eighty at golf—he brought something far more valuable to the racket, namely, an inability to take sides on any question. For twenty years he has managed to remain impervious to the more violent hypocrisies of sport as practiced in Anglo-Saxon countries. The evils and abuses of the present system, which came to a peak in 1929 and have not yet by any means vanished, troubled him not at all. As the years rolled along he developed the technique of sitting on the point of a pin until it became a fine art with him. Whenever any controversy arose you could be sure that Grantland Rice would see both sides of the question. And embrace each with equal fervor. "While it is true that...yet, on the other hand..." His sports series in the movies and his syndicated column, filled every day with reams of nothing, have brought him universal respect and an income tax on $232,000 a year. R.I.P. Henry Grantland Rice.

With less reputation and more ability, Stanley Woodward of the New York Herald Tribune is one of the most improved sports writers of recent years. He played tackle at Amherst, had a long training in Boston, the home of good sports writing, and is today the most versatile man on the big time. He can turn out a thoroughly competent story on track, football, hockey, golf, rowing, or any branch of athletics; in recent years his work has gained in vigor and virility; and he has imparted a bite to his stuff that makes it the best of its kind in town. It was Woodward who coined the term "ivy colleges" to describe those institutions long on tradition but short on intellectual honesty like Yale, Harvard, and especially Princeton, which refuse to bid openly in the market for their footballists, but purchase them quietly on the side.

Paul Gallico of the News has ideas, he can write, and his column is burnished by a fine sense of humor. Like most daily stunters his work is uneven; when he's good no one is any better. The thing he did on the death of McGeehan was not only the finest of all epitaphs, it was the sort of thing McGeehan himself would have liked to write; and his interview with Helen Wills Moody in San Francisco last winter was one of the best pieces of sports reporting of 1934. An old Columbia oarsman, Gallico takes the trouble to learn something about those sports with which he is unfamiliar, and when he goes out to cover an event has an idea what it's all about.

There is hardly an honest boxing writer in the game. Dan Parker of the Mirror is one of the few. This small-town boy who showed the city slickers exactly how crooked the fight racket was knows boxing better than anyone, has a tremendous following, and deserves it. His verbal fisticuffs with James J. Johnston of the Madison Square hierarchy are classics. As becomes a Scotchman, Kerr Petrie of the Tribune knows golf and is one of the two best men on that sport in the United States. Richards Vidmer of the same sheet is an able all-round reporter who will admit under cross-examination that he was the model for the hero in Katherine Brush's best-seller of several years ago, "Young Man of Manhattan." Also in the collegiate vein are Laurence Perry of the Consolidated Press and George Trevor of the Sun. The latter is still a sophomore in college, but the former is a sophomore in high school given to lyrical outbursts, such as: "You all know how Notre Dame always goes to mass before every game, reverently, quietly, and as a matter of course. Years ago, it may be recalled, when Princeton had beaten Yale after a period of defeat running over four years, the eleven in the dressing-room after the game, stained with blood and mud, lifted their faces and sang the Doxology." This sacred moment when the sons of Old Nassau had their faces lifted was the only time on record that Mr. Trevor was out-trevored. He writes chiefly of football, on which he is an expert of long standing, and is read eagerly by infantile-minded college graduates of the metropolitan area, his rococo style fitting in well with the absurdities of intercollegiate football today. See below:

"For his swan song belligerent-jawed Bill will have a squad after his own heart, a bunch of untried novices to varsity football. These fiery Hotspurs champing at the bit will find Roper a magnetic, appealing taskmaster whose hard-boiled patina screens a kindly disposition." The fiery Hotspurs won only a single game, against Amherst, that year, but Mr. Trevor was undaunted. "Football is in the very air you breathe at Princeton. Those russet meadows, golden brown under the bright autumn sun, furnish an ideal patina for this greatest of games." Bismarck and Napoleon, Foch and Hindenburg, are allowed to be compared to his gods, while analogies of war are scattered through his columns. "The mud-encrusted Eli regulars troop in out of the wind-lashed rain, their cleats clattering like the hoofbeats of a cavalry squadron on cobblestones." And he suggests that "as the mothers of the world are looking toward Geneva for a solution of the war boggy, so the mothers of America are looking to E. K. Hall, chairman of the football rules committee, for an answer to the question, 'Can football be made reasonably safe for schoolboys?'" And it was Mr. Trevor who pointed out how Freddy Loeser, Yale center, ran behind the goal posts and planted a kiss, "the French accolade of valor," on the blushing cheeks of touchdown-scoring Albie Booth.

This is indeed the stuff to feed the troops. Do the troops like it? They eat it, for Mr. Trevor is by all odds the favorite sports writer of the college graduate in the East, a fairly emphatic indictment of the mentality of the average holder of an A. B. degree from an American university. He also writes on track in winter and golf in summer, but football is his specialty, his forte, his love; and at any given moment in April or May he is liable to burst forth with an analysis of the Notre Dame freshman team of 1940, with first names, weights, and ages of every player.

At the other pole is Joe Williams, sports editor of the New York World-Telegram. In addition to various other duties he syndicates a column that is never dull, for he knows sport and makes his own decisions. Mr. Williams is the hardest-working sports writer in the game; possibly his standard would be higher if he did not work so hard. Also on the Telegram is Charles Parker, former Dartmouth football star and rival of Mr. Vidmer ■ the hero of "Young Man of Manhattan."

John Kieran of the Times has a column unlike anyone else's, one that can invariably be depended upon for entertainment. He is distinguished from the majority of his colleagues by an education which he proves is no more a handicap in sports writing than in other walks of life. He sandwiches traces of a Gallic humor into his daily work, which he keeps to an amazingly high standard, avoiding the hated—by the Times—first-person pronoun in a deft manner.

"But he knew he had a good team?"

"Sure," said Mr. Thomas."

This sort of thing would be terrible by anyone except the light-handed Mr. Kieran. On the Times all sports are adequately covered by an enormous staff of specialists with a genius for being boring. The pages of the Tribune, less accurate but far more readable, are commanded by lovable old George ("my own college, Union,") Daley. He is so lovable that at times he is almost unbearable. His specialty is horses, but with no one to stop him he exposes himself twice weekly in a column. G. F. T. Ryall of the Sun is the leading turf authority; the most amusing is the talented Damon Runyon, whose column is syndicated to the Hearst papers throughout the country, although occasionally one wishes he would not reserve quite so much of his talent for the slick-paper magazines. Other Hearst headlines include Jack Koefed, whose "Thrills in Sport" are often more thrilling to writer than reader, and Bill Corum, another columnist who would probably not deny, if you pressed him with it, that he was the hero of Katherine Brush's best-seller, "Young Man of Manhattan."

John Lardner, son of the mighty Ring, runs a column syndicated in the Post which is good but not as good as it will be if he sticks around longer. The Post formerly had two so-called experts, Robert Harron, a minor-league Grantland Rice, and John R. Tunis, an unhappy highbrow among the lowbrows. Both have been unemployed since the paper was purchased by its present owner. Alan Gould, sports editor of the Associated Press, knows most games, and thanks to a large staff gives adequate coverage, although the work of his boys is often mediocre. Among the best sports men on the large associations is Henry McLemore of the United Press, who adds life and vitality to everything he touches. Outside New York Bill Cunningham of the Boston Post and Ed R. Hughes of the San Francisco Chronicle deserve mention among others for vigorous writing and thinking on their feet.

These, then, are a few of the men who make America's gods. Any one of them overnight can turn an obscure half-back on a college eleven or a winning distance runner into a national celebrity. The cumulative effect of the writings of men like Abramson on track and Woodward on hockey has helped sell these sports to the clients; they could do the same thing with rope-skipping if they wished. That rackets like wrestling and prize fighting have not been sent to their grave long ago is due to the fact that most sports writers who cover them and more than one sports editor prefer to sell themselves to the authorities in charge.

There is probably more downright graft passed out in the sticks where salaries are smaller and the gravy more necessary, but even in the big time the rank and file are not always incorruptible. The honest ones as often as not are lazy, sitting around explaining that Broun was once a sports writer, so what the hell, hey? Salaries range from $750 or $1,000 a week for the leading columnists to $250 or $300 for names like Trevor's or Woodward's, and on down to $40 or $50 for a copy reader to check their mistakes and do the dirty work on the desk.

Although sport is a comparatively simple phase of modern existence and hardly needs years of experience, study, and background, as do other departments in a newspaper, even among the leaders in the field there are few who know their subjects as W. J. Henderson knows his; since the death of Pegler there is no one as vital as George Jean Nathan or as amusing as Robert Benchley, and hardly anyone who understands sport the way Lawrence Gilman understands music. With the exceptions noted earlier, the majority have conventionally grooved minds quite incapable of original thinking, while only a mere handful of them have any independence and still fewer possess the slightest degree of moral courage, or are willing to write of things as they see them and not as the customers want. Hired as specialists at large salaries, with more freedom than anyone else on the paper, they are a gang doing an intellectual goose-step, and their best efforts amount to a dozen really good pieces a year. No wonder the gods they make for America are nitwits like themselves.

PERSONAL. To Westbrook Pegler. Please come back to Sportland. All will be forgiven. FATHER AND THE BOYS.

Congress Discovers the Class Struggle

By MAXWELL S. STEWART

Washington, February 13

ALTHOUGH the President's security program is still in the early stages of legislative consideration, it has already become apparent that the principal opposition will not come from embittered diehards who fear lest the idle become "demoralized." Many who took this position a few years ago are now pleading for a genuine national plan of unemployment insurance as a means of guaranteeing business stability; the remainder are strangely inarticulate. To judge by developments thus far, the attack will be almost exclusively from the left, from the ranks of the common people who have been angered or bewildered by the chasm which exists between the President's words and his deeds.

The press has played up the rather pathetic but significant efforts of the supporters of the Townsend plan to substitute their pet nostrum for the old-age provisions in the Wagner-Lewis bill. While they appear to have been laughed out of court on this particular occasion, every Congressman fervently prays that their plan may never reach the floor of the House. If it does, only a brand-new set of Congressional spinal columns can prevent its passage.

On the real threat from the left, however, the press has been strangely silent. During the past week Washington has been treated to the unique spectacle of two Congressional committees conducting hearings on what are essentially rival measures. For strategic reasons the Wagner-Lewis bill was not referred to the Labor Committee of the House, as was normally expected, but was intrusted to the powerful and conservative Ways and Means Committee. The hearings of this committee have been well covered. But when the Labor Committee, irritated to the point of filing a unanimous protest against the Administration's steam-roller tactics, instituted counter-hearings on Representative Lundeen's Workers' Unemployment and Social Insurance Bill, the press exercised its traditional freedom by ignoring it. And in so doing it has overlooked one of the most remarkable social developments of recent years.

Beyond the general subject of inquiry the two hearings have had little in common. Even the setting has seemed to accentuate the basic differences between the conflicting security proposals. As befitted its rank, the Ways and Means Committee conducted its hearings in the caucus room of the new House office building, where the members of the committee were ensconced on a semi-circular platform, aloof and remote from the crowd. Witnesses were at a physical disadvantage, standing below the committee with their backs to the audience. Though there was little pretense at dignity, the atmosphere was heavy. In the caucus room of the old House office building, where the Subcommittee on Labor is conducting the hearings on the Lundeen bill, far greater informality, even friendliness, was displayed. Members of the committee, secretaries, witnesses, reporters, and interested spectators were seated rather indiscriminately around a table, yet there was an earnestness that contrasted with the cut-and-dried proceedings of the other hearing.

These distinctions were particularly evident in the testimony. The Ways and Means Committee began by hearing various members of the Administration—Dr. Edwin Witte of the President's Committee on Economic Security, Secretary Perkins, and Harry Hopkins. It also heard Samuel W. Reyburn and Albert D. Hutzler, appearing for the National Retail Dry Goods Association, together with representatives of various civic organizations, proponents of the Townsend plan, and several advocates of the Lundeen bill. Herbert Benjamin, one of the spokesmen of the latter group, was forcibly ejected when he sought to speak more than ten minutes. Much of the testimony was excellent, but it was contradictory and confusing. Across the street, at the other hearing, the witnesses were chiefly workers, farmers, transients, and representatives of the unemployed, with a sprinkling of experts to analyze the technical aspects of the Lundeen bill. Probably never in American history have the underprivileged had a better opportunity to present their case before Congress.

Among the witnesses was a young textile worker from North Carolina who had been blacklisted for union activity. His trip to Washington had been paid for by a collection of pennies, nickels, and dimes from employees in the textile mills. He appeared before the committee without having prepared a written statement, and vanished as suddenly as he had appeared before anyone could discover whether he had funds for the return journey. Though he spoke in the low monotone characteristic of the "poor white" of the South, his voice carried conviction as he described the plight of the textile workers under the New Deal:

In the mill I worked in before the NRA came into effect the weavers ran four looms. Now they run six and eight looms for about the same wages they made on the four looms, and they must get production and quality or they will lose their jobs. . . . And as for the houses the mill company furnishes—just shacks built on a red mud hill, with red mud roads, and in many cases cracks you could throw a cat through. We have to pay an average of 50 cents a week a room for these shacks. . . . In most cases the mills don't have shacks enough to accommodate all their help. There are large families now living in tobacco barns near the mill town because they can't pay the high rent of the private home-owners. . . .

The same twenty-four-pound sack of flour that cost us 50 cents per sack less than two years ago now costs us $1.15. Pinto beans sold at 5 cents a pound less than two years ago; now they sell for 12 cents a pound. Fatback meat was 6 cents a pound . . . now we pay 22 cents a pound. These prices are still going up . . . but we don't see any reports of our wages going up here in North Carolina. . . .

The unemployed in North Carolina are not assured of emergency relief. If we are, we have to dig ditches and bust rocks with a heavy hammer for eight hours a day. We get 30 cents an hour and either we work or we don't get anything to eat. We almost have to fight the gang foreman to get one day's work a week. . . .

The mill bosses don't tell us now that if we join a union they will fire us. But they are firing all the union members they can find out about, for some reasons that would be hard to see with the eye. But they get away with it.

Another representative of the South was Broadus Mitchell, son of one of its best-known educators and himself associate professor of political economy at Johns Hopkins University, who delivered a scorching indictment of the Wagner-Lewis bill as a grudging "compromise with poverty," dominated by "the idea of dearth and the menace of scarcity."

A picture of life in the transients' camps was presented by Joseph Murray, representing the transients' rank-and-file committee. He asserted that the quarters were unsanitary, overcrowded, improperly heated and ventilated, that the food was consistently of poor quality and the medical service inadequate. He spoke bitterly of cash wages of a dollar a week for thirty hours' work, and declared that thousands of transients were kept perpetually on the move in the vain hope of finding better conditions or paying jobs. Three days after his testimony was given, his charges were tragically confirmed by an outbreak of spinal meningitis which claimed eight victims in the Washington transients' camp. The lot of the unemployed seamen as described by Earle Payne of the Marine Workers' Industrial Union is equally desperate. When they are temporarily or permanently out of a job, their only resort is to soup kitchens and flop-houses of the lowest type, where they are frequently terrorized by hired thugs. Payne pointed out that by the very nature of their occupation few seamen would be benefited by a contributory unemployment-insurance system such as is proposed in the Wagner-Lewis bill.

So it went through the list of occupations and professions. The problems of the farmer were graphically portrayed by Andrew Omholt, a member of the United Farmers' League, who showed that an adequate system of social insurance meant a vast increase in the consumption of farm products. Louis Weinstock, speaking for the more than 2,500 A. F. of L. locals which have indorsed the Lundeen bill, declared that the majority of the rank-and-file members of the federation support it despite the opposition of the officials. Elmer Rice, playwright, told the committee that the Lundeen measure is the only one of the pending bills which offers any real protection for authors and writers, and R. M. Sentman made a similar assertion with regard to architects and engineers. Several Negroes testified concerning the discrimination against their race, pointing out not only that their ratio of unemployment was much higher than that of whites, but that the relief given them was consistently lower.

There was no mistaking the bitterness of these witnesses toward the Wagner-Lewis bill. The principal complaint was that it fails to provide for those now in need. Nor was there any faith that the government works program now under consideration would care adequately for this group. In addition, many of the witnesses opposed the federal-state scheme on the grounds that migratory labor would be severely penalized and that state legislation would almost certainly lack uniformity. Other criticisms centered about the limited scope of the bill and the meagerness of its benefits. The tax on payrolls was opposed, both because it would be passed on to the public in higher prices, and because of its dubious constitutionality.

The question of the constitutionality of the rival measures seemed particularly to interest the committee. It appeared to accept the view contained in the brief submitted by Leo J. Linder, which upheld the soundness of the Lundeen bill on the grounds that (1) it represents a proper exercise of the appropriating power of Congress, (2) it involves no unconstitutional delegation of legislative power, and (3) since it is to be financed by a tax on income, it cannot be said to deprive persons of their property without due process of law. The Wagner-Lewis bill was held to be much more open to attack because its payroll tax might be construed as an invasion of the field of intra-state commerce.

In analyzing possible sources of funds to finance the Workers' bill, Dr. Joseph Gilman of the City College of New York declared that if the tax rate used in England had been in operation here in 1928, the federal government would have collected five times as much in income tax as was actually obtained. This would have given an additional $4,250,000,000 to devote to social purposes. Even on the basis of the much lower income of 1933 the increase would have been $1,129,000,000. A flat 25 per cent tax on corporation profits over $5,000 would have yielded $2,600,000,000 in 1928. A similar tax on inheritances would have yielded $888,000,000 instead of the $42,000,000 which was actually collected. In 1933 this tax would have amounted to more than a half-billion dollars. While considerably larger sums could be obtained by increasing the rates in the high brackets in each instance, Dr. Gilman felt that a flat tax on corporation surpluses would be socially more desirable. At 25 per cent such a tax would have yielded nearly ten billion dollars in 1933.

The one-sided nature of the hearings on the Workers' bill does not necessarily mean, of course, that the Labor Committee will report it favorably to the House. But if the hearings have no other effect, they should at least reveal to Congress the essential difference in viewpoint between the business executive and technical economist on one side and the rank-and-file worker on the other. Comparatively few of the workers, it is true, are articulate on the question of security. The testimony revealed that American Federation of Labor officials have frequently gone to great extremes to prevent adequate discussion of this basic issue within the organization. But where such discussion has occurred, labor has almost invariably indorsed the Lundeen bill.

It is difficult to see how anyone could read the testimony which has been given without being convinced of the inadequacy of the Administration's security program. The Wagner-Lewis bill may be actuarially sound and it may represent a great advance over the chaotic measures of relief which have been adopted in the present crisis, but it is a far cry from the security for the men, women, and children of the nation which the President declared last June to be the primary objective of his Administration. The Lundeen bill, on the other hand, may have all the defects which its critics allege, but it has come to symbolize for the underprivileged workers of the country that protection against the vicissitudes of modern life which Mr. Roosevelt declared to be essential. Encouraged by the President's words, the fundamental urge for security, long repressed as radical or un-American, has emerged as one of the most powerful forces of present-day political life. Congress, like the press, can ignore it, but only at the risk of political suicide.

In the Driftway

FROM time to time the Drifter, like every other person to whom writing is a profession, receives a manuscript to read. The author, almost always unknown to him—and to the public at large—begs that he will be so kind as to peruse this little work and advise said author, first, as to the best means of marketing same, and, second, what faults, if any, of style or content it may possess. Like the famous letters which Mark Twain wrote to people who bored him and then never sent, a missive has been composed by the Drifter for this occasion. It reads something like this:

DEAR SIR (or Madam): A glance at your manuscript has convinced me of what I suspected before I even glanced—that it is without merit. If I were without other means of support I should charge you for this opinion a sum commensurate with the years of professional training and practice that enable me to form it. But I give it free. There are, of course several dozen publishers in New York City alone—you will find their names in the telephone book—who will doubtless be only too happy, on receipt of your manuscript accompanied by return postage, to send you a similar opinion.

This letter the Drifter keeps in the left-hand top drawer of his desk and when he has just bought postage for and dispatched one of the unfortunate manuscripts to its author, accompanied by a polite note containing a considerably more Milquetoast version of his opinion of the work and a revelation of how manuscripts reach publishers, he takes it out and reads it through. But it will never be mailed. And in that he suspects that he is no different from ninety-nine out of a hundred literary persons who are often similarly besought.

* * * * *

ONE such letter, however, did actually burn its flaming way through the mails. It was written some sixty years ago by the poet George Boker to his friend, the poet Bayard Taylor. The letter itself, which the Drifter quotes from American Literature for November, 1934, did not contain the poison except as it repeated a speech made by a lady to half a dozen poets, one of them her husband and the others guests in her house. Boker wrote:

Lizzie, Dick, and one or two others and myself were sitting together one night in the rooms of the Pythoness when suddenly she broke forth in her usual oracular manner. "George, you Dick, Bayard, Stedman, Aldrich, Read,* the whole of you youngsters, have all been dreary failures as poets. Not one of you has won even a third-class position as a poet. There is not one of you who can justly lay claim to popularity, in any true sense of the term. You have not even attained to such a position as is held by that weakling, Longfellow. . . . It was not time that you lacked to become known, but poetic ability. The world is not unappreciative of real genius, as you flatter yourself is the case, only you are not up to the required standard. You are all failures, and the sooner you stop writing the things no public will read, the better your peace of mind. Is not this truth?" she said, turning to me sadly. "God's truth," my lips and conscience cried with one voice. "God's truth," echoed poor Dick, with his heart's sickness in his face. "I, you know, have given up writing verses with any hope of success. My poems are jobs now." "Damned bad jobs," muttered our comforter.

* * * * *

IT is of course God's blessing that this sort of thing does not happen often. Indeed, the Drifter is obliged to confess that after he had read it he at once destroyed the specimen letter he never meant to send, for fear by some mischance it might get put into the mailbox by a conscientious hand, not his own. There was never a better example of how unbearable the truth is. For Mrs. Stoddard said what time has proved; and probably her listeners heard time's verdict ring out with her words. Nevertheless, the Drifter is glad he was not present. And he has no doubt whatever that truth of this sort in such terms should not be spoken. This raises a nice ethical point that some of his readers may be interested in; but he begs them not to write their thoughts in the form of a longish book and send it to him for a literary opinion.

THE DRIFTER

* Lizzie—the Pythoness—and Dick were Mr. and Mrs. Richard Henry Stoddard; Stedman was Edmund Clarence Stedman, editor of the familiar anthology; Aldrich was Thomas Bailey Aldrich; Read was Thomas Buchanan Read, author of at least one famous poem, "Sheridan's Ride."

Correspondence

A Picketing Playwright Replies

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In the editorial Picketing Playwrights, in The Nation for February 6, after summarizing the charge made by Virgil Geddes and myself that the Theater Guild makes gestures toward new writers but makes no consistent effort to produce their plays, you said:

A check of its [the Theater Guild's] record shows that during the present and the preceding seven seasons it has produced fifty-three plays. Of these, twenty-seven were by American writers, and eight of these twenty-seven were by dramatists whom the Guild was introducing for the first time to a New York audience.

This would seem to be a more or less effective refutation of our charge. It has impressed many who have read it. It has seemed so effective to the Theater Guild that a tear-sheet of The Nation has been sent to at least one inquiring subscriber with this rather odd explanatory letter:

My dear ———:

I am sorry there has been so much delay in replying to your letter of January 22 concerning the authors who picketed various Guild theaters. I did not wish to write you until the Guild decided on its policy as to a reply. At present we have made no reply to these so-called charges.

A fair and unbiased statement has been made about the case in The Nation. Though this statement does not entirely represent our point of view or state all the facts, I am inclosing a copy of it just in case you haven't read it.

If later the Guild decides to issue a statement I will see that a copy is sent you.

[Signed] WARREN P. MUNSELL, Business Manager.

Your figures gave me a jolt. Reaching hastily for my trusty pamphlet, "The History of the Theatre Guild, 1919-34," also recently mailed to inquiring subscribers and forwarded to the picketing playwrights, I checked the record, then rechecked it. I found that during the present and the preceding seven seasons the Theater Guild has produced forty-four (not fifty-three) plays. Of these, twenty-three (not twenty-seven) were by American writers, and only three (not eight) of the twenty-three were by dramatists whom the Guild was introducing for the first time to a New York audience. (Among these three was "Porgy," a dramatization of the best-selling novel. The Guild, in listing "Red Rust" and "The House of Connelly" among its productions, admits in notes set in six-point type that neither was a Guild production for subscribers. The Paul Green play was produced by the Group Theater after it had been kept in the Guild icebox for five years.) Three introductions in eight seasons prove our charge.

The methods of a certified public accountant may not be best for an evaluation of the Theater Guild's boasted record as "the foremost producing organization in the American theater..." which remains "today primarily an experimental theater." But it may be worth while to break down the statistics a little farther. Of the twenty-three American plays, six were by Eugene O'Neill (who had twenty-eight productions before he went to the Guild); four were by Maxwell Anderson; three were by S. N. Behrman. In the past eight years one Guild production has been given to each of the following authors or teams: Philip Barry (nurtured by Arthur Hopkins, who gave productions to Sidney Howard, Maxwell Anderson, Lynn Riggs, and others before the Guild got round to do so), Robert Sherwood, Owen and Donald Davis, John Wexley, Riggs, Dawn Powell, the Siftons, the Bruce Goulds, the DuBose Heywards, and George O'Neil. Of these Barry, Sherwood, the Davises, and Wexley were established and successful; Riggs, Powell, and the Siftons had been produced; the Goulds, Heywards, and O'Neil had not.

I don't want to prove too much. It would not be difficult to show that while the Guild has been aware of new writers in its subscription advertising, in its production schedules it has been more timid, more conventional, less experimental than any one of a half-dozen "commercial" producers making no pretensions to art, issuing no prospectuses soliciting subscriptions for "six plays to be chosen from a list including..." Geddes and I indicted the Guild because we believed the Guild was guilty and vulnerable. It is guilty of timidity and bad judgment. It is vulnerable because its directors have good intentions. (They yearn for the seasons when "box-office" plays will give them economic elbow room to do "the plays we'd really like to do," but, like tomorrow, the arrival of that season becomes more and more improbable.) The Guild is vulnerable through its subscribers, who have been promised the moon and the stars regularly each season and have been handed somewhat less—less even than the best the Guild had in its icebox.

We went to the trouble of making this indictment, at some sacrifice, because we thought it worth while to focus attention and thought upon the pretensions of the Guild as contrasted with its performances and thereby perhaps to impel the Guild either to promise less or deliver more. We have accomplished the first part. Whether in an artistic sense the Guild will be more honest with itself and with playwrights and audiences in the future than it has been in the past only the Guild directors can decide. Perhaps Hollywood will give the three directors until recently in residence there the requisite courage.

New York, February 12

PAUL SIFTON

INTEGRATION OF PRIVATE AND PUBLIC SOCIAL WORK requires a professionally trained personnel in both fields.

The Graduate School for Jewish Social Work offers a graduate curriculum leading to the Master's and Doctor's degrees, for the acquisition of the necessary knowledge and skills.

For information about requirements for admission, scholarships and fellowships, write to

DR. M. J. KARPF, Director

The Graduate School

For Jewish Social Work

71 West 47th Street, New York City

"Confessions of an Opium Eater"

By HEYWOOD BROWN

WHEN the Democrats met in convention in the summer of 1932, I was in the press stand as a news commentator. The various tricks and devices used to promote the fortunes of the contestants appalled me. In particular the alliance of Hearst, Huey Long, and McAdoo in behalf of Franklin D. Roosevelt seemed to me unholy. And I am not forgetting Farley. So in the heat of righteous indignation I did a column which began, "If Franklin D. Roosevelt is nominated he will be the corkscrew candidate of a crooked convention." This was somewhat too strong for the editor who was handling the wire for New York. It appeared in milder form at home. Unfortunately, if you please, both the editor and I forgot that I had already sent a carbon to a small Chicago tabloid which was taking the service. Maybe it had no copy readers. Anyhow the sentence got in as written.

The Al Smith forces liked the literary style and spread it through the convention hall in the form of a handbill. This special prominence which I received returned to plague me after the election. In the first place, Mr. Roosevelt did many things which seemed to me forthright, bold, and altogether admirable. I believe I publicly ate my words in a newspaper column. That was a mistake. At any rate it would be pleasant to be able to have your columns and eat them too.

Early in the administration President Roosevelt consented to meet a committee from the American Newspaper Guild. I was a member of the delegation and probably the most trepiditious of the lot. As we were leaving, Franklin D. Roosevelt gave me full face the famous Roosevelt smile and held out his hand saying, "I didn't always think so, Mr. Brown, but I now feel that you are one of my most understanding interpreters."

And so I went away filled not so much with understanding as with admiration. Here was the most charming man I had ever met in my life, and by a coincidence he was also the President of the United States, which did not war against his glamor. Not long afterward another Guild committee was received at the White House. There were only three of us this time, and I remember finding Mr. Roosevelt among the most proficient of all listeners I had ever encountered. It was actually easier to talk to the President of the United States than it has been on many occasions to hold converse with Howard Davis or Roy Howard.

But there was one disturbing incident which marred the meeting. To be precise, it did not come up until we were leaving the White House. I said to another guildsman, "Well, we certainly made great gains for the Guild in that conference."

"Like what?" inquired my companion curtly.

"Don't you remember," I said with enthusiasm, "that he promised us three out of the four points we brought up."

Jim looked at me in amazement. "The trouble with you, Heywood," he said, "is that you've been away from regular newspaper work too long. You're a rotten reporter. Think back about what happened. You got very steamed up about the case you were presenting. You felt that everything you said was fair and right. You were sitting just across from the President and you began to pound your fist on the table and Roosevelt looked across at you and grinned and nodded his head. And every time he nodded you thought he was making a promise. He was only saying, 'Go on, I'm listening.' He promised us nothing."

In the light of later events Jim was quite correct. No promises had been made. Mr. Roosevelt had merely listened with great interest. It may be said in his favor that he listens to very many people explaining very many theories. They go away satisfied with his cordiality. And this cordiality is a habit-forming drug. Labor leaders are still taking the Roosevelt smile and waking up with something like the automobile code. Unfortunately the worker in city room or shop is not warmed by that smile. He wasn't there. He has to take it second hand, and a second-hand smile is one of the shoddiest shelters ever presented to a shorn lamb to temper the wind.

So great is the charm of Franklin Delano Roosevelt that it inspires all his associates. One may walk for miles through the long corridors of the Commerce Building and receive nothing but cordiality. Even now organized labor is not quite aware of the nothingness. It is inclined to play into the President's hands by being sidetracked into violent assault upon every stooge of the Administration. The befuddled spectator believes he is watching a whole cast of characters. He cannot comprehend that it is all done by ventriloquism.

Under the haze of the opiate a play unfolds before our enraptured eyes. When I was using the stuff this play was slightly reminiscent of "Nelly the Beautiful Cloak Model," only the victim was a man and not a woman. He was forever being deceived. General Johnson deceived him. Leo Wolman deceived him. Donald Richberg deceived him. At this point my conscious mind broke through the fumes and I awoke.

I had come a long distance through a fog, and the only thing which kept me going was a magic sentence which I got from a coal miner. I repeated it over and over again until I was clear of the maze. It runs, "How in hell could Don Richberg deceive anybody?"

Well, I'm off the stuff now. At least I hope so. Charm is a drug with a kick in it. Maybe a couple of drops in a glass full of water wouldn't hurt you. Perhaps it would help to take just a pinch of this charm away from the White House, where there is such abundance, and add a teaspoonful to the codes, which haven't any.

[This is the third of Heywood Brown's lively comments on labor in the reign of Roosevelt which appear every week in The Nation.]

Nick Bins, Kidnapper

By HANS CHRISTIAN

Racine, February 15

FOR many years Racine, the second largest city in Wisconsin, has been a center of political unrest and scandal. Heavily industrialized, the town has always been controlled by the large employers and bankers. They own the only daily newspaper and dictate to public officials. Somehow they have succeeded in keeping the door closed on most of the city's skeletons. It is precisely because there is so much in Racine's history and make-up of which it is less than proud that a single cleverly staged and dramatically executed exposé by a group of Milwaukee intellectuals has thrown the city's masters into a state bordering on hysteria.

The depression years brought even more jittery unrest than usual to Racine. With thousands of workers thrown out of employment at the large mass-production plants, the field was fertile for strong labor-organization growth. In 1934, as the promise of the New Deal was dissolved in the ambiguity of Section 7-a, a militant Wisconsin Emergency Relief Administration workers' union spread to many plants, conducted fifteen strikes, five of them important, and then fizzled out in political disunion as its opportunist leaders ran for public office. Nevertheless, many of the strikes were successful. Wage increases were won. A sort of united front from below was achieved by Socialists, I. W. W.'s, Communists, and the unemployed.

As the strikes continued and the open-shop solidarity of which the employers had been so proud began to break up, a vigilante movement slowly got under way. With the elections over, relief standards were sharply cut and W. E. R. A. workers were virtually all discharged. Under the double impetus of the American Legion's national anti-radical drive and a number of impressive mass demonstrations by the unemployed, the vigilante movement developed strength. As in Germany, the Communists became the scapegoats.

Constantly urged to more vigorous action by poorly disguised editorials in the manufacturer-owned Journal-Times, the vigilantes started a wave of terror through the more radical labor and unemployed ranks. Demonstrations at relief stations were broken up by vigilantes openly slugging side by side with the police. The Communist downtown headquarters were raided and wrecked. Other offices were bombarded with bricks. Radical leaders were followed at night by mysterious cars without license plates. Chief of Police Grover C. Lutter, in disgrace with the civic leaders because of his pitiful showing in a Dillinger bank raid, declared open war on Communists, flatly refused to permit them to meet, said he would make Racine "a white town."

The local Legion post pledged its "moral and physical force if necessary to stamp out communism," and blocked an ordinance that would have prohibited the use of tear gas in labor disputes. The Racine Bar Association urged prison sentences for "agitators" and evolved a formula to circumvent the lack of a criminal-syndicalism law. The Journal-Times fairly smacked its lips over "the great achievements by right-minded citizens."

Then Samuel Herman, Communist organizer, was kidnapped in mid-day on a downtown street, severely beaten, and dumped out of the car in the country. Two days later William Armstrong, formerly mayor of Racine during a particularly odious period, owner of a foundry, and state chairman of the Veterans' Civic League, speaking in Milwaukee said: "These Communist black rats are undermining America to create an impotent citizenship. . . . Well, you know what we are doing to them in Racine."

Protests from Socialists, the Federated Trades Council, and labor groups poured in upon Mayor William Swaboda (a former Socialist), the council, and the governor. But the authorities were strangely unable to find even a remote clew to the many acts of terror. The fun continued. John Sekat, a Communist, was given one to two years in prison on a charge of breaking an automobile window during a strike at the Horlick Milk Company, although another man made a signed confession that he was the guilty person. A young woman Communist was given a prison term for "distributing leaflets," a third Communist for "inciting to riot." The Journal-Times began cutting notches for fallen Communists.

The day after his kidnapping Herman appeared at the office of Assistant District Attorney Oscar Edwards to swear out a warrant for his assailants. A newspaper reporter showed Edwards a statement made by Herman charging Chief Lutter with being a party to the kidnapping. Secretly the prosecutor got the chief on the phone, detained Herman, quickly typed out a warrant, and in ten minutes the victim of the kidnappers was jailed on a charge of criminal libel.

These things were being watched from Milwaukee by members of the League Against War and Fascism and particularly by George Wilbur, secretary of its professional group and son of a wealthy lumberman. Wilbur went to Racine, talked to bartenders, met various people, and quickly learned that the vigilante set-up was an open secret in Legion and employer circles. On a second trip a series of progressive introductions put him in direct touch with "the man who kidnapped Herman." The meeting took place in the office of one of the city's most prominent law firms, Smith, Beck, and Heft.

Wilbur wanted not merely to meet the kidnapper but to bring about his arrest. Obviously this was impossible in Racine, where the man was the hero of the day. Wilbur worked out a plan, a long-chance scheme that had in it all the elements of failure. He told the kidnapper, Nick Bins, a member of the Legion's drum-and-bugle corps and an unemployed salesman, that his uncle at Waukesha was having trouble with a labor agitator. Would Mr. Bins undertake to treat this scoundrel as he had Herman? He would, and gladly. A meeting was arranged for the following day.

Wilbur then went to Milwaukee, told members of the anti-fascist league he planned to trap Bins in the Wilbur home at Waukesha, and asked the Communist Party to help him. He said later he dared trust no one else in so "hot" a situation. The Communists furnished him with two radio technicians. At the last minute Wilbur called in a reporter for the Milwaukee Journal in order to assure the publicity necessary to the success of his plan. That same afternoon the trap was set. In the luxurious Wilbur home a microphone was set behind the sunroom draperies. A loud speaker was hooked up in the basement for use by the reporter if Bins should want the conference to be private. A woman was stationed at a hotel with instructions to call after the kidnapper's arrival and—in the event the plan worked—notify the local district attorney to make the arrest.

The "detective" then drove to Racine, picked up Bins, and brought him to Waukesha. The reporter was already on hand, masquerading as a brother at home with a cold. Mrs. Wilbur was present with her two small children. In the basement were the two radio men. The atmosphere was as tense as a gangster movie. Wilbur and Bins arrived ahead of schedule and caught Mrs. Wilbur and the reporter in the midst of a rehearsal. If the slugger noticed their confusion he gave no sign of it. He was a big man, well built, over six feet, weighing 200 pounds or more. (Herman weighs about 130 pounds and is slight in build.)

The employer "uncle" was summoned from his plant by telephone and arrived in a few minutes. The part was played, rather nervously, by a Milwaukee union railroad man. Bins was maneuvered into microphone position. He had no objection to the "brother's" presence, and the conference got under way. Seated in the affluent home, with a drink of excellent Scotch before him, Bins talked freely. Yes, he had kidnapped and slugged Herman. Dar Vriesman, secretary of the Racine Chamber of Commerce, had hired and instructed him. He was also the man who had wrecked the Communist headquarters and broken the plate-glass windows of Herman's two bondsmen. Notes tied to the bricks had been typed in the Chamber of Commerce office, as he got his instructions. The Racine employers were determined to put an end to labor agitation. All "illegitimate" agitators got their instructions from Moscow. The whole anti-radical drive was part of the Legion's Americanism program.

The ears of the plotters burned as Bins callously described how he tried to break Herman's legs with an automobile crank, and promised to treat the Waukesha agitator similarly. "Oh, I won't kill him," he said. "Even though you work in full cooperation with the authorities, you can't get away with a killing. But I'll make him wish he'd never been an agitator."

Bins had obtained his cars from a Racine Ford dealer named Frank Applegate. A federal agent from Chicago named Dan had driven the car when Herman was taken for a ride. Racine judges, particularly Judge Belden of the circuit court, a "brother legionnaire," were "100 per cent okay." Juries were taken care of. Bins modestly admitted that his effective vigilante work had made him admired in the best circles. He had been to parties. A charming lady had wanted to kiss him for his valor. An industrialist, one Mr. Johnson, had promised him a Christmas present.

The uncle remained a bit reserved, and Bins urged him to call Racine for references. "Call Chief Lutter," he said; "call any prominent attorney down there; call Dar Vriesman." The latter was reached at the Chamber of Commerce office by long distance; he talked a moment to Bins and then told the "uncle" that "Bins is all right for the job."

Bins didn't want to set a price for the Waukesha job. The arrangements should be made, he said, between the chambers of commerce of the two towns. He did, however, accept a little retainer of $10—in marked money.

Meanwhile the "tip-off" woman had called, received her signal, and gone to the Waukesha district attorney. Her near failure to force him to make the arrest justified Wilbur's decision not to let the authorities in on the plan. The Waukesha district attorney called the Racine district attorney, and several telephone exchanges took place. An alleged kidnapper was awaiting arrest in a prominent home, but no one wanted to arrest him. The woman became desperate, stood on her "rights as a citizen," and at length the arrest was made. District Attorney Brown of Racine came up to bring back the prisoner.

At Racine Bins was subjected to none of the usual police grillings. Chief Lutter refused to see his prisoner, said it was "Brown's job." Throughout the night Bins entertained visitors at the jail. Most of them were brother legionnaires. Next day the story took ribbon position in the Milwaukee Journal. In a frank manner it reported the affair, giving names and details as furnished by Bins. And that was a sad blow to the sense of security of the powers at Racine.

Since that day, more than a month ago, there have been no more acts of open terror in Racine. Instead, the Chamber of Commerce has run a series of vaguely phrased advertisements concerning the civic and industrial virtues of the city. Fred Heinisch, Legion commander and post-office employee, at first denied Bins was a legionnaire, then published and broadcast an appeal for defense funds for "Bins, a fellow-legionnaire." Vriesman gave three different statements to as many newspapers, denying and admitting the telephone conversation with Waukesha. The Journal-Times printed an amazing series of editorials headed "Legal Way Best in End," "Don't Backslide," and "Let Us Not Assume Defeatist Attitude." They sounded as though the editor felt his world had been suddenly yanked from under him, but entertained hopes of rebuilding it.

Right and might had suddenly been made wrong in Racine. The loathed Communists were in the position of having the goods on the city's most respectable elements. The powerful Milwaukee Journal had told the story in every home in the state. Those were bitter days. A secret John Doe inquiry was gone through with. All persons implicated by Bins were given, in the words of the Journal-Times, "an opportunity to refute the charges." Bins was duly bound over for trial on a charge not of kidnapping but of assault.

Then the disrupted forces of respectability began to recuperate. Herman was quickly tried before Judge Belden for criminal libel. With voluminous evidence in his pocket substantiating the statements made by Herman, the district attorney got a verdict of guilty from a jury in nine minutes. Only two of the defense's twenty witnesses were allowed to testify. The town breathed more freely. The front page of the Journal-Times became cheerful with daily pictures of legionnaires, including Dar Vriesman, presenting medals to students and making speeches on Americanism and on the need for character building in the schools.

A weighty file of evidence showing the need for a special prosecutor in the Bins affair was presented to Governor Philip La Follette by a committee of the League Against Fascism. He granted a long and courteous audience—and promised nothing.

Books, the Dance, Drama

Canopy of Death

The Royal Way. By André Malraux. Smith and Haas. $2.50.

FOR readers of "The Conquerors" and "Man's Fate" this newly translated novel by Malraux is likely to prove something of a disappointment. Yet placed in a proper time relation to the two novels having a revolutionary theme it takes on great interest for the light it throws on the development of one of the most brilliant and mature of living fiction writers. If the assumption can be made that it was composed before "The Conquerors," although first published two years afterward (and everything in the book, form and style as well as subject, gives strength to such an assumption), "The Royal Road" represents an exhaustion through the imagination, a kind of vicarious purging of the mood which was the legacy of the last generation of European writers to the present.

Most of the book consists of a dialogue between its two principal characters: Claude, the young French archaeologist who seeks an escape from the tedium of respectable bourgeois society in a ransacking of the past in the form of forbidden art treasures in the jungle-covered temples of Siam; Perken, the Danish adventurer, who is driven on by the interpenetrated symbols of ambition and lust. The subject of the dialogue is death. In both men the idea of death has become an obsession strong enough to unite them in a common enterprise of plunder and conquest. For both death is not so much a culmination as a process—the gradual decline of a man's life, the death-in-life which triumphs if one submits to one's destiny "like a dog in its kennel." "But, living, to endure the vanity of life gnawing him like a cancer; all his life long to feel the sweat of death lie clammy on his palm." Their only protection against this sense of "death's austere dominion" is found in adventure, which is described not as an evasion but as a quest. For the life of directed action is an attempt to turn the raw materials of one's existence to some account; a protest against what Perken, anticipating the title of a later book by Malraux, calls "the human lot," man's sense of limitations, especially his humiliation at the hands of Time. For Perken, as for the revolutionary adventurer in "The Conquerors," any line of action—provided it is sufficiently dangerous, of course, and opposed to the established order—is its own justification because it is a defiance of death. To stake everything on one's last moment is also, in a sense, to choose one's death, which, as the character Claude remarks, nearly everyone bungles, in one way or another.

But the truth gradually emerges through all these dark speeches that what these two desperate fugitives from middle-class Europe really feel toward death is not enmity but infatuation. It is not to conquer but to surrender that they beat their way through the dense Asiatic forest. The sweetness of death, the wild elation which comes to Perken at the end, is really based on the sudden glimpse of the absurdity of life that it brings, the satisfaction that life is being annihilated.

Nothing would ever give a meaning to his life—not even this sudden ecstasy that merged him in the sunlight. Men walked the earth, men who believed in their passions, their sorrows, their own existence—insects under the leaves, a teeming multitude beneath the far-flung canopy of death.

In the last analysis, the book is another expression of that mood of escape into the consoling embrace of death, whether through the avenue of introspection or of action, which runs through most of the fiction of the last generation. It will remind the reader in turn of Proust, of the early Mann, of the Conrad of "Victory" and "Heart of Darkness," and of Hemingway. And in its peculiar emphasis on the vanity of life, the nullity of existence, and the rest, it may be easily enough identified with a literary period that now belongs quite definitely to the past. In "Man's Fate" Malraux has distributed Perken's character between the young Chinese terrorist Ch'en, with his longing for annihilation, and the elderly Gisors, with his habit of soliloquizing on the emptiness of life. But in Kyo, May, Katov, and the several young revolutionists in that novel he has created a new and quite different type of character, for whom action is not an aphrodisiac in the long tryst with death but a means to a definitely conceived and highly desired end. And because for this reason their lives mean very much to these characters their deaths take on a significance that is tragic rather than pathetic. The difference between "The Royal Road" and "Man's Fate" is more profound than a difference between an early and a late book by the same author; it measures exactly the change that has taken place in Malraux's whole view of life and character, a change that is certain to have great influence on the future course of fiction in his own country and elsewhere.

It is a duty to mention the superb translation that Stuart Gilbert has made of the lushly rhetorical style which Malraux adopted in this book.

WILLIAM TROY

A New Monument to Lee

R. E. Lee. By Douglas Southall Freeman. Volumes III and IV. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.75 per volume.

THESE volumes, completing Dr. Freeman's monumental life of Lee, have the virtues and the faults of the earlier ones. The author has left few sources unexamined and few minutiae of Lee's life untold. He offers many examples of penetrating tactical appraisal, with occasional passages of inspired prose. His general attitude toward Lee results in a tone of defense, although now and then he frankly admits his hero slipped. And yet, despite the generally admirable qualities of this definitive "Lee," readers conversant with the fascinating might-have-beens of the Civil War are likely to finish the final volume regretting that Dr. Freeman did not undertake to answer the larger question: Why did Lee fail?

Careful scrutiny of Lee's connection with the general Confederate effort makes one wonder to how large an extent the final defeat was due to Lee's own failure to insist upon establishing a functioning, competent supreme command of the South's war effort. Likewise, study of his record in what he deemed his proper sphere, the command of the Army of Northern Virginia, leaves one with a sense of amazement at his slowness to enforce his military will on his subordinates. While Dr. Freeman has not ignored these broader questions, he has shown how Lee failed rather than why.

And yet his volumes multiply the evidence that Lee was too good a man to be a supremely successful general. His conscience was so responsive to obligation, his own mood, temper, and will were so subordinated to the demands of duty, that it seemed almost psychologically impossible for him to understand how a lieutenant might hazard a battle because of pique. Then, too, Lee's sense of the propriety, in our American system, of subordinating military to civil authority was so strong that even in emergencies, when the success of the Southern efforts was hazarded by an inept President, he sedulously avoided asserting an authority which the Southern people wanted him to wield, and which someone must wield for the revolution to succeed. Had the spirit of Cromwell or Napoleon burned in Lee, the South's independence might have been won.

From a military standpoint Dr. Freeman's treatment of the Gettysburg campaign is about the most candid and satisfactory portion of his work. Lee's initial decision to invade Pennsylvania was open to the gravest question. His first major mistake thereafter was in giving Jeb Stuart orders capable of misconstruction, as a result of which Lee was deprived of the eyes and ears of his army during the critical days of the advance. Otherwise he would not have stumbled blindly into Gettysburg.

At Cold Harbor Lee's genius was at its height. There his strategic understanding was at its best. At every point of crisis he anticipated Grant's movements. In this campaign, too, he developed to the fullest the art of field fortification; the lines at Cold Harbor and then at Petersburg foreshadowed the trench systems on the western front in the World War. In explaining Lee's tardiness in moving from Cold Harbor to Petersburg, however, Dr. Freeman indulges in special pleading. Obviously Beauregard had cried "wolf" so often that Lee believed him no longer. Freeman also is unduly tender in assessing the responsibilities for Five Forks. The tragedy of surrender is well retold.

The most satisfying chapters, however, deal with the hero of Lexington. Lee accepted defeat with courage. "I think it wisest," he wrote, "not to keep open the sores of war, but to follow the example of those nations who endeavor to obliterate the marks of civil strife, and to commit to oblivion the feelings it engendered." He did not refight the war but sought to turn the South to the tasks immediately at hand, no matter how humble or how hard. This was one of the main reasons he accepted the presidency of Washington College, a poverty-stricken Shenandoah institution. There Lee did his duty day by day, by the power of example helping the South to bind its wounds and go ahead.

On one occasion Lee termed duty "the noblest word in the English language." His successes were due to his fidelity to that principle. His failures arose, not from any neglect of duty, but from the necessity for choosing between conflicting calls. Dr. Freeman's work admirably reveals Lee as a noble figure in war and a nobler one in peace.

GEORGE FORT MILTON

East Side World

Call It Sleep. By Henry Roth. Robert O. Ballou. $2.50.

DOES anyone remember Mary Antin's "The Promised Land," that thick book bound in blue cloth with the Statue of Liberty stamped in gold upon its cover? It was followed by "The Rise of David Levinsky," and, a few years ago, by "Jews Without Money." Henry Roth's first novel throws these predecessors into an ironic perspective. The general background of "Call It Sleep" is not unfamiliar; the opening pages are innocent enough: again the "Golden Land" at Ellis Island, May, 1907, where immigrants disembark.

So much for the preparation; we know the story. But one is soon aware that this is not merely a human document. Three levels of language are used to tell that story: one is the language of the narrator, another a direct translation of Yiddish into English, another a dialect that is neither English nor Yiddish but a transition between the two, at first a difficult and awkward tongue, ugly and harsh, yet slowly gaining speed and flexibility. Through the medium of these three levels a set of characters emerge: David the boy, his father, his mother, Aunt Bertha, and Rabbi Yidel Pankower, who is master within the whitewashed walls of a cheder. The technical device that Henry Roth employs reveals the various levels of experience in which his characters participate, and through the eyes of David we share something of that complex world: its transition between hope and fear, between fantasy and reality, between dreams of the old world left behind and the poverty-stricken terror of the new.

To David the cellar of a house gains special significance. There in the darkness rats breed and the sins of children who "play bad," obscene small girls and boys rolling in filth. But there, too, lies the secret of a profound mystery. On the street level walks his father, silent, wary, uncertain of livelihood, printer one week, milkman the next. Then, with a sudden loss of self-control, the quiet man is a tower of rage, another Job gone half insane. And here upon the street are casual friends, small boys like David; here also walks Aunt Bertha, a mountain of a woman, talk flowing from her lips in a quick, turgid stream of ribaldry. (Her trip with David to the Metropolitan Museum is, I think, one of the best single episodes in contemporary fiction.) Above the street, on the top floor of the tenement, is David's mother and the crowded apartment where the family lives. Yet these different levels seem to be contained within the white walls of the cheder, where Reb Yidel Pankower reads Isaiah. To look at Yidel Pankower one might see no more than the figure of an old man covered with years of unwashed dirt; he has affinity with the very rats in the cellar, and he administers authority on the street level by use of a sharp tongue; but in his understanding of the text before his eyes a revelation is implied. That revelation transcends all levels—and is the experience that will explain alike the mysteries of heaven and the cellar.

It is this end toward which David is moving throughout the book; and to his mind the crack in the street between the car tracks is a source of nameless power; there is the revelation in that bright moment before death when all mystery is revealed. In his progress toward that end one sees the bitter frustration of his father's life and the terror which surrounds the calm innocence of the boy's mother. They are living in a strange land and will die within its borders. David will survive the moment of attempted exploration of the nameless power and exchange the fears of fantasy for those of reality.

I believe I have indicated that Henry Roth has written a first novel of extraordinary character. It will not fall readily into the classification of "proletarian" novel, yet it reveals, I think, more of the actual conditions of living on New York's East Side than any other book I have ever read. In reading it one is forced to accept both technique and content as the purpose of the story; and in this case we are given an experience which few readers of contemporary fiction can afford to ignore.

HORACE GREGORY

Agricultural Utopia

Reshaping Agriculture. By O. W. Willcox. Foreword by Alvin Johnson. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.

A GENERATION ago Edward Bellamy created a considerable stir with his book "Looking Backward." Apparently its purpose was to convert humanity to socialism though not at all by the usual methods, such as arguments purporting to prove the defects of the present system, its inevitable downfall at all events, along with an elaborate presentation of evidence in favor of some more or less defensible scheme of distribution under the proposed system. Mr. Bellamy merely pictured the new state. The inquirer who asked about the Old Deal was told in kindly, clear tones that the New Deal was altogether more desirable. The sale of the book for a year or two, the organization of Bellamy clubs, the apparent conversion of many to the Socialist point of view merely by the dramatic presentation of the nature of the desired goal, gave promise of a social revolution, but thus far the promise is unfulfilled.

Not many days ago Howard Scott and his fellow-Technocrats gave us a few old facts dissolved in an 80 per cent solution of fancy, colored with extremely doubtful statistics, which showed that two hours of work a day is ample to keep humanity well supplied with everything needful. And now comes Dr. Willcox, who proposes, but does not urge, a comparable revolution, affecting not all society at once and equally, but agriculture primarily and the rest incidentally. His theory is not couched in the guise of fiction, but appears in the habiliments of science. Dr. Willcox is an agrobiologist; he defines his field as "the science of plant growth and yield in relation to the unit of land surface." In other words, his theory is a particular phase of the old doctrine of diminishing returns. He divides the problem into two parts—one, the diminishing physical productivity in proportion to quantity of labor and capital expended; the other, the diminishing value in relation to cost. However, Dr. Willcox assumes that questions of physical yields belong to the agrobiologist and those of cost and value to the economist. To this end Dr. Willcox supposedly makes a contribution. He gives an exposition of "perultimate" yields. In a sense, the perultimate yield, the known or the theoretical, as the case may be, is closely analogous to "absolute zero" in physics. As compared with it, the yield of our usual performance is absurdly small—less than 10 per cent of the possible. A 100 per cent efficiency in farming would eliminate the necessity of cultivating 91.5 per cent of the land now used in producing our principal crops. But Dr. Willcox proposes that "we keep our feet on the ground . . . and, for the present, regard only the birds actually in hand." That is to say, we shall deal with known yields only. On this basis he finds that we still need 11 per cent of our crop land. The assumption that what man has done man may do is no doubt well founded, but the broad-gauge assumption that what one man has done a hundred may do with the same skill is doubtful. Also the assumption that what occurs one year may be made to happen with certainty and regularity is doubtful. That "any Indiana corn grower may produce from 90 to 165.6 bushels per acre, if he has it in him," may be true. Dr. Willcox may save his face by the insertion of the final phrase, in him, but neither economists nor farmers will be easily persuaded that "the surest way to reduce costs is to increase unit yields." The statement that there is no reason "why yields of 225 bushels per acre [of corn] should not be obtained in any part of the corn belt," fertility and water being furnished, will be questioned, as will the still more sweeping statement that there is no reason why "a farmer," and presumably a farmer of no rare qualification, "on ordinarily favorable soil . . . should not regularly achieve an efficiency of 50 per cent"—which would mean a production of around 125 bushels of corn per acre one year with another. This is to be done with due regard to agrobiology (diminishing increments in yield), and the economic law of diminishing returns.

The statements that irrigation water for ordinary farm crops may be had inexpensively from shallow wells, that intensive culture means higher economic returns, that the government can successfully fix prices in order to take care of the surplus—all these will be questioned before it will seem necessary to question the more inclusive assertion that an area equivalent to the cultivated acres of Illinois "could keep alive nearly half the population of the globe." Finally the author assures us that under the direction of these new principles of agrobiology, the ideals of socialism will be accomplished without losing the incentive of capitalism. If stupid humanity does not arrive at Utopia with little delay, it will not be because of any apparent lack of positivism on the part of the author in pointing to the promised land.

BENJAMIN HORACE HIBBARD

Newspapers and War

The Cuban Crisis as Reflected in the New York Press, 1895-1898. By Joseph E. Wisan. The Columbia University Press. $4.50.

THIS is a study of propaganda, of the propaganda of the New York newspapers and the part it played in bringing about the Spanish-American War. The primary interest of the newspapers was circulation, and the great rivals were Hearst's Journal and Pulitzer's World. Other newspapers there were, of course, but these two were the leaders in a contest for subscribers and news which paid little attention to the truth of the reports printed. Cuba happened to be the best copy during this period; but, as Dr. Wisan points out, "none of the papers seemed primarily concerned with Cuba per se, with the possible exception of the Sun, on whose staff Martí had once been included, and the less important Times." The Tribune and the Mail and Express were critical of Cleveland's non-intervention policy but in accord with McKinley's similar stand. The Evening Post tried to maintain a high standard of journalistic integrity. "The Journal of Commerce saw in Cuba only a menace to peace and prosperity. The Herald was more concerned with maintaining peace with Spain than securing justice for Cuba. The Journal and World simply used Cuba to achieve their prime purpose—an increase in circulation." No methods were too unethical, as is shown by the famous Hearst statement to the artist Remington—"You furnish the pictures; I'll furnish the war." The American people were soon worked up to the point of believing the atrocity stories printed, and the reporters knew that their jobs depended on getting such stories. There was a general disposition to believe the worst of Spain, and artists who had never been in Cuba drew scenes of cruelty, usually imaginary but effective. The Americans were easily convinced that the Spanish were cruel, vindictive, arrogant, and when the Maine was blown up, few doubted that Spain was responsible.

We have known of course that the newspapers were an influence in bringing on the war, but few have believed that the newspapers were the influence. Some readers will be inclined to scout this and look for more evidence of economic causation. The author shows that the Journal of Commerce consistently opposed war. "The leading commercial and financial interests of the nation favored an early restoration of stability," and the industrial and banking interest, just emerging from the depression of 1893, feared the effect of war on the financial structure. Mark Hanna and Edwin F. Atkins, the latter a leading investor in Cuba, opposed aid to the insurgents. Thus the economic interests were not idle, but as it happened they considered that peace was best for them. They sought to keep the lid on in Cuba in order to get out their profits.

In the search for the large interest which some have believed caused the war, the power of the papers has been minimized. Though there has been a tendency to acknowledge that the papers were important, the feeling has persisted that there had to be some more powerful influence back stage, and the big business men have been credited with engineering the outbreak of war. That this was not the case complicates rather than simplifies the problem of how to control war sentiment and propaganda. When comparatively small financial interests—for in fact the newspapers represented no very great financial investment—can throw a nation into war, how much more difficult must be the problem of controlling the really influential financiers when they find a possibility of profit in war!

Dr. Wisan's book is a well-documented, stimulating, and interesting study. We hope that he will follow it up with further studies of the relations of war and propaganda, considering not the newspapers alone but also the many other agencies that are constantly fomenting bad relations between nations for their own petty, private gains.

BAILEY W. DIFFIE

Shorter Notices

Week End. By Phil Stong. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

Phil Stong has left the Middle West and turned to the sophisticated Connecticut countryside for the material for his pretentious new novel. The story concerns a house party which is liberally attended by scientists, Junior Leaguers, actresses, writers, and advertising men. These familiar characters never fail to behave in the literary patterns which were cut out for them more than ten years ago. In "Week End" one can find all the expected things. There is a good deal of drunkenness, a smattering of fornication, a tragic misunderstanding, and a violent death. The book recalls all the bad, high-hat novels that have been generated since Scott Fitzgerald first put pen to paper. It differs from other products of its type only in that the awkwardness of its author has made it less slick, less agreeably narcotic than they. If Mr. Stong has any of that rural "horse sense" with which he has endowed so many characters he will forget the suburban byways and return to his plow.

The Proud Servant. By Margaret Irwin. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

"The Proud Servant" is an excellent example of the old-fashioned, romantic historical novel. Miss Irwin tells the story of the Marquis of Montrose, the Scottish hero who rallied the wild Highland clans to fight a magnificent but hopeless battle for the life of Charles I, the Stuart king. Montrose is pictured as a man born out of his time, a medieval chevalier, who turned with distaste from the fanatical ministers and the sharp-dealing business men who had risen to rule Scotland in the name of religion and the middle class. Miss Irwin's account of the gallant, idealistic lord is thoroughly grounded in historical fact, yet she does not hesitate to embroider it with stitches more florid than is today's fashion. The book is deliberately charged with "atmosphere," but even those who prefer a more ascetic tone in their biographies must admit that she has brought her hero to life.

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS ADAMIC, the author of "Dynamite" and "The Native's Return," is contributing a series of articles to The Nation.

LEFT WING will hereafter be a regular contributor of articles on sports and sport writing.

HEYWOOD BROWN, the well-known columnist of the World-Telegram, is president of the American Newspaper Guild.

GEORGE FORT MILTON is the author of biographies of Andrew Johnson and Stephen A. Douglas.

HORACE GREGORY will publish shortly a new volume of poems, "Chorus for Survival."

BENJAMIN HORACE HIBBARD is professor of agricultural economics at Iowa State College.

BAILEY W. DIFFIE, instructor in history at the College of the City of New York, is coauthor of "Porto Rico, a Broken Pledge."

LINCOLN KIRSTEIN is secretary of the School of American Ballet.

REVISED TO 1935

A HISTORY of AMERICAN FOREIGN RELATIONS

By

LOUIS MARTIN SEARS

Purdue University

An accurate yet lively background for the thinking of American leaders of opinion.

730 pages $3.50

THOMAS Y. CROWELL COMPANY

393 Fourth Avenue

New York

A NEW BOOK ON INTESTINAL STASIS BY THE AUTHORS OF "THE LAZY COLON"

COLITIS

Advanced stage of Intestinal Stasis (constipation) in which the primary cause is dryness of the Intestinal tract.

Inflammation of the lower, large intestine (colon) is characterized by a congestion (excess of blood), a dropsical condition, and an easily bleeding mucous membrane, or profuse fluid exudate, covering the surface of the bowel; with later shallow or deep ulceration.

The condition begins in the rectum or lower part of the colon (about 5 feet long), and progresses upward to the valve connecting the small and large intestines, sometimes even penetrating beyond and infecting parts of the 23 feet of small intestine; or it may remain localized in the rectum and lower part of the large intestine for months or years.

In the chapters on chronic, ulcerative colitis the authors have digested late reports of successful treatments in the Mayo clinic.

"COLITIS" is by the authors of that long-time best seller "THE LAZY COLON"—Charles M. Campbell and A. K. Detwiller, M.D. Best and most instructive popular book on early stages of constipation, 316 pages. Formerly $3. Just out in a beautiful $1 edition.

BOTH OF THESE BOOKS ARE GUARANTEED

Money back if the buyer is dissatisfied

Price, by mail, Colitis $1.50; Lazy Colon $1.15
EDUCATIONAL PRESS, 17 Dey St., N. Y.

DANCE

FIGHT FASCISM.
 First Annual DANCE
 Festival and RIDAY, Eve. MARCH 1st featuring REX INGRAM and Group
 HOT MUSIC THE NEW SINGERS
 MECCA TEMPLE CASINO
 133 West 55th Street, New York
 Tickets 49c in advance .60c at door
 Funds for ANTI-SEDITION Campaign
 Tendered by the New York City Committee
AMERICAN LEAGUE AGAINST WAR AND FASCISM

TICKETS
 at N. Y. City
 Comm.
 213 Fourth Av.
 GRa 5-2042;
 Mayfair Bookshop,
 1 E. 47th St.;
 Bookshop,
 50 E. 13th St.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH Says:

ACCENT ON YOUTH. Plymouth Theater. Hopeful message for the middle-aged in a lively comedy about playwright in love with his secretary. Witty and amusing.

ANYTHING GOES. Alvin Theater. Victor Moore as Public Enemy No. 13 in a No. 1 musical revue, with Ethel Merman at her best.

ESCAPE ME NEVER. Shubert Theater. Here is a heap of theatrical rubbish, romantically entitled. Few if any indeed, could play it one-half so charmingly as Elisabeth Bergner.

LIFE BEGINS AT 8:40. Winter Garden. Disputes with "Anything Goes" for first place among the revues.

NOAH. Longacre Theater. Reviewed in this issue.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE. Henry Miller's Theater. Much like the above but about a movie star this time and perhaps a trifle less mechanical.

POST ROAD. Ambassador Theater. Novel and exciting crook melodrama which begins as a quiet domestic comedy but has lots of surprises up its sleeve.

RAIN FROM HEAVEN. Golden Theater. Perhaps the best—and certainly the most substantial—of S. N. Behrman's excellent comedies. With Jane Cowl as a charming embodiment of urbanity and tolerance in a world seemingly about to lose both.

REVENGE WITH MUSIC. New Amsterdam Theater. Charles Winninger, Rex O'Malley, and Libby Holman in a lavish and generally entertaining operetta with lots of comedy and some good dancing in a more or less Spanish manner.

SAILORS OF CATTARO. Civic Repertory Theater. The third and much the best offering by the Theater Union, which goes in for plays with a revolutionary purpose. This one is all about a mutiny on board an Austrian man-of-war, and it is first rate as a play, quite aside from the red-flag waving.

TOBACCO ROAD. Forrest Theater. Sub-human but fascinating behavior of the Georgia crackers.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR. Maxine Elliott's Theater. Tense but grim drama about a fiendishly perverse child, who is played with extraordinary force by Florence McGee. One of the most discussed plays of the year.

THE PETRIFIED FOREST. Broadhurst Theater. Superb performance by Leslie Howard in Robert Sherwood's engrossing play about a lost intellectual. Exciting as melodrama but a great deal more besides.

THUMBS UP. St. James Theater. Bobby Clark, Hal Le Roy, and others in a slightly old-fashioned but entertaining review.

The Dance

Some American Dancers

ONE of the most interesting developments in American dancing is the rise of the Workers' Dance groups into something like a producing entity. Made up largely of girls trained either in the New York Wigman School or by Martha Graham for her group, they have created a great deal of favorable interest among dance partisans. Their programs bear the names of various revolutionary abstractions, which are demonstrated in the danced arrangements. It is perhaps inevitable, at the beginning, that very often the titles seem to be interchangeable, that the weight of the two techniques from which they stem is hard to support, and that the main attraction is the earnestness and belief in themselves of the dancers and their hopeful audiences.

Wigman has an excellent school, but from the earliest days, when she appeared in the Laban recitals, she has manifested a lack of interest in spectacle. Her accent on improvisation as composition may produce an increased psychic awareness in the bodies of her pupils, but they are seldom conscious that there is, after all, an audience watching them. Unfortunately, the audience before which the Workers' Dancers perform is excessively anticipatory. The word "choreography" has been added to their vocabulary, and they consider dancing a pretty fair dialectical argument. Hence it is twice as hard for talented girls like Jane Dudley, Anna Sokolow, and Sophie Maslow to get the kind of harsh accelerative criticism that a more disinterested, if more bourgeois, audience might provide. This, however, is of secondary importance. The workers are building the largest dance public in New York and it will not be slow to ask for the best—if the Theater Union audience is any criterion.

Martha Graham recently gave a sell-out recital of more than usual interest. Though this reviewer is blind to Miss Graham's aesthetic, he admires her personal integrity, her persistence, her success, and her talent for composition. In an otherwise graceless production of lush vulgarity in which Katharine Cornell framed herself as Juliet, Miss Graham arranged some beautiful movements that admirably suggested Florentine social dances of the Renaissance. They were better than the action for which they were contrived as background. In her own recital "Course," with music by George Antheil, was particularly impressive. The costumes, in series of yellow and white, green and white, red and white, the charge of the girls tearing head first across the stage, and the held postures of the well-trained group gave curious but unmistakable proof of a talent which is positive, in spite of Wigman, in spite of Wigman's diluters and Graham's imitators.

If Miss Graham would set herself the perhaps irksome task of forcing herself to fit a subject, a story even, it would do wonders for her. The structure of a plot would hold in a really dramatic net the otherwise interesting but frequently detached movements which she displays. Her music is unmelodic and trivial. She is strong enough to stand a line of melody in motion without collapsing, as do so many of her imitators, out of nervous fatigue, which broken harmonies disguise and forgive. One would like to see her invent Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" free of Massine's second-hand memories of Nijinsky's inimitable arrangements, or "Noces," or "Persephone." Somehow her work is strong but unrelated to a central, consecutive strength; the impulse is present, the energy flows, the result is apparent but diffuse, confusing. What she most lacks is a positive subject matter, even a liter-any idea, or, refusing that, melody that can take her off the ground.

Tamiris has been dancing at the Group Theater's Sunday-night performances. She is not hard to look at—once. But Bob Lewis's imitation of Wigman which followed one of her numbers was funnier and a more savage criticism than one would take the trouble to write about her. The audience, a splendidly anticipatory one for "Waiting for Lefty," gave her a big hand. Don't hit the comrade, she is trying. All right, but Tamiris is an embarrassment for anything as coherent, unpretentious, and alive as Odet's brilliant play.

Doris Humphries and Charles Weidman have also recently performed, but what it was they performed is still their secret. They seemed to enjoy the clear spaces of their stage but they infrequently permitted any participation on the part of their audience.

After a three-year interval Agnes de Mille returned to give an interesting recital. It became increasingly apparent as she danced that her talent is strongly toward composition. Her invention to the music of a movement of the "Rites of Spring" was absorbing technically and emotionally. Her country and folk dances have a bumptious, bouncing amiability which is not deadened even by three similar numbers in one night. Her dances of style and epoch have authority, but more archaeological and dramatic than choreographic value. She is a finely theatrical artist. It is earnestly to be hoped that she will have the opportunity soon to forsake the ambiguous and thankless responses of the concert stage and enter directly into group work.

The New School for Social Research is organizing a valuable series of evenings whereby dancers without reputations can show to a good public the results of their labor. Not at all in the general run of "modern" dancing, though God knows why not, was Roger Pryor Dodge's "Black and Tan Fantasy." Mr. Dodge knows jazz dancing the way some Russians know ballet. He has codified it from years of research. He explodes into its action with violent and sustained excitement. He is well worth watching.

LINCOLN KIRSTEIN

Drama

Noah Has His Doubts

THE Biblical story of Noah and his Ark is not long on characterization or on what we critics call psychological analysis. The author was no Job, to whom a boil is interesting chiefly as an occasion for philosophical speculation, but a plain blunt man concerned with such simple facts as a forty-day rain and a well-calked boat. His hero appears, therefore, as a simple extrovert who takes things as they come, and precious little is said about his mental reactions. We are not even told whether or not he was fond of animals, though it must have made a tremendous difference if he was.

Many of these deficiencies are now supplied in the very Green Pasturish dramatization of the tale which has been translated from the French and produced at the Longacre Theater before quaintly stylized sets by Cleon Throckmorton. The author is that André Obey whose somewhat precious "The Rape of Lucrece" was acted here not so long ago by Katharine Cornell, and if I read his intention aright he attributes to the hero his own somewhat critical attitude toward the tactics of the Almighty. It was all very well to save specimens of every creature including man, but why was not God intelligent enough to perceive that he was also saving the seed of every pestiferous trait in human nature? What

Monster Mass Protest

NEW YORK DISTRICT

Friends of Soviet Union

War threatens the Soviet Union! American-Soviet trade negotiations broken off! Japan given clear signal to go ahead, pushes forward fast toward Soviet borders, abruptly quickens war preparations. Nazis gleefully cheer developments. War danger becomes acute!

Demonstrate your anger!

Demonstrate your demand for normal trade relations which would give jobs to countless American unemployed!

Demonstrate your demand for support of Soviet peace policy. Stop the makers in their tracks! Defend the Soviet Union, stronghold against war and fascism.

Admission
25c-35c

A few reserved seats at $1.00

MON.
FEB.
25th

7:30 P.M.

DEFEND THE SOVIET UNION!

SPEAKERS

CONGRESSMAN ERNEST LUNDEEN

JAMES WATERMAN WISE

CORLISS LAMONT, Chairman

PROFESSOR CHARLES KUNTZ

J. B. MATTHEWS

Massed bands!

Special features!

ATTEND THIS MEETING
LET NOTHING STAND IN THE WAY

MADISON SQ. GARDEN

Appeal to Reason

The new magazine, the Appeal to Reason, edited by E. Haldeman-Julius and Joseph McCabe, is devoted to telling the truth about Fascism and Catholicism. Beginning with the first issue, the Appeal to Reason brings its subscribers a series of 25 important articles by Joseph McCabe, gathered in Italy, Spain, Austria, Germany, Poland, Yugoslavia, Mexico, and Spanish America generally, describing the activities of the twin forces of reaction—Fascism and Catholicism.

The Appeal to Reason will give space to the following 25 articles:

1. The Fascist-Catholic Menace to Our Liberties.
2. How Catholic Law Strangles Freedom.
3. The Vatican and Fascist Italy.
4. Catholics in the U. S.
5. Rome, the Enemy of Education.
6. Rome's Scandalous Record in Spain.
7. Roman Catholic Roots in anti-Semitism.
8. Political Intrigues of the Vatican.
9. When the Pope Was King.
10. Why the Roman Catholic Church Opposes Birth Control.
11. Roman Catholic Aims in Fascist Germany.
12. True Roman Catholic Doctrine on Toleration.
13. What the Roman Catholic Church Has Done for Ireland.
14. The Roman Catholic Church in Mexico and Spanish-America Generally.
15. The Roman Catholic Church's Mental Reservations and Lying.
16. Catholics and Crime, or Why Catholics Fill the Jails.
17. The Roman Catholic Church in Fascist Austria.
18. Celibacy, an Unscrupulous Policy.
19. Roman Catholicism in Poland and Russia.
20. How the Roman Catholic Church Gets Wealth and Power.
21. Are There Inferior Races?
22. Is Democracy Doomed?
23. Bunk About Ancient Wisdom.
24. How the Brain Works.
25. All About Bacteria.

LAST CALL! Act Today for Complete File!

The Appeal to Reason contains 128 large pages—5½ by 8½ inches in size—bound in neat, attractive covers. About 60,000 words per issue. Legible type. Good paper. The subscription rates for this important quarterly of world opinion and information is only $1 per year; $2 per year for Canada and foreign. A year's issues will contain about 250,000 words—for only $1. Truly a wonderful bargain for so significant a magazine. Merely write your name and address carefully on the margin and wrap this around a dollar bill. We will guarantee to begin your subscription with Vol. 1, No. 1, if you answer promptly. Remit by cash, postal money order or U. S. stamps. Add 10c to personal check. Address:

HALDEMAN-JULIUS PUBLICATIONS : BOX A-51, GIRARD, KANSAS, U.S.A.

Coming Soon

DR. TOWNSEND SOLVES IT ALL

By Raymond Gram Swing

□ PLAYS □ DEBATE □

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
for the first time
BERNARD SHAW'S new play
THE SIMPLETON of the UNEXPECTED ISLES with NAZIMOVA and ROMNEY BRENT
GUILD THEATRE, 52nd Street, West of Broadway
Evenings, 8:30; Matinees, Thurs. & Sat., 2:30

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
S. N. BEHRMAN'S play
RAIN FROM HEAVEN
with JANE COWL and JOHN HALLIDAY
GOLDEN THEATRE, 45th Street, West of Broadway
Evenings, 8:30; Matinees, Thurs. and Sat., 2:30

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
(in association with Charles B. Cochran)
for a limited engagement
ELISABETH BERGNER in ESCAPE ME NEVER
by MARGARET KENNEDY
SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway
Evenings, 8:30; Mats., Thurs. and Sat., 2:30

"A genuine contribution to the American theatre."—Gabriel, American,
HERMAN SHUMLIN presents

The Children's Hour

By LILLIAN HELLMAN
MAXINE ELLIOTT'S THEATRE WEST 39th STREET
Evenings 8:30—50c to $3. Matinees Wed. and Sat.—2:40—50c to $2.

S. HUROK presents
MICHEL CHEKHOV and MOSCOW ART PLAYERS
with P. PAVLOV
in modern Soviet and classic Russian plays

1000 Seats at 75c & $1.10
at All Performances

"REVISOR" ("The Inspector General")—Sat. Eve., Feb. 23.
"POVERTY IS NO CRIME"—Thurs., Feb. 21, Fri., Feb. 22, Sat. Mat., Feb. 23.
"CHEKHOV EVENING"—Sun., Feb. 24. Scenes from plays of Anton Chekhov with MICHEL CHEKHOV in leading roles.
"STRANGE CHILD"—a Soviet farce beginning Mon. Eve., Feb. 25.

Box Office Sale Now

MAJESTIC THEATRE 44th STREET, West of B'WAY
Tel. CHL. 4-3141

Eves. incl. Sun. 75c, $1.10, $1.65, $2.20 (incl. tax). Mats. Wed. and Sat. 55c, 75c, $1.10, $1.65 (incl. tax). EVES. 8:15. MATS. 2:15

Are Soviet Methods of Political Justice Defensible?

DEBATE

Negative Affirmative
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD JOHN HOWARD LAWSON
Editor, The Nation Playwright

Chairman: ROGER BALDWIN

SUNDAY, MARCH 3rd, at 4 P. M.
Fifth Avenue Theatre, 23th St. and Broadway

Under direction of
FRANCES GROSSEL
63 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C.

ADMISSION: 35c - 55c

is the good of drowning all the families except one if that one, eager to increase and multiply, is typical of all the rest? Yet man reproduces man just as surely as fleas reproduce fleas. The weather had hardly cleared before it began to be perfectly plain that the Flood was a failure if it had really been expected to change anything very much. Ham, Shem, Japhet, and their wives began to quarrel with one another. Their joy when they saw land was not a holy joy but a savage desire to revel and fight and kill in the good old way. If God, seeing what He saw, let them go on their way, it may have been out of His infinite patience, but perhaps it was only out of an infinite despair.

Noah was not easily or willingly skeptical. While the Ark was building he bore without complaining the cryptic nature of God's commands and the exasperatingly intermittent character of their intercourse. When land stubbornly delayed its reappearance he did what he could to keep a mutinous crew in order and to stand up for an Omnipotence of whose fairness it was impossible not to have private doubts. Indeed, he never did come any nearer to rebellion than to permit a certain desperation to creep into the accent with which he pronounced his habitual "Thy will be done." But he got little reward for all this submission. The three sons go off with their wives in different directions, leaving him alone with his weary and not too dependable wife on the rocky summit of Ararat. Even the animals, forgetting their previous fellowship, have returned to savagery, and Noah, not really meaning what he says, calls out, "I am satisfied, O God! Are you?" For answer, the rainbow flashes out in the sky and it is the most touching moment of the play. But it is also ambiguous or worse. God may be satisfied, but Noah is very obviously wondering what it is that he has reason to be satisfied with.

So much for what the play, a bit too preciously and a bit too quaintly, says. For if the truth must be told, there is rather too much padding and rather too much foolery of a not particularly inspired kind. In translation at least the whole seems somewhat languid, especially during the first two acts, and the moments of significance seem rather too widely separated. What does hold it together, however, is an inspired performance by Pierre Fresnay in the title role. Mr. Fresnay came to this country as Ivonne Printemps's leading man, but he had little opportunity to display his talents in "Conversation Piece." Now, however, it is evident that he is a remarkable actor capable of extraordinary subtlety and restraint. There is nothing spectacular about his Noah, but he gradually builds up an unforgettable picture of the troubled, kindly, and grotesque old man who is terribly lonely in his solitary loyalty to a God who makes only sporadic and casual acknowledgment of his fidelity.

I made above some reference to the inevitable comparison with "The Green Pastures," but "Noah" sadly lacks both the gusto of the former and any suggestion of the ecstasy to which it frequently rose. Indeed, the resemblances are largely superficial, for if both are in a sense pseudo-naïve, the difference is great and it lies in the fact that while the one is simply a modern jeu d'esprit, the other acquired substance and feeling from a genuine folk tradition. One may argue as much as one likes concerning the extent to which the primitive religious feeling in "The Green Pastures" had been transformed by sophisticated treatment, but the fact remains that the living core of it was the creation of the active imagination of a whole race. That is the reason why it had power of a kind which "Noah" could not possibly have. What one remembers of "The Green Pastures" is the effect of a strange, non-rational piety. What one will remember of "Noah" is a very modern skepticism and, more especially, the very human figure of a long-suffering old man whose perplexities are a little comic and more than a little touching.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Contents

| | |
|---|-----|
| EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS | 261 |
| EDITORIALS: | |
| Mr. President, Begin to Tax! | 264 |
| A National Labor Law | 265 |
| War Preparations and the Arms Inquiry | 265 |
| The Lowbrow Vote | 266 |
| ISSUES AND MEN. TWO YEARS OF ROOSEVELTIAN | |
| COMPROMISE. By Oswald Garrison Villard | 267 |
| DR. TOWNSEND SOLVES IT ALL. By Raymond Gram Swing | 268 |
| PEANUT HILL. By Leland J. Gordon | 270 |
| TERROR IN SPAIN. By Ellen Wilkinson | 272 |
| TAXATION IN THE NEW SOCIAL STATE. X. A TAX PRO- | |
| GRAM FOR THE FUTURE. By Paul Studenski | 274 |
| IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter | 276 |
| CORRESPONDENCE | 277 |
| LABOR AND INDUSTRY: | |
| "Hand and Brain." By Heywood Broun | 279 |
| Labor Notes | 280 |
| CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE | 280 |
| BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS: | |
| Panic. By Archibald MacLeish | 281 |
| Anatomy of Dickens. By William Troy | 282 |
| One Man's Road. By Mary McCarthy | 282 |
| Little Man Once More. By Dorothy Van Doren | 284 |
| Democracy and Infantry. By William Seagle | 284 |
| The Art of Poetry. By Babette Deutsch | 286 |
| Drama: Shaw for Shaw's Sake | 286 |
| Films: "Sequoia." By William Troy | 288 |

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8;
Three Years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN:
$1 a year addition.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by The Nation,
Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher.
Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation
Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

THE SENATE'S REJECTION of depressed wages in work relief may not be final, and as the President is accepting it as a challenge of his leadership we assume he can win. If he does it will not be because the country believes in depressed wages, but because no other leader is available. His promise to the Senate that he would not permit depressed wages on government projects to depress wages in private industry was particularly amateurish. How is he to prevent it? What powers are vested in him to dictate the wages in private industry? And if the general wage level sinks because the government takes the initiative in creating a low-wage mentality, any corrective he seeks to apply will be too late. We believe the President has been unhappy in his whole approach to this question. What he could have argued reasonably is that a sufficient annual income is more important to workers than high hourly rates, and that he intended, particularly in the building trades, to provide an annual income substantially higher than is being earned in many industries. He also could have shown that hourly rates in the building trades are too high to encourage large undertakings for low-cost housing, though annual earnings are low. Great political skill on his part would have chosen such arguments. A demonstration that he intended to pay adequate annual incomes would have set at rest the fear that he was going to depress wages generally.

Now the President finds himself forced to fight for a weak case, after having refused battle after battle for sound principles.

THE PRESIDENT might celebrate his mid-term anniversary by that innovation for an extrovert, a period of contemplation. He could ask himself why it is that circumstances have driven him to oppose the very people in American life and their spokesmen in the Senate who comprised the bulk of his support. He could ask himself whether he cares to be written down in history as the champion of the automobile manufacturers and newspaper publishers, for instance, or of the processors and distributors in agriculture. We do not believe he ever intended to be aligned as he now finds himself, leading the right-wing of his party against the progressives. If he can blame circumstances, he also can wonder why he has not found among his advisers more men of courage and spiritual integrity to stand up to him and reinforce his faith in his own principles. He may also feel that his secretariat, however loyal, is not of the caliber to carry the responsibilities that he imposes on it. Though he has to make all major decisions, he cannot do everything, know everything; he must be able to count on his associates for that rare combination of dependability and independence which saves a leader from his own limitations. He might regret that he has involved himself so deeply in his present right-center position that it would be hard to maneuver his way back to the left center where he began at the White House. But he will surely remember the left center as a happier political base, both for winning an election and for performing the public service that was dear to his heart.

CONSIDERABLE LIGHT is cast on the nature of American recovery by two reports which have appeared simultaneously in Washington. In the first the Federal Reserve Board estimates the level of industrial activity for January at 90 per cent of the 1923-25 average—the highest month, with three exceptions, since 1930. Employment stood at 78.6 per cent of the 1923-25 level, though the index of factory payrolls was only 64.1. In each case the figures were substantially higher than those of a year ago, which would appear to give reason for encouragement. Analysis of the figures reveals, however, that the rise is almost entirely attributable to the present boom in the automobile industry. If proper seasonal correction were made for this highly volatile industry, the index of business activity would be between 83 and 85, and if the industry were disregarded altogether, it would be no higher than a year ago. Moreover, the January figures reflected the peak of operations in the steel industry, which have already declined nearly 10 per cent from the high point. The second report—that of the NRA Research and Planning Division—shows that although payrolls in December, 1934, were only 60 per cent of the 1926 level, and the volume of production had declined by a third, "the income enjoyed by those who received dividends and interest was 50 per cent higher than in 1926."

It also points out that profits of the leading corporations had more than doubled in 1934 as compared with 1933 and had increased approximately 430,000 per cent since the first nine months of 1932. In contrast, the report contains a new estimate of unemployment showing 10,850,000 out of work in December, 1934, as compared with 13,577,000 in March, 1933, which, if accurate, would indicate that only one jobless man out of five had found work during the two years of the New Deal. On the basis of these figures no one can deny the fact of recovery; but it is all too apparent who have been the chief beneficiaries.

BY AGREEING to discuss the Eastern Locarno and related problems in addition to the proposed air pacts, the German government has once more paved the way for the organization of security in Europe. While Berlin's sudden reversal came as the result of pressure from both London and Moscow, there can be little doubt that the unexpectedly firm attitude of the Soviet government proved decisive. In a manner reminiscent of its challenge to Japan a year ago the Soviet government declared unequivocally that there can be no peace in Western Europe unless peace is simultaneously assured to Eastern Europe. That there might be no mistaking its meaning, it listed the nations favoring pacts of mutual assistance, which included all the leading countries of Europe except Germany and Poland, and suggested that even in the latter countries the masses would favor such pacts if allowed to state their views. The reason for Moscow's strong stand is obvious. It had become convinced that Germany's attempt to dodge discussion of the Eastern Locarno indicated a desire to obtain freedom of action in Eastern and Southeastern Europe in line with the policies outlined by Hitler in "Mein Kampf." It realized that if the Reich could obtain Britain's consent to such a plan, even a French alliance could not adequately protect the Soviet Union against a simultaneous attack from both Germany and Japan. Confident of France's support, it decided to stake everything on an immediate and vigorous declaration which would force both Britain and Germany to show their hands. Thus far the strategy appears to have been successful, although continuous pressure will be necessary to make Hitler accept the security pact in its entirety.

PARAGUAY has followed the example of Japan in withdrawing from the League of Nations when faced with its unqualified denunciation for waging an illegal war. But in contrast with its impotence in the face of Japan, the League is giving every indication that it will continue its struggle for an equitable solution of the Chaco conflict. The arms embargo against Bolivia has been lifted, while that against Paraguay is to be continued and strengthened. Other penalties, such as a financial blockade, are being discussed and may be imposed if the leading South American countries will consent to their enforcement. As Paraguay's withdrawal cannot be effective for two years, and then only if it has fulfilled its international commitments, continual pressure is possible. The League is open to censure for its unpardonable delay in seeking to terminate the Chaco war, which was a year old before the League took official notice of it, and possibly for the timidity which it has shown in handling the issue. But in taking a firm though belated stand now it is serving as a focus for world opinion, which after all is the League's chief function. Whether or not it will be successful in enforcing sanctions depends on a number of factors, not the least of which is the attitude of the United States. Under existing laws the United States government is powerless to control the shipment of arms to belligerent nations in violation of embargoes, or to prevent inaccurate labeling of shipments to foreign countries. Evidence introduced before the Senate Munitions Committee indicates that certain American firms have found means of circumventing the President's arms-embargo proclamation of May 28, 1934, and have shipped munitions to both parties. New legislation is required, and it should be pushed through without delay.

WILL PRESIDENT VINCENT of Haiti travel the classic route of Latin American dictators? Martial law, against which he protested so eloquently for so many years when it was imposed by United States marines, now exists by his own executive decree. Under it half a dozen Haitians have been heavily fined and given prison sentences for writings critical of his administration. No less ominous is his freely discussed purpose to break the senate opposition, to violate the constitution, and to perpetuate himself in office. Eleven out of Haiti's twenty senators—and they include men of proved integrity and devotion to the public welfare—have voted against various executive projects. Chief of these is the proposal that the Haitian government purchase the Banque d'Haiti from its owner, the National City Bank of New York, and turn over the collection of the balance of the foreign debt to the bank's six directors, four of whom, despite Haitian ownership of the bank, shall be Americans—representatives of the creditors—until the debt is extinguished. This arrangement was proposed by our State Department as preferable to the existing fiscal adviser and his corps of assistants, who are appointed by the President of the United States but paid by the Haitian treasury. Outright and unconditional withdrawal of our financial control would be still better and more in harmony with the admirable manifestations elsewhere of President Roosevelt's "good neighbor" policy.

RECENTLY PRESIDENT VINCENT held a plebiscite to secure indorsement of his policies. Needless to say he obtained it, just as our marines in 1918, through the only other plebiscite ever held in Haiti, obtained overwhelming ratification of the United States-made constitution which they desired to impose. This extra-legal device would have no significance if it were not to be used as a pretext for illegally unseating one or more of the insurgent senators and creating a legislature which not only will be the president's rubber stamp but will declare his continuation in office "indispensable" to the welfare of the nation. Reelection is forbidden by the constitution which the Haitians adopted after the coming of the Forbes commission in 1930. But President Vincent is reported to have stated recently that "the will of the people is above the constitution." That has an ominously familiar ring. A reelection, or an officially imposed candidate, means the beginning of a dictatorship, increasing ruthlessness and oppression, bloodshed and chaos. The Nation ventures the hope that Sténio Vincent will not mar his long record as a patriot and statesman by plunging his country into disaster.

ON JANUARY 7 President Roosevelt granted a sixty-day reprieve to Charles Harris, condemned to die a few days later for the murder of a notorious Washington gambler, "Milsie" Henry. The Attorney General had asked for the delay in order to give time for a study of the case. Meanwhile a number of disinterested persons have become convinced of Harris's innocence and are making every effort to prevent his execution. Among them are Charles Edward Russell; Herbert E. Gaston, assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury; Rabbi Abram Simon; Charles McNerny, representing the St. Vincent de Paul Society; Constance Leupp Todd; and various others, including several lawyers. The evidence against Harris was so slight as to make his conviction appear incredible. He was condemned to die solely on the testimony of two men who said they saw him at or near the scene of the crime. One of these witnesses asserted that Harris was in a car parked in the neighborhood of Henry's house on the day before the murder. The second asserted that he had seen Harris twice—once the night before the murder by the light of a match struck to light a cigarette; again, the following morning when he heard shots, looked out of his window, and saw a man running from Henry's car to a car in which he escaped. No other direct evidence implicating Harris was introduced.

AFFIDAVITS were presented establishing a perfectly plausible alibi for Harris, which was not upset. No effort was made to connect him with Henry or to suggest any reason for the killing. The one person who encountered the murderer face to face was unable to identify Harris as the man. The witness who did so identify him saw the escaping murderer from a window at a long angle through a leafy tree; it was at 5:30 on a dark, cloudy morning. Although he ordinarily wore glasses, he was without them on this occasion. None of the circumstantial evidence in the case tended to implicate Harris. Why was he convicted and sentenced to die on the basis of two shaky and unconvincing identifications? The answer apparently lies in sloppy and possibly corrupt police work and court procedure. The murdered gambler was known to have bitter enemies in the underworld who were presumably responsible for his death. They were able to protect the actual murderer. But a culprit was needed, and Charles Harris, a pauper with a convenient police record and no influence, was selected for the role. If he dies without an opportunity for a fair trial it will be as serious a reflection on American justice as the imprisonment of Tom Mooney or the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti.

THE THEATER UNION in a little more than one year has established itself as a fresh and significant venture. It has produced at least two outstanding plays, and by means of its low price scale it has built up a large and stable audience which gives it ample support in New York. Unfortunately, however, these low prices allow only a narrow margin of safety, and an attempt to extend its activities by means of road companies has been so disastrous financially that the Theater Union is actually threatened with insolvency. "Stevedore," which was sent on tour, played two weeks in Philadelphia, where it was successful, and six weeks in Chicago, where it lost heavily. These losses have cut so far into the Union's reserves that the production of its new play, as well as its existence as a producing organization, is threatened unless help is forthcoming. Those who wish to see the excellent work of the Theater Union continued should send contributions at once to Charles R. Walker, 103 West Fourteenth Street, New York.

THAT OLD PATRIOT, William Randolph Hearst, has done more perhaps than any other living person to preserve the worst elements in the American tradition and to introduce even more vicious new ones. For that reason we welcome the tribute paid to this great public misleader by Professor Charles A. Beard, eminent American historian, speaking before an audience of educators at Atlantic City. We quote from Professor Beard:

In the course of the past fifty years I have talked with Presidents of the United States, Senators, Justices of the Supreme Court, members of the House of Representatives, Governors, Mayors, bankers, editors, college presidents (including that great scholar and thinker Charles W. Eliot), leading men of science, Nobel prize winners in science and letters, and I have never found one single person who for talents and character commands the respect of the American people who has not agreed with me that William Randolph Hearst has pandered to depraved tastes and has been an enemy of everything that is noblest and best in our American tradition.

Professor Beard's words brought his audience to its feet in a noisy demonstration, in which school teachers cheered and professors put fingers to their mouths and whistled. We would not attempt to add to this tribute any more than we would paint the lily or daub pitch with tar. Instead we present, and indorse, an excerpt from a resolution passed at the Atlantic City celebration:

We respectfully request [the Senate committee investigating the manufacture and sale of munitions] to investigate any relationship which may exist between the Hearst newspaper, industrial, and financial interests and the spurious anti-red campaign now current in the Hearst press.

Many happy returns of the day, Mr. Hearst!

MR. HEARST has every reason to hate the Soviet Government. His primary complaint at present relates to the Soviets' lack of "news sense." Here is Mr. Hearst in the midst of a great campaign to increase circulation by the description of a great famine which is said to exist in the Soviet Union. The least the Bolsheviks could do would be to starve, if only temporarily. But instead they have prospered in a disgusting manner. According to the New York Times, meat and bread are from 15 to 40 per cent cheaper than in November, while the quality of food served in the schools and factories has notably improved. Labor turnover, always an index of economic difficulties, has fallen to the lowest point since the inauguration of the first Five-Year Plan. The output of heavy industry is running nearly 50 per cent above last year and practically 100 per cent above 1932. Collectivization is proceeding more smoothly than at any previous period, with 85 per cent of the cultivable land already brought within the socialized sector. The past year recorded the first upturn in live-stock raising since the early years of the kolhoz. In justice to Mr. Hearst's consistency, we might say, however, that none of this information was obtained from his newspapers.

Mr. President, Begin to Tax!

WE publish in this issue the concluding article of a series on taxation in the new social state. As the articles have appeared, the trend of affairs in Washington has made them seem continuously more academic. Whatever else might be expected from the Roosevelt regime, tax reform—indeed, consciousness of the purpose and power of taxation—has slipped farther and farther into the background. The New Deal has become stabilized on the basis of the few and questionable achievements of its first year, such as the triple A and the NRA, with only the addition of a program of social security which is both badly conceived and is to be financed in the main by the traditional method of taxing consumption, hence the poor. The redistribution of wealth, which the President eloquently promised in the early days of his administration, is put off, his friends say, until his second term on the ground that our national income is still too low. Professor Studenski, in the concluding article of the series, asserts that this delay is neither necessary nor wise. Now that the decline of business has been stopped and in some sectors there is even some improvement, the start can be made, and since a concrete policy of social taxation is by all odds the most important element of both reform and recovery, essential to the very survival of our economic system, we urge the Administration to lose no time in squaring off to this fundamental task.

We recommend this knowing the difficulties. As a people we never have understood the elementary simplicities of taxation. Money needed by the state has come chiefly from direct taxation on real property and from indirect taxation on consumption. Neither device recognizes the principle of the ability to pay. Both systems have built up rather than broken down the accumulation of wealth by the wealthy. The most vicious of all sales taxes, the tariff, has created vested interests which appear to be stronger than the government. As the problems of finance have increased during the depression, taxation has been applied locally with a blind fury, on incomes, on consumption, on anything within the reach of the tax collector, without scheme, thought, or reason. The resulting picture is one of chaos. Order can be restored only by authority, and the authority in this field must come from the federal government. It must not be oppressive, and it must above all carry out a definite social philosophy, the need for which should by now be apparent to every thoughtful person. The nation is suffering from a maldistribution of economic privileges. It may be ruined by it, and it certainly cannot be saved unless the corrective is quickly, courageously, and wisely applied.

We have said this before, and have also been reproached by some readers for not being more specific. With the conclusion of our series we now join with Professor Studenski in a number of concrete proposals:

1. Immediate increase of taxation to yield at least half a billion dollars.
2. Increase of inheritance tax rates, the lowest tax-free inheritance to be certainly not more than $25,000, and life insurances above this figure to be subject to the tax. The maximum inheritance to be not larger than $5,000,000.

3. Income tax rates to be increased, and exemptions reduced.

4. Taxes on corporation incomes and unused surpluses to be increased.

5. Indirect taxation to be gradually abolished, particularly the sales tax, except for a gross-receipts tax at a fraction of 1 per cent.

6. An amendment of the Constitution to permit the taxation of the income of all federal, state, and municipal bonds, which thereafter are not to be issued free of tax.

7. Machinery to be established for a coordination of federal, state, and local taxation and budgets; and a system to be developed for a unified collection of all taxes with a standard policy for the division of receipts.

8. A tax policy to be adopted by which government reserves may be accumulated in times of active business to retire the debt incurred in times of less active business.

9. A long-term policy of social taxation to be worked out looking to the expansion of social services, including unemployment and health insurance, old-age pensions, and education.

10. Power to be given to the Administration to apply a capital levy immediately an inflation sets in.

The first purpose of such a program is to place the burden of the cost of government on the shoulders of those able to bear it. It is not there now. And as long as it is not there, the cost of government itself becomes a means of increasing the disproportionate power of wealth. A society which finances itself by impoverishing the poor and correspondingly enriching the wealthy cannot endure. The process is self-destructive. It ultimately must breed revolt, and then lead to the sacrifice of democracy in averting the revolt, which is the road to fascism. Our proposals are not radical in the sense that they would be rejected by many of the most able defenders of capitalism, who know that capitalism cannot survive unless it adjusts itself to social realities. Its second purpose is to use the taxing power intelligently, distributing the wealth of the nation so that it benefits the whole nation. It is a practical program; it includes the amortization of debt; it offers a method for averting the catastrophe of inflation. It foresees the expansion of social services, which are the best promises for that rising standard of life which ought to be the American inheritance. It is a program we commend to the President. We believe that he would find a majority for it in Congress, including all progressives and most of those who were elected primarily as legislators of the New Deal. It would realize the abstract principles which this country believed to be implicit in the New Deal when it gave the President his impressive mandate last November. We warn him not to wait two years more before beginning to use the taxing power of the government. It is, to begin with, an abrogation of the chief powers of the social state. And the delay is demoralizing; in two years we may be so lulled by the ease of borrowing that we cannot rally to the hard truths of sound finance. To wait is to gamble. There is no gamble in beginning now.

A National Labor Law

ALMOST coincidentally with the President's message to Congress asking that the National Recovery Administration be retained in substantially its present form for at least another year, Senator Wagner introduced his industrial-disputes bill, which he calls the National Labor Relations Act, and which provides for considerable modification of the labor provisions of the NIRA. Although Senator Wagner probably need not expect the support of either Mr. Roosevelt or Secretary Perkins—who prefers to keep industrial-disputes machinery under the aegis of the Department of Labor—his bill is in many respects admirably devised to eliminate the weaknesses of the present methods of dealing with labor troubles, and it deserves not only the support of the A. F. of L., which indeed it has, but of every employer who honestly wants to live on a democratic footing with his employees.

The most important provision of the bill goes to the heart of the present difficulty in that it proposes an independent labor board with exclusive and definite authority, subject to review by the courts, to interpret and enforce the laws dealing with collective bargaining. The existing National Labor Relations Board, although its personnel has been able, honest, and just, has been woefully without power or status. Its decisions have been presented as recommendations to the President through the Department of Labor; its powers have been shared by various code, industrial, and other boards, none of them having clearly defined authority, and by no means all of them possessing the confidence of the parties to a given dispute. Although his bill does not specifically say so, Senator Wagner evidently intends that his new board should supersede such special agencies as the Automobile Labor Board and the Newspaper Industrial Board. This is obviously the only way by which a consistent, just, and effective body of labor law can be built up.

The second most important provision of the bill is that giving a permanent, statutory form to labor's right to bargain collectively. Section 7-a of the NIRA may or may not be left in the various codes. Under the new labor act collective bargaining would be guaranteed to workers, and employers would be prohibited once for all from imposing restraint on employees who wished to make collective agreements. In restating the provisions of Section 7-a, the proposed law lays down clearly defined restrictions against company unions. No organization which was established at the instigation of an employer, which exists through his connivance, or which receives material support from him may make a collective agreement. The company union may continue to exist as a welfare agency or for the adjustment of grievances, but it is inoperative for the purposes of collective bargaining. This provision, of course, goes directly counter to the principles laid down by President Roosevelt in creating his Automobile Labor Board. But it is obvious that collective bargaining can function only when the labor organization is free of all possibility of coercion or influence on the part of the employer.

The bill cuts through a mass of muddled thinking and forthrightly establishes majority rule as the principle which must be followed in the determination of the bargaining unit.

Despite the opponents of this principle, who seek to complicate and confuse the issue by posing problematical cases in which majority rule seems unworkable, it is clearly the best possible method of settling this vexing point. Minority groups may, of course, meet with their employer for the purpose of adjusting agreements. But this is not collective bargaining, nor should it be called so by any responsible government agency. When no group in a given plant has a majority, the proposed board shall have power to determine what the bargaining unit shall be, and to enforce its orders through the courts if necessary. The board is also given powers of arbitration and investigation when a trade agreement is in process of being made.

Almost the last sentence in the bill declares: "Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike." This clause as much as any other will continue to win for the bill the determined opposition of the National Association of Manufacturers and similar groups. Only the most vigorous championship by the proponents of labor will succeed in forcing consideration of a measure that on the whole promises an admirable beginning in the more equal distribution of economic power in industry.

War Preparations and the Arms Inquiry

MANY Americans must have rubbed their eyes in amazement when they read on the front page of their favorite newspaper that the House of Representatives had voted approval of the War Department's share of a budget appropriation of $792,000,000 for defense in the coming fiscal year—a rise of 26 per cent since 1933 and the largest in fifteen years. To those who have been accustomed to think of the United States as an essentially peace-loving nation, this sudden frenzy of war preparation seems inexplicable. Our present army and navy is more than adequate to protect our soil against any enemy or combination of enemies. If reserves and training planes are included, we possess the largest military air force in the world, with approximately 50 per cent more planes than our nearest rival. Yet the new budget calls for the construction of 547 new planes by the War Department at a cost of $7,686,000, and additional provision is made for an expansion of the naval air force. The army's somewhat grandiose plan for the establishment of a dozen new air bases throughout the United States and its possessions has been shelved for the moment, but will doubtless reappear before the end of the present session of Congress. And although no armed force could possibly invade our territory, the President is granted discretionary authority to increase the size of the standing army from 118,750 to 165,000 men, and to add 5,000 to the National Guard.

If a proposal of this nature had been presented at any time in the last dozen years, it would have provoked a veritable avalanche of protests from organized peace groups throughout the country. While the peace movement has never been successful in forcing a genuine reduction in armament, it has unquestionably served as a check on the ambitions of professional militarists and armament firms. Despite its pressure, total expenditures for national defense rose from $591,000,000 in 1926 to $703,000,000 in 1930-1931, but declined to $628,000,000 in 1933-1934. In the latter year, however, President Roosevelt neatly sidestepped the peace lobby by appropriating $238,000,000 for naval construction out of PWA funds. Viewed in retrospect, this maneuver appears to have marked the turning-point in the influence of the pacifist movement in this country. Taken by surprise the peace organizations capitulated with surprisingly little resistance. Encouraged by the ease with which this coup was accomplished, an additional $612,000,000 was diverted from public works to military purposes this year, and $20,000,000 for an airdrome in Hawaii, Pacific Coast defenses, and army housing is to be included in next year's government-works program.

The apparent collapse of the peace movement is the more distressing because of the powerful weapon placed in its hand by the Senate munitions investigations. In the past few weeks the Nye committee has brought forth considerable evidence to indicate that the navy allotted its construction under the PWA grant to the "Big Three" of shipbuilding—the Newport News, Bethlehem, and New York Corporations—according to a prearranged agreement. Similar collusion on the part of the "Little Three"—the Federal Shipbuilding Corporation, the United Drydocks Company, and the Bath Iron Works—appears to have occurred in connection with destroyer bids. In the case of the Newport News Company it has been admitted that the corporation made a profit of approximately $5,600,000, or 35 per cent, on the construction of two cruisers. Evidence was also produced showing that certain shipping companies were approached for contributions to the Democratic campaign fund, and that the companies employed men reputed to have influence with the Administration to arrange naval contracts.

Yet at the very moment when these disclosures are being made, terrific pressure is being exerted from some quarter for the extension of American armaments. It is being exerted without even the pretense that the United States is in danger of attack from abroad. Has the thought occurred to anyone that the inquiry—commendable though it is—may be merely serving to divert attention from the real issue of the moment? The revelations of the Nye committee deal entirely with the past. The American people do not know what particular groups are active at this moment seeking to impose this unprecedented program of military and naval expansion, and they have no way of finding out unless the one group which has power to investigate—the Nye committee—should suddenly turn its attention to this issue. We realize that this may seem an unreasonable suggestion. The committee has been deeply engaged in its present investigations and would find it difficult suddenly to shift to new fields. Nevertheless some such action is imperative. If steps are not taken to stem the tide of war preparations we shall find ourselves in much the position that Germany was in in 1914—tempted to use the prestige and power conferred by our military prowess as an instrument of foreign policy. This can only be averted by throwing the searchlight of publicity on the interests that are seeking to transform this country into a preeminent military power.

The Lowbrow Vote

SPEAKING before an association of deans of women at Mount Holyoke College, Mrs. Eleanor Rowland Wembridge warned her hearers against depending too much upon appeals to the intellect. Educators, she said, were losing their hold upon public opinion because they refused to realize the extent to which the public is swayed by its emotions and because they allowed themselves to become too far removed from the "primary instincts." Even college students, she warned, are more often guided by an emotional force than by cool intelligence, and the teacher who expects to influence his students must know how to use an appeal to the emotions even if he does not himself respect it. And what is true of the teacher is true, a fortiori, of the political leader. It is because the intellectual relies upon intelligence that the masses are guided not by him but by the Longs, the Coughlins, and the Townsends—"demagogues who understand the emotional type."

There is nothing particularly new about the warning, but it has a peculiar force when it comes from Mrs. Wembridge. She was formerly the dean of Mount Holyoke and is at present referee of the juvenile court in Cleveland. What is much more important, she is the author of a volume called "Life Among the Lowbrows," which ought to be, if it is not already, a classic. No more shrewd, realistic, and at the same time compassionate study of the sub-average man and woman has ever been made. There, not in terms of intelligence quotients and statistics but in terms of concrete incidents, is presented the plight of the human being whose mind is simply not equal to the demands of contemporary urban life. No wonder that Mrs. Wembridge, who has seen so many individuals hopelessly involved in financial difficulties simply because they could not add, and who has struggled so often with the impossible task of teaching elementary morality to persons who think that "skill" means "something you cook in," should doubt the efficacy of purely intellectual appeals addressed to the great mass.

For all that, however, the problem is not one which it is easy to face. In the first place, one wonders whether the intelligent and well-meaning intellectual can ever really beat the demagogue at his own game, whether his deliberate attempt to appeal to the simpler emotions can ever be as successful as the demagogue's instinctive, and therefore more apt, use of the same methods. In the second place, democracy can hardly base itself upon the assumption that the majority of citizens are impervious to reason; for if they have to be manipulated, then the manipulation of the dictator—whether of the right or of the left—seems obviously to promise greater efficiency. It is true that few supporters of democracy still pretend to believe that the voice of the people is the voice of God or that the vote of the average man is guided by wisdom inherent in averageness. Their only argument is a pragmatic one: up to recently, at least, democracy has worked rather better than any consideration of what average intelligence amounts to would seem to promise. Possibly the events of the next decade will dispose of that pragmatic argument, but until it is actually disposed of it is hard to accept the suggestion that democratic leaders should frankly abandon faith in the appeal to reason.

Issues and Men

Two Years of Rooseveltian Compromise

PERHAPS this headline is not correct. In the first half of his rule, certainly, Franklin Roosevelt made more decisions, and vastly more important ones, than ever before in his career. He rose to his opportunity and to the needs of the hour in a way to surprise, delight, and astound many who had known him for years. But as time has passed we are witnessing again the emergence of that philosophy of compromise we came to know so well under Theodore Roosevelt. The present President goes first to the left, then to the right. At one time he attacks a group; next he seeks to appease it. This is so obvious that everybody is dwelling on it. The questions we may well ask as Franklin Roosevelt reaches mid-term are whither this policy of compromise is leading us, and whether the President himself is as strong as he was a year ago.

Recently an old and valued friend, who is often a welcome visitor to the White House, took me to task for my criticisms of the President's playing of politics, especially by and with Postmaster General Farley. It was largely necessary, she declared. But for his skilful treatment of the politicians and the press and his use of his patronage he could not have accomplished what he has. "Look at Congress," she went on. "It is getting out of hand occasionally now. It is opposed to many of the things for which the President stands. I know that the people voted overwhelmingly for him last fall, but the politicians are different. He owes a great debt to Farley and he could hardly get on without him." In its essence this is the old doctrine that has wrought such havoc in our political life during all the years that I have been writing about issues and men—the doctrine that a "good man" in office may stoop to the tricks of the ordinary spoils politician in order to advance his causes. The inference is that if the President were to take the idealistic course, hew straight to the line, and accept defeat at various points rather than to compromise and trim and further intrench the system of spoils politics, the country would be far worse off, and the problem of rebuilding America under the stress and strain of the economic crisis would be so entangled as gravely to endanger economic and political stability. That argument, too, is as old as the hills. The only new thing about it is the injection of the words "economic crisis." In its every other aspect it is familiar, having been made so by none more than by Theodore Roosevelt, who could tell by a glance—at his campaign contributions—whether a captain of industry was a "malefactor of great wealth" or an ardent devotee of the cause of the people.

Well, let us assume for the moment that this is the correct philosophy. Where has it got Franklin Roosevelt at the end of the second year of his Presidency? The simple truth is that he is far weaker today than he was a year ago, despite that unprecedented triumph at the polls last fall. The use of Farley and the offices, together with the policy of good Lord, good Devil, has not made Congress more subservient. It did not prevent the President's defeat on the World Court. As I write, the fate of his $4,800,000,000 relief-work bill is in doubt. Even more important is the fact that the reconstruction program is being checked or is collapsing all along the line. The NRA has gone down because of this same policy of compromising first on this code and then on that, of upholding the National Industrial Labor Board one day and reversing it the next, of being stoutly for labor one day and opposed the next. The policy of compromise has, in short, weakened and sabotaged the President's own program, which could only have succeeded by exalted leadership, clear cut, consistent, and courageous.

Most serious of all is that progressives everywhere, especially in the government, are dismayed and downcast. They rallied to the President's support the minute he outlined his progressive program. They spoke, fought, and labored for him—often at considerable personal sacrifice. As I meet them now they are one and all shattered, especially by the so-called "purge" in the AAA. I think Raymond Swing's analysis of that action in The Nation of February 20 one of the most remarkable pieces of political correspondence I have ever read. But not even he could estimate the damage that particular bit of compromise has done to the President throughout the country in quenching the enthusiasm and smashing the faith of the Administration's most worthwhile supporters. Even the liberal press, which was at first enthusiastic for the President, is beginning to take another tack. It rarely happens that a reporter like Arthur Krock, of the Washington office of the New York Times, goes so far as to say in a public address that the President's press conferences are a snare and a delusion, and that their real purpose seems to be mystification if not deceit. If that is what the policy of compromise leads to, I plump here again for the enemy-creating, defeat-inviting forthrightness of Grover Cleveland.

The pity of it is that in Franklin Roosevelt's case it was all so unnecessary. He has been like Meade and his generals after Gettysburg. They had won an enormous victory and did not know what to do with it. Had they followed Lee they would have caught him demoralized and shattered with a swollen and unfordable river at his back, and could have wiped out the Army of Northern Virginia two years before Appomattox. The people of the United States placed their future in Mr. Roosevelt's hands by a formal vote last November and he has not known how to profit by his victory. What will come of it all? Only one thing is certain: this Rooseveltian policy of compromise is having its try-out once and for all. The question is no longer merely whether it can bring about economic rehabilitation, but whether, through the falsity and weakness of its political philosophy, it will not lead us squarely to an American fascism.

Isabel Garrison Villard

Dr. Townsend Solves It All

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

THE story of Dr. Townsend the humanitarian, as distinguished from the economist, is sweet and wholesome. Here is a man who wants to help the aged, help the country, help the whole human race, and who does not aspire to dominate anybody. He has no philosophy of repression, he leads no cult of reform-via-terror. He has lived the typical life of the faithful, sub-successful American professional worker. As a young man he was badly battered in the struggle to begin a career. He worked with tenacious courage to obtain an education, and did not get his medical degree until he was thirty, known to the rest of his class as "Dad." He performed his duties as a physician with the unpraised loyalty of the great majority of that profession. He contemplated his own experiences and the life he saw about him; it made him wretched, and he strained after a solution that should end the tragedy in which he saw his fellow-beings enfolded. And he hit upon the solution. Nothing could be more American. As a nation we were created by such men, who toiled, suffered, and dreamed, and were filled with the faith of dreams. Utopians have written many forgotten chapters in the growth of America. Always we have progressed in two directions simultaneously, building a massive materialism which outdid anything on the face of the earth, and projecting castles in the air, like a great confession to heaven that our material life was not sound. In the heart of nearly all unweaned Americans lies the waiting Utopian, aching to believe in the New Jerusalem, certain that there must be just one wise answer to all the problems of economics and politics if only it could be found.

Dr. Townsend found it. No matter, for the moment, that his answer is wrong. In finding it, he gave expression to the great mass of Americans who, like him, are obsessed with the tragedy of life, desperately desirous of helping all humanity, and certain that there must be a short-cut solution which will clear up everything and make everybody happy. That is why the case of Dr. Townsend is an exceptionally illuminating success story. He is the incarnation of the American Utopian, he is a salient bit of American history marching on, and he is the revelation of the submerged half of the twofold nature of Americans, the half which sees in dreams what it cannot find in reality.

His success is really not phenomenal; it only seems so to those who do not appreciate what Americans are made of. Today he leads millions of them. I am told that 25,000,000 Americans have signed petitions to Congress for the enactment of the Townsend plan. I doubt if anyone has actually tabulated so many signatures, but that is beside the point. Put it this way: more people have signed up for the plan than have signed up for any other specific measure before this or any other Congress. Three thousand Townsend clubs have been formed in about six months. Huge Townsend meetings are daily occurrences. And the doctor has real hopes that Congress will be forced to adopt his plan, or one essentially like it. Certainly more letters have poured into the Congressional office buildings this year demanding the plan than ever came in asking for anything else. They have already so changed the thinking on what an old-age pension ought to be that the $30 a month in the Administration's security program, really an expensive figure, looks positively niggardly.

Dr. Townsend does not deserve to be ranked with the demagogues, except in the first definition given in Webster's dictionary: "a leader or orator popular with or identified with the people," a meaning marked "obsolete or historical." When the great idea of revolving pensions welled up in his brain he did not believe it was going to make him dictator of America, or even President, despite his having been born in an Illinois log cabin. It simply seemed to him an inspiration destined to cure all America's economic ills by a single operation. As the idea spread, and as he emerged as a national figure, no one was more surprised than the Doctor himself; and let it be said for him that he has assumed prominence with becoming calm and modesty. Ideas of grandeur may creep into his mind, for certainly he has been tempted by his admirers with promises of great power. But he gives the impression that his head has not been turned. If anything he is more ingenuous than ever, sincerely grateful that his idea has brought hope to millions of people, and not a little bewildered when experts tell him that his scheme might wreck the nation instead of saving it. For he has only the single desire to serve, to do good, to relieve suffering mankind. To be depicted as a menace is to him a distressingly undeserved experience.

Francis Everett Townsend was born sixty-eight years ago in Fairbury, Illinois, one of a family of seven children; his father was the grandson of the Peter Townsend who swung the great chain across the Hudson River in the Revolutionary War to keep the British warships from reaching New York. He had a local education, and left home for more years of an Odyssey than most young men experience. He roamed over a good part of the country, in and out of work. He tried his shoulders at homestead farming in Kansas, teaching school to eke out an existence. But he left this, via freight train for Colorado, and much later, at twenty-six, appeared at the Omaha Medical School with $100 cash and an insistence on obtaining a medical education. The dean got him some bookkeeping, also the lawn-cutting and furnace-tending woven into so many American educations, and at last he took a seven-mile newspaper route and delivered the World-Herald each day for $3.75 a week, a sum which made it possible for him to graduate at thirty. He soon was practicing in the Bearlodge country of the Black Hills, on the fringe of cowboy and mining-town violence, and he remained there for years, living on as strong a diet of crude reality as even a benevolent physician could endure. There he met his future wife, Mrs. Minnie Bogue, a nurse in the hospital where he and his partner centered their practice. After years of hard life he decided to migrate to California. Thus he finished the span of the continent which his forefathers began. Nothing in this career foretold the astonishing celebration lying in wait for him in his old age. Mrs. Townsend was a widow with a child of seven when they married. The Townsends had twins, who died, and then a son, now in college. They adopted a daughter, now eighteen. The new home was at Long Beach, where for years he was assistant in the health department. And here he would have remained and died nationally unnoticed had not the great idea of revolving pensions burst upon his mind.

The occasion, as he himself has told it, was the sight of three old women sifting through the contents of a garbage can for usable scraps. He watched them, then he straightened to his full, lean length and let out a cry of terrible rage, which brought his wife rushing into the room. He was shouting out profanity, with what old-fashioned religious folk call "righteous indignation." The sight of the miserable old women set his mind to working out the social remedy. And the Townsend revolving-pensions plan was conceived in the fire of his wrath. His mind often had roamed over the field of injustice to parents, who give their contribution to youth often to be rewarded in old age with neglect and penury. Beginning with this injustice the revolving-pension idea grew to be a corrective of the entire economic maladjustment of the depression.

The plan itself is really two plans, one to reward the aged, the other to create business and cure unemployment. It is not always understood that the second part does not rely on the first at all. The same effect on business would be felt if any eight million persons of any age were removed from production and given $200 a month under pledge to spend it in thirty days. It would have the same consequences if the money were paid, say, to all the members of the American Legion and their relatives, or to all young people between twenty and thirty. The only reason the two plans come together is that Dr. Townsend thought of the second part trying to devise some way of satisfying the first part. But since the two parts are not usually considered separately, the economic analysis is cluttered up with the sentimental appeal of doing something for the old folks. Since it is highly desirable to relieve them, somehow the economics of big revolving pensions becomes highly desirable.

At first the Townsend plan was to raise the money for the pensions by a straight sales tax of 15 per cent. This was changed later to a tax of 2 per cent on each business transaction. The Townsendites refuse to quibble about the percentage. They do not care what it is if it provides the revenue to get the money into circulation. They are not even clear about what a business transaction is. Reckoned one way, the number of business transactions in the United States would not yield more than one-third of the funds needed. Reckoned another, it would yield more than enough. But this, too, is immaterial to them. They are sure the money can be raised by a tax, as of course it can be if consequences are ignored. And the tax, strangely enough, is not on wealth—incomes are the most easily taxable wealth—but on business transactions, in other words, ultimately on consumption. And once consumption is taxed, the burden rests on the whole body of consumers, so that the vast mass of those who consume in small portions pay the great bulk of the tax, and are correspondingly poorer. The result is that the income of the masses is divided up, those with little being left with even less, those with much retaining more than their fair share.

The Townsend thinkers profess not to be nonplussed by this description of what would happen under the revolving-pension idea. They argue that if the country can start out with two billion dollars of money which has to be spent in a month, this will create so much consuming power that production will begin, the unemployed will find work, and the creation of true wealth will set in, to be heaped up as the spending of money produces new activity. Their confusion lies in the belief that they are tapping sources of wealth which now are idle. They are not creating wealth but redistributing it. And their redistribution is not even a good one, since the money spent by the old folks would be derived chiefly from the poorer part of the community. If the plan would take wealth from those who have more than their social share and give it to those who have less than their social share, the tax would be not on consumption but on large incomes and inheritances. But no tax on these sources would raise anything like enough to pay Townsend pensions, or indeed pensions of any real generosity. Obviously the Townsend plan would have been based on this kind of taxation if it could produce the required revenue. It should be equally obvious that since no other source of distributable wealth exists, printing money to launch the scheme would not create it. And if everything is taxed at every phase of the manufacture and distribution of goods, the money cost of the article will increase. By the Townsend plan pensioned people would receive their money out of the incomes, chiefly, of the poor, and what they received would depreciate in value so that $200 might become $100, or $75, or $50, or even less. And at the same time the great mass of the population would be receiving correspondingly less for its wages and salaries. The moral, of course, is that you cannot create wealth by dividing wealth. What you can do is distribute such wealth as exists on a far more equitable basis. But this is not what Dr. Townsend—or yet President Roosevelt—proposes to do.

If Dr. Townsend changed his plan so that it really redistributed wealth, he would have to drop the $200 conception. Pension schemes are costly. In Great Britain, where the old-age pension is a mere $10 a month, to which every eligible man, woman, and child contributes, from sixteen to sixty-five, along with their employers, and of which the state also pays a share, it is estimated that the cost to the government after eighty years, when the contributory system will have been working for two generations, will still be $435,000,000 a year. The British scheme, transplanted to this country, would cost the Treasury nearly three times as much because of the larger population, and a $30 pension would cost the country nine times as much, or about four billions a year. These are realities. Larger pensions can be paid only if there is more real wealth to tax. And if any government tries to increase pensions before real taxable wealth has increased, it will be simply depreciating its currency, and hoaxing people with the false numerals on its coin. The one really meritorious economic argument in the Townsend plan is that in the first months it would set unemployed people to work through public spending. But what difference, except in speed, is there between the spending by old folks and the spending at standard wages by the government? When unemployed people, now on relief, go back to work at wages higher than their relief, they add to the national income by the difference between their wages and relief. That is the creation of wealth, the only possible creation of new wealth in our present society.

But Dr. Townsend, in believing that magic can be worked with money, is in the true American tradition. European radicals feel the class struggle more poignantly than it was felt in America so long as there was an expanding frontier. Our radicalism has tried to obtain cheap money, free silver, inflation, rather than to win in the fundamental conflict of employee against employer. That is no doubt natural, since financial radicalism, nearly always disguised inflation, is an assault on capital and a mass attempt to reduce the burden of debt. Debt was always the curse as well as the blessing of an expanding continent. The Townsend plan, strictly speaking, is not inflationary after the first month. Thereafter it becomes the redistribution of purchasing power. In so far as it increased the velocity of money it would increase somewhat the actual volume of purchases. But it would in the main be a flow of purchasing power from one section of the lower level of society to another section of the same level, the pensioned old folks, and the wealth which Dr. Townsend blithely assumes would rise to towering heights would not be amassed. The result would be so disappointing that inflation undoubtedly would be resorted to in order to make it appear more successful.

Dr. Townsend himself is not so significant as the importunate credulity he reveals in the American nation. Six years ago, during good times, he could not have obtained 25,000 signatures for his plan. Now the masses are ready to believe, and—a point worth stressing—they will not be satisfied with anything a great deal more sober. It is dissatisfaction with the attainable which leads to fanaticism and at last to social fury. There was nothing quite so fantastic in Hitler's program during his propaganda days as the Townsend plan, though it was woven of the same thread of fantasy and in the same ignorance of economics. But the people who listened to it did not criticize it. They preferred to believe. And when great masses are ready to believe the impossible, that is an ominous political fact. In this sense, the danger is not Dr. Townsend, who in himself is as harmless as a dove, but that so many millions accept his plan. At his age it is highly doubtful whether he ever will lead a political movement, or even combine with other demagogic movements as one of a coalition. He is sure to offer a temptation to the radical aspirants to dictatorship, who see a chance to pick up the Townsend following at a cheap price. By nature Dr. Townsend would not care to have traffic with them. His sympathies now lie with the progressives, the more progressive the better. And it may be that in the end the progressives will undertake to redraft his scheme in Congress, and see what can emerge in the way of pensions financed not out of consumption but out of incomes and inheritances. If they do that it would become a purely social measure, it would not do much for recovery, and it would not be the yearned-for panacea for the whole woe of the world. It would be just another great disillusionment, of which there have been so many in American Utopianism.

Peanut Hill

By LELAND J. GORDON

PEANUT HILL is a typical sore spot in our economic system. Perched on a hill, silhouetted against the setting sun, are ten shacks whose barren walls conceal human tragedy and symbolize the failure of a system. From the hilltop one can look across the surrounding valleys of Belmont County, Ohio, and see other camps—Dogtown, Black Oak, and Virginia Hills—where other unwanted miners and their families look into a future that is black and blank.

For some of the men there is occasional work, but for most of them there is none. For most of the families there is some relief, but for some there is none. Years of starvation have strewn the hillsides and valleys with diseased and dying victims. This letter just came to me from one of the men in Dogtown:

i have three children going to school they havent hardly anything to were they havent eny swetter nothing but a thin coat they have bin going to school without eny stockings it has been quite cold some mornings jane is 16 martha 13 herbert 11 i have been sick for over one year on direct relief just enuf to keep from starving i dont have eny money to bye clothing . . . i havent had clothing to fit to go to church since the strike in '27 i am a miner after the strike i couldnt get work in the mines they wont hire men over fifty years old.

This man, like many others in that coal area, has tuberculosis. Last winter his family lived largely on bean soup, made with a handful of beans, at ten pounds for a quarter, in a gallon of water. The children had no bedding until Denison University students gave each one a single blanket.

As he sits on his doorstep this man looks across the valley to the "Big Five" mine, which will never open again. When he worked, miners were paid 28 cents a ton, but in a nearby mine they are paid 13 cents a ton and so short-weighted that the director of county relief told me they had to weigh out on the average 6,000 pounds to get credit for a ton. For the shacks in which they live they pay the company $8 a month. If they fall in arrears, 50 per cent of their next pay is held back for rent. On Charles Harris's last three pay days he has received 92, 94, and 96 cents! In three years the most he has made in a two-week period is $6.40.

On rainy nights the people cannot sleep, for the only dry spots in their houses are in the corners where they huddle. On cold winter days I have been in many of these houses when the chill wind was blowing through the broken windows and door cracks untempered by any artificial heat. These people are not allowed even to pick waste coal on the slack piles; they must buy it for 14 cents a bushel.

When a mine closes, as many have done in the past three years, each one throwing from 150 to 500 men out of work, the houses are sold to salvaging companies for as little as $20 each. The occupants are turned out into an August sun or a February blizzard. Some go to the homes of relatives or friends, already overcrowded, or to a place like Peanut Hill, where the houses have been abandoned and they can live rent free. If a corporation should take 500 men and their families to an isolated island to work a mine, and then when the mine ran out lay off the men, tear down the houses, dismantle the mine, and leave the 1,500 persons to shift for themselves on a barren soil, we should all cry to heaven against such inhumanity. Yet in effect that is exactly what has happened time and again in these coal fields.

Those who have any cash to spend in company and local stores find prices higher than in the average Ohio town. While others of us pay 12 cents a pound for lard, 2 cents a pound for cabbage, and 14 cents a pound for salt pork, they have to pay 16, 3, and 27 cents a pound for these articles. While they pay 30 cents a peck for potatoes, we pay 15; and they pay $1.10 for a twenty-four-pound bag of flour compared with our price of 87 cents. I have known many a family which had no yeast to use with flour and no salt for its potatoes.

Who is responsible for these conditions? Certainly not the miners. With few exceptions they are men who have worked hard when there was work and saved when there was anything to save. Joseph Marcella once owned a store whose profits were invested in real estate and had a bank account. When the depression came he carried his customers, as he had done before, until he could no longer meet his obligations. When the bank took his houses and business he went into the mines. On his twenty-ninth day of work a rock slide crushed his leg. He will never work again. Today his family and his children's families are destitute.

Angelo Springetti worked in the mines from 1904 to 1930 when a runaway car crushed and cut him so badly that 103 stitches were required on his face and head. His vision is blurred and his back permanently injured. For a few months he received total-disability compensation based on his average wage of $509 a year, but he was soon reduced to partial disability, which yields $6 a week for himself and six dependents, and steps are now being taken to compel him to admit his full recovery by reporting for work—when there is no work—although he cannot walk fifty feet without support.

For three long years Jack Knizek has lain in bed fighting a losing struggle with tuberculosis. Three brothers have already died and his younger brother is afflicted. The county doctor has told him he can never get well unless he has good care—and altitude. But so far all efforts to get him into a county sanitarium have failed.

All these men ask for is a chance to work for a living wage. But that they cannot get. Thousands of men in the state are apparently condemned to a life of helpless poverty. They are not wanted, but cannot move. If they could move, where would they go?

The operators will of course deny any responsibility for these conditions. They are engaged in a fiercely competitive business in which they have staked their own capital and that of others. It is imperative for them to cut money costs regardless of human costs. When the mine is working, labor cost must be kept to a minimum, and when the mine runs out, costs must be cut by discharging men and by salvaging machinery, track, and houses. Where the displaced miners are to live is their problem, not the operators'. How they are to buy food and clothing is also their problem. If they go hungry and cold and fall sick, it is unfortunate, but the profit system makes no provision for them. If they starve for lack of food or die because they have no medicine, there is no alternative, for the grocer must have his money and the doctor must be paid before he will leave his office. Boyd's Dispatch says there are 1,384 persons in the county whose annual income is in excess of 5,000 dollars, but these discarded miners are not entitled to any income in a profit system because they are not needed.

One might also say they are not wanted. Not many persons would deliberately say, "Let them starve," yet our failure to provide organized means for supplying the minimum physical needs of these victims is an unspoken expression of that view. When Mr. Hoover was asking the electorate to return him to office and telling it that "none shall suffer from hunger or cold," there were thousands so suffering; thousands more were added the following winter. What did they do? Who took care of them? The Red Cross, that "Great Mother"? Not in Belmont, Jefferson, or Harrison counties. One county lost its Red Cross charter because it failed to raise its quota. The state relief commission? Not effectively.

Where does the relief money go? One worker told me that almost the entire proceeds of one bond issue, amounting to $2,000 for that township, were spent for back funeral expenses. Most of the funerals are a charge upon the county and by the time they are paid for there is nothing left with which to buy groceries. What a vicious circle! Not enough money to keep people alive because they die so fast. Another township in the same county had only $200 a month for relief, which was spread over forty families, some with seven children, at $5 a month. CWA road work has helped some men to the extent of $3.10 a day for four or five days a month. Some men had to walk twelve miles to get this work!

Has the NRA helped? The answer seems to be that those who are employed are better off but those who are unemployed are worse off. Prices are higher and relief funds are smaller. The people who suffer the most are those off the beaten paths in such out-of-the-way places as Peanut Hill and Dogtown. Others near the county seat fare better. If not, they can get to town to complain. But those in the remote camps have to travel twenty miles to the courthouse, and there is little likelihood that a county nurse or investigator will call. Nor do they have anyone to represent them effectively.

What does the future hold for the people of Peanut Hill and Dogtown? Unless something drastic is done the only answer is—death. Their condition now is hopeless and there is no effective relief in sight. For the immediate future the federal government should undertake a subsistence-homestead project for the permanent surplus of workers. But since that is a subsidy to the coal-mine owners and operators, the government should eliminate permanently the worst effects of a competitive profit system by declaring all bituminous coal mines a public utility to be operated for the benefit of the people rather than for the profit of a few, and on an accounting basis which will give first place to human costs.

Terror in Spain

By ELLEN WILKINSON

WE arrived in Madrid on November 9—the Earl of Listowel, who is a member of the Labor Party in the House of Lords, a secretary-interpreter, and myself. Our mandate? Simply that we were connected with an organization in England that had done a great deal of work to relieve the victims of fascism in Germany and Austria and that had been implored to do something about Spain. News from Spain in Britain was very scanty. The Times had printed some stories of atrocities said to have been committed by the miners, and then denied them. Little was known except that some sort of revolt had taken place in Spain in October and that a general strike in Madrid had been part of it.

On the morning after our arrival our first tasks were to visit the leaders of the revolt in prison, and to apply to Premier Lerroux for an interview about those prisoners who had been condemned to death. Most of the political prisoners in Spain are in the so-called "Model Prison." Between one and two o'clock each day they are allowed to see either their lawyers or relatives. Two Socialist deputies took us in. Imagine a large hall in a zoo with the animals behind bars all around the walls and the visitors walking around the center, and you have the reception hall of the Modelo.

We talked through the bars to Señor Largo Caballero, the leader of the Socialist Party and the Socialist trade-union organization, who had been Minister of Labor in the coalition government. When the Lerroux government, which succeeded the coalition, dissolved 400 Socialist municipalities, Caballero warned it that the workers would resist fascist rule. Lerroux replied by taking three of the leading fascists into his Cabinet; whereupon Caballero showed him that he had not been bluffing. The fact that this man, the recognized leader of Spanish labor, is sixty-five years old perhaps explains some of the hesitations that proved fatal to the success of the revolution. It must be said, however, that under his leadership the Spanish workers did not wait for the fascists to do to them what had been done to the workers of Germany and Austria. Their stand was very nearly successful in important areas of Spain, and though defeated, it may yet have important political consequences. It was the first serious check to the fascist wave in Europe.

After our talk with Caballero we made the round of the cages and spoke with nearly every labor leader of note and also with the correspondents of several important foreign newspapers. The chief man of the well-known English Liberal journal, the News-Chronicle, was behind the bars. We met Luis Quintanilla, the great painter of the Spanish working class, for whom a long sentence is being asked on the ground that his studio was the meeting place of the revolutionary Committee of Youth. He seemed to be drinking in the life and color of the crowd through his eyes before going to the silence and grayness of a prison cell. "I am trying to think in line now instead of color," he said, with a quick, flashing smile.

In a corner of the hall some caged workmen made an effort to catch our attention. I went to them. For the moment an interpreter was not with me. They were desperate, since in a few minutes visitors would have to leave. Holding my hands through the bars they repeated again and again, "Asturias! Asturias! Asturias!" I recalled enough Spanish to say, "Yes, yes we are going there." When they were assured of that, they nearly pulled off my arm. It was my first inkling of what "Asturias" means to the workers of Spain.

It was strange to go straight from the prison to the official palace of the Premier with its gorgeous carpets and furniture in the Spanish-grandee style, strange to realize by how narrow a chance the man we had left in the prison had missed being the statesman who received us from behind this ornate desk. Señor Lerroux, still calling himself a "radical," as Mr. Ramsay MacDonald loves to call himself a Socialist, is a politician whom Americans would understand. King of the—let us be polite and call it the liveliest district of Barcelona—patron and paymaster of one of the various sets of anarchists, he came into prominence as a politician and journalist by his fierce anti-clericalism. Now he is the puppet, as Gil Robles is the mascot, of the clerico-financial reaction. Because he is a man of the world, accustomed to absorb public feeling through his pores, Lerroux is more valuable to the Jesuits and big banking interests in this crisis than is the young, impatient, and far more picturesque Gil Robles.

The Premier talked to us for an hour, assured us that the death sentences on the leaders would not be carried out, denied the press stories of atrocities committed by the miners, and ended by giving us a letter to General Ochoa, the military leader in the Asturias, asking him to facilitate our mission. Had the Premier had his way we should have been politely looked after, shown what it was "good for us to see," and our visit would have had as much effect as a stone dropping in a pond. It was Gil Robles and his fascists who presented us with the world-wide publicity which, despite all the criticism heaped on our heads, has at least made people understand that the high Spanish military authorities have something to hide in the Asturias.

"Get all the information you can while you are in Madrid," advised an American newspaperman, after the row Robles raised about us in the Cortes. "You may be arrested before you leave the city." We had eight hours to do it, and our friends did a record job of organizing for us. While Lord Listowel was seeing necessary official people, I was taken to the workers' quarter in Madrid, where the fighting had been at its hottest during the general strike. There, sheltered by railwaymen, printers, and fruit porters were some hunted refugees from Asturias. Every man known to have been in Oviedo who had escaped to tell the tale was being rounded up. Two well-known Spanish journalists, Barbiere and Fomtecha, had just been arrested. Luis Sirval, said to have in his possession sworn statements about the atrocities committed by the Foreign Legion, had been shot dead by an officer. These workingmen were in the gravest danger.

Their story, briefly, was this. The miners in Asturias were well organized and not rent by the divisions which paralyzed other parts of Spain, especially Barcelona. When the call came, they left their villages in the high valleys and marched on Oviedo, the trading and official center of the region. Oviedo had two factories for making light arms. The miners took the town and kept the factories going. These workmen swore to us, and their account was confirmed even by hostile sources in Oviedo, that the revolutionary committee had maintained order and carefully given receipts for all goods requisitioned from the shops.

Against the Spanish army the miners and other workers had held out easily. The private soldiers had no heart in the work of shooting them down. But aeroplanes bombed the railwaymen's quarters, and the miners retaliated by besieging the cathedral and university, both of which were badly damaged in the fighting. Then the government drafted Arab and Moroccan troops into the Foreign Legion, under white officers—and the officers of the Foreign Legion have no enviable reputation in Spain. Even so, the workmen told us, the miners could have held out, since they had plenty of arms and were well led. But aeroplanes dropped newspapers over their lines which made it clear that the revolt in the rest of Spain had collapsed. It was necessary therefore to make terms. These Asturians in Madrid, one of whom was a union official, swore that General Ochoa had agreed to the miners' terms—namely, that in return for the surrender of arms, prisoners, and certain leaders, the General would not send in the troops of the Foreign Legion until after the Spanish troops had entered.

The General has since denied that he made any promise, but at any rate the miners carried out their part of the bargain. Then the troops of the Foreign Legion marched into the town first, exactly as the miners had dreaded. Their first action was to loot the Oviedo shops. Gold watches could be bought on the streets from Arab soldiers for a few pesetas. "Of course, it was difficult to explain to the Foreign Legion that they must not loot the good shops," a government agent remarked to us naively in Oviedo.

In the villages the Foreign Legion soldiers had things all their own way. Every male, old or young, on guard or in hiding, was shot. Some women who had taken part in the fighting were also shot. Heroic tales were told of the deeds of cool bravery of these miners' daughters. Other young women were not shot; Arab troops and white officers had other uses for them. Mass executions of prisoners and captured workers took place in the main square of Oviedo as well as in the prison yards. The names and addresses of men and women shot or tortured were given to me. Such was the story we wished to check by a personal visit to Oviedo and the mining villages.

It soon became apparent, however, that local authorities there had no intention of allowing us to do this. We made an appointment to see the military commander and to present our letter of introduction from the Premier. We were kept waiting about an hour and a half, during which time we watched with interest the activities of a government agent who tried to force a row on us while we drank our breakfast coffee at a cafe. He endeavored to get a crowd to demonstrate against us, a difficult thing to do in a town under such severe martial law that no one dares to be seen in any sort of group. However, the crowd finally grew to about 200, this in a town of 70,000 inhabitants with a press which had been working up feeling against our visit.

When we were at last invited in to see Commander Doval, he tried to persuade us to say that "owing to the hostile attitude of the crowd we desired police protection to leave the city." As we had no intention of saying anything of the kind, the Commander obligingly said it for us to the press after we had gone, and the statement duly appeared in the European papers. We asked for permission to see the town under whatever escort he desired. (From the windows of the Town Hall a section of the main street looked like Arras as I had seen it in 1919.) To this the Commander politely agreed. We were conducted down the Town Hall steps to waiting cars. Some of the crowd booed. Others were silent and curious. A word from the Civil Guard would have dispersed the lot.

Instead of being taken around the town as had been promised, we were driven under a strong armed escort to the French frontier, a seventeen-hour trip through the night over the mountains. We were given no opportunity to check the grim story of horror that had been told us by the workmen in Madrid. We were not, as has been asserted, "meddling busybodies." We were duly accredited persons with a letter of introduction from the Prime Minister of the country to the appropriate military authorities. Those authorities were and are still engaged in "cleaning up" the area. Armed columns of two hundred men were being sent into the mountains to get the miners still resisting. It is significant that reports of their work are made in terms of "bodies found" and not of "prisoners taken." Naturally the miners are holding out as long as they can. The military are particularly anxious to avoid any publicity for what they are doing. Journalists they could arrest and silence. We, as foreigners of some standing, were an unexpected nuisance.

What were these miners fighting about? Not even the present Spanish government has been able to raise the bogey of Moscow gold and foreign agitators in the Asturias, though it has tried. The authorities told us that these miners were the best-paid workers in Spain. If that be true I am sorry for the others. From the train which crawled up the valley from Leon, the valley through which the miners had marched, we saw something of the appalling conditions under which they and their families have to live. Low wages have been further reduced by unemployment and short time.

The Asturian miners are the most solidly organized of the Spanish workers. They are so militant that an influential conservative journal has demanded that the mines be closed down permanently and coal imported from England lest the revolutionary tendencies of this area infect the rest of Spain. Commander Doval and his troops seem, however, to be stamping out such tendencies quite efficiently.

The October revolution was neither the beginning nor the end of the workers' movement in Spain. In no country in Europe are the differences between rich and poor so glaring. The illiteracy rate throughout wide areas is over 60 per cent, and the present government has just closed down a number of the existing schools on the ground of "economy." While grandees and peasants were the two main social divisions of Spain, this state of affairs could endure. But when the war came, and Spanish industrialists were able to make money from both sides, there arose in Spain an industrial capitalist class and a proletariat. And now, however hard priest and grandee may struggle to keep the old Spain that has been so profitable for them, the new social classes are breaking through the crust of the centuries. At present the big employers are scared of the workers' movement; they only wanted a "palace revolution" to get rid of the monarchy and the Jesuit power. But revolutions cannot be run as limited-liability enterprises. Spain has been forced to telescope into one generation the French Revolution and the Russian Revolution and the centuries between. The Spanish workers must now avoid having a Hitler revolution crammed into the same period.

Taxation in the New Social State

X. A Tax Program for the Future

By PAUL STUDENSKI

WE may now summarize the discussion presented in this series on public finance and advance suggestions for a financial policy to be pursued by a social state, not only in the present emergency, but also under circumstances likely to develop in the future.

It should be understood at the outset that no reduction in the emergency expenditures of the federal government can be considered until there is ample evidence of the capacity of private industry to employ more workers, and when that evidence is available, the reduction should be carried out gradually, according to a prepared plan. Nor has the time arrived when federal borrowing should be completely stopped. But the time has come when this borrowing should be diminished. Taxation should be used from now on with much more determination. The fact that the downward movement of business activity has been arrested, and that in some fields of business even a slight improvement has taken place, amply justifies the imposition of heavier taxes. These taxes will not interfere with an improvement in business conditions; on the contrary, a failure to impose them will interfere with it.

There must be no inflation of the currency through the issuance of non-convertible, non-interest-bearing Treasury notes to cover budgetary deficits or to defray any wildly conceived new expenditures, such as those proposed under the Townsend plan. Apparently there is little danger of such inflation as long as the present Administration continues in control of Congressional legislation. The Treasury has been able to obtain all the funds required, over and above those furnished by taxation, by means of legitimate credit operations at low rates of interest; and unless some unexpected political or economic developments of a disturbing nature should occur, the Treasury will be able to obtain in the same way the five or six billion dollars more that it may need during the next two or three years. There is of course a possibility of inflation occurring in the future as a result of an overexpansion of private credit on top of the existing great expansion of public credit at a time of a rapid and somewhat speculative recovery of business.

The evil consequences of currency inflation need not be considered here. There is a general agreement among most groups that it should be avoided at all costs. Of all devices to prevent inflation taxation is the most effective, and should be resorted to at once. A tax program capable of yielding additional revenue of at least half a billion dollars per annum under present business conditions, and more if conditions improve, should be developed and enacted at once. The essential elements of such a program should be an increase of from one to ten points in the rates of inheritance and personal-income taxes and a broadening of these taxes at the base. The required supplemental revenue cannot be obtained by additional impositions on the wealthy classes alone. There must be additional impositions also on people of medium and small means, but these should, as far as practicable, take the form of direct taxes so that they may be adjusted in accordance with ability to pay, and the payments should be undisguised. The level of exemption from the inheritance tax should be lowered to $25,000, and life insurance should be treated in the same way as estates. Personal exemption from the income tax should be lowered for married persons from $2,500 plus $400 for each child to $1,500 plus $250 for each child.

The tax program should also include moderate increases in the corporation-income tax and in the tax on cigarettes and other tobacco products, and the addition of a gross-receipts tax levied at a fraction of 1 per cent on all business except that done by extremely small concerns. The gross-receipts tax, which is collectable on the current gross income and payable monthly, would reflect any improvement in business conditions as it occurred and would therefore be especially valuable during a recovery. If levied at a low rate it would in large measure be absorbed by business.

At the first sign of inflation the government should be ready to impose taxes of a deflationary character. It should be ready to impose a capital levy and possibly a sales tax of the character suggested by Professor Colm, the rate of which would increase progressively and automatically with the rise of the price level. A capital levy of a substantial nature would cause an immediate shortage of funds in the money markets, it would force some property-owners to liquidate a part of their holdings in order to obtain cash with which to pay the tax, and it would in this and other ways exercise a restraining influence on prices. A sales tax of the nature indicated would discourage sellers from raising prices and buyers from buying and would thus deflate prices. Odious as is the sales tax as a mere device for raising revenue, it would become a serviceable tax if used in this way to prevent inflation. Plans for these two taxes should be worked out immediately and powers conferred on the Administration to impose them as soon as the price level begins to rise more rapidly than a predetermined rate per month.

The federal government should enact a tax on interest from mortgages. The tax might be so levied as to exempt interest rates up to 4 per cent and then be so steeply graduated that by the time it is applied to a 6 per cent rate, nine-tenths of the excess would be taken by the government. Such a tax would either yield substantial revenue or else impel mortgagees voluntarily to readjust interest rates downward and thus ease the burden of the mortgagor. It would cause interest rates generally to decline and stimulate capital to engage in new enterprises offering possibilities of profit.

The present high rates of taxation should be continued after the emergency has passed, and even raised to still higher levels. In the course of seven or eight years of relative prosperity, we should liquidate the entire increase in the public debt of the past few years, while at the same time supporting adequately the newly organized social services. There is nothing impossible about this program. Let us assume, for purposes of illustration, that our national income, which amounts now to 45 billion dollars (85 billion in 1929), increases within the next two and a half years, in consequence of an improvement in business conditions, to 55 billion dollars; and that the rates of federal taxation are adjusted as suggested. The federal revenue under these circumstances would rise from the present level of $3\frac{3}{4}$ billion dollars to 6 billion dollars. This would be sufficient to balance the budget, which might be expected to drop considerably as a consequence of the elimination of emergency expenditures. A further increase in the national income to 65 billion dollars within another two and a half years should result in a rise in the federal revenue by another 2 billion dollars and in the appearance of an annual surplus of equal amount which would be available for debt retirement. The federal tax burden would amount to only 12 per cent of the national income, and the combined federal, state, and local burden to 25 per cent—a burden by no means excessive under substantially improved business conditions.

Some of the recent expansion of government expenditures should no longer be considered as of an emergency nature but be treated as permanent in character and even carried farther as business conditions improve. This holds true particularly of proposals for the planned development of the country's natural resources and the development of cheaper electric power, for the inauguration of federal and state expenditures for old-age pensions and annuities, unemployment insurance, and social security generally, for the construction of new housing facilities for the low-income groups of our population, and, finally, for the extension by the federal authority of aid to states and local governments for purposes of education. Expenditures in the field of education (including higher education), public health, public recreation, and utility services should be increased as soon as economic conditions permit. The national, state, and local budget systems should be improved and the budgets themselves planned, executed, and accounted for more efficiently than they are today. In addition to annual budgets governments should develop and maintain programs of capital outlays and financings covering periods of from five to ten years. Before we can expect effective government participation in the coordination of the various features of our broader national economy, we must have better planning and control in the traditional spheres of government activity.

As a part of a permanent program the tax system of the country should be brought into closer accord with the principles of ability to pay and of the use of public finance for social control. Taxes on personal incomes should be made more universal in their application and more steeply graduated. Sales taxes should be remodeled so that they would become elastic business taxes usable for social control; and the rate of the corporation-income taxes should be increased. The present so-called emergency rates of inheritance taxation should be continued and even carried to a point of taking for the use of the state any excess fortune above a fixed sum, say $5,000,000. Only by limiting the fortunes that may be transferred to beneficiaries shall we be able to preserve democracy and relative equality of opportunity in this country. The rates of the taxes on personal and corporate incomes, excess profits, capital stock, and undistributed surplus of corporations should be adjusted so that within certain limits they would automatically fluctuate with the rise and fall in business activity and in the volume of investments. This can be accomplished, as recently suggested by G. T. Altman in the Tax Magazine, by relating the rates to an index of business activity and capital accumulation. The Treasury could announce annually by reference to these indices the rate to be applied to the taxes of the year. The surpluses resulting from rising rates might be used for debt retirement, the expansion of social services, and the accumulation of reserves. Deficits caused by dropping rates could be covered from reserves or new borrowings. Public finance might thus serve to stabilize our national economy.

The federal Constitution should be amended to give Congress specific authority to provide for a national system of social security by means of such taxes or other impositions as it may deem proper, thus insuring the constitutionality of such legislation.

The country's tax system should be considered as a unit and not as a conglomeration of a number of unrelated systems—federal, state, and local. The federal credits for inheritance taxes paid to states should be applied to the existing rates, instead of merely to the lower 1926 rates, but the credit should be fixed on a regressive scale, so that the federal government should receive 80 per cent of the amounts levied in the case of the large estates and a diminishing share, dropping to 20 per cent, in the case of smaller estates. Such an arrangement would end litigations over the question of whether large estates should be taxed in one state or another; and it would also introduce greater stability in state revenue. The crediting device regressively adjusted might advantageously be extended to the personal income tax. The states should cease taxing corporations on a basis of net income and alcoholic beverages on a volume basis, and should content themselves with a share of the proceeds of a federal corporation-income tax and a federal liquor and beer tax.

The coordination of federal, state, and local finance should be concerned, however, not only with taxation. It should also embrace the current budgets, capital-outlay programs, and credit operations of the various authorities, and be accompanied with a coordination of their administrative activities as well. Some of the functions of government would need to be reallocated as between these several layers of authorities. Before any such coordination can take place, a series of comprehensive studies of the underlying problems must be made by staffs of experts. It is to be hoped that the study of coordination of tax systems which is about to be made by the Treasury will be productive of a sound plan and will be followed by studies of the other fields of federal, state, and local finance and administration. Such studies should be conducted under the direction of a specially created commission on federal, state, and local relationships, which should be transformed eventually into a permanent body. Its establishment should be followed by the organization of twelve permanent regional commissions of the same order. The task of the national and the regional commissions would be to develop intergovernmental unity and cooperation on a national and regional scale so that the government might emerge from its present state of chaos.

A substantial reorganization of local finance and administration should be undertaken. The administration of the property tax should be improved as regards assessment and like matters; the existing limitations on the rate of the property tax should be removed, and the local revenue system broadened through larger distributions to localities of shares of state-collected taxes. A more effective supervision by the state over the budgetary practices and credit operations of the smaller spending units should be established. Those local units which are incapable of an effective independent operation should be consolidated, and the entire structure of our county government modernized. The states should give cities wider powers to own and operate utilities.

An amendment to the federal constitution that would permit the federal, state, and local governments to tax the income from federal, state, and municipal bonds on the same basis as income from any other securities should be adopted; and after its adoption bonds should be issued without the tax-exemption feature. The munitions industry should be nationalized and a plan of steeply graduated war taxes developed that would make the accumulation of large fortunes in consequence of war contracts impossible.

Instead of merely conforming with the changes occurring in the social order, taxation should induce them. Of all the peaceful means of bringing about a new social state, taxation is the most potent one. It should be used not merely as an expedient to raise revenue, but as a positive force for social reconstruction.

[This is the concluding article of a series on public finance planned and edited by Professor Studenski.]

In the Driftway

AGENTLEMAN now occupying a high place once said that what this country needs is a good impartial chairman with a strong prejudice in favor of labor. Since then a great many impartial chairmen have sat and gone; and the production of labor-board decisions and arbitration awards, like the production of many other commodities, has increased prodigiously as the number of workers has decreased. Today there are probably more unenforced labor decisions in this country than anywhere else in the world. Economists may argue whether it is a case of overproduction or underconsumption. The Drifter is more concerned with the quality of the output; and he has discovered an arbitration award which represents for him the triumph of the impartial chairman's art. It was written by Major Henry H. Curran, chairman of the arbitration committee named to mediate the elevator strike in New York City.

ARBITRATION awards are likely to be dull affairs. But Major Curran's begins with a hymn to Manhattan:

Manhattan is still "The Vertical City." It is a city of towers, a piling of rock on rock, a skyline that is the wonder of the world, a giant token of architectural courage and inspiration. People travel in a day more vertical miles up and down in the elevators of Manhattan than they travel horizontal miles in all the subways, buses, cabs, and other conveyances put together. . . . Shank's mare is extinct like the dodo.

At this point Depression enters, followed by a chorus of 200,000 building-service workers of Greater New York. Major Curran continues:

The silent beauty of Manhattan's skyscrapers at dusk is now no more than a screen concealing the sorriest story of financial distress that has ever visited this island that Peter Minuit bought from the Indians for $24. . . . We have before us the instance of a "father, with wife and seven children, working in an apartment in a desirable part of the city over four years, receiving $65 a month for seventy hours a week, and compelled to live in part on charity from several directions." . . . There are many instances of this kind, many of them much worse. They are proof of the increasing distress of owners.

For the sake of those who might have thought it was a typographical error the theme is repeated.

It is grotesque [says Major Curran] that four-fifths of the cost of a city's government is collected from the buildings which are the pride of the city, just because these poor structures stay right there and cannot run away or dodge. This money comes out of the pockets of the poor. The men who provide the service in these buildings are as poor today as are the owners. [Italics ours again].

As George Kaufman remarked in "Once in a Lifetime," it couldn't all be a typographical error.

* * * * *

THE Drifter has not space to quote more. Suffice to say that the piece is full of sensibility, suspense, and surprise endings. It reaches its climax in a vision of cooperation between employers and employees and a plea for "fair treatment of the backbone of an island that is unique . . . the steady army of buildings that stands upon the rocky ridge that runs from the Battery to Spuyten Duyvil." Finally there is an epilogue in which the man with seven children is awarded $70 instead of $65 and the hours he may work on a night job are reduced from thirteen to eleven.

* * * * *

IT is painful to record that the building-service employees, who obviously have no appreciation of arbitration for art's sake, almost broke up the performance by declining to accept the award. The situation was saved momentarily when Mayor La Guardia, surrounded by all the policemen and all the firemen in the biggest city in the world, dressed up as elevator boys but still equipped with billy clubs and helmets, pounded on the table and told the boys they'd better accept Major Curran's happy ending. But as the Drifter goes to press, everything seems to be up in the air again, including the elevators, the operators, the arbitrators, and the Drifter. As for Major Curran, the Drifter wouldn't blame him if he gave up writing awards altogether.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Cuban Utilities

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I have read with interest Carleton Beals's vitriolic assault on the "Problems of the New Cuba," published by the Foreign Policy Association. As he devotes almost half of his 2,400-word review to a passionate denunciation of my public-utilities chapter, declares it to be a "practical whitewashing," asserts that "under a thin veneer of apparent academic impartiality" I "largely absolve the companies of past wrongdoing," and that I present "company propaganda without due analysis," I desire to reply to Mr. Beals's specific criticisms.

Mr. Beals declares that I "make no clear statement that the Cuban rates have been the highest in the world." I made no such clear statement because it would not be true. Mr. Beals says: "He admits they should be reduced but uses most of his space not in scientifically analyzing production and distribution costs, but in trying to prove by partial, incomplete, and unsound data what everyone knows, namely, that costs are greater in Cuba . . ." An analysis of production, transmission, and distribution costs in Cuba would have required the services of trained cost accountants and utility engineers. The commission considered and rejected the project of setting itself up as an exact rate-finding committee. Its report specifically recommends that such a study be made by technicians vouched for by the United States Federal Trade Commission, the Federal Power Commission, or the Tennessee Valley Authority. Mr. Beals says further: "He greatly exaggerates the load factor in costs and . . . compares the wide fluctuation in the amount of current used at different hours in the day for a single week ending April 28, 1934, with the fluctuations experienced by the Montana Power and the Texas Power and Light Company. He picks a week soon after a military coup d'etat and subsequent to a long period of disorder, also a week just after the grinding season, when fluctuations are unusually great." This is typical of all of Beals's criticism, and reveals a passion to demonstrate a preconceived thesis rather than an objective ascertaining of the facts, which was the commission's purpose and mine. On what does Mr. Beals base his assumption that I greatly exaggerated the load factor, to which I devote one paragraph? The week ending April 28 was not, as he asserts, "soon after a military coup d'etat." The last previous military coup d'etat had been in September, 1933, when Batista and Grau replaced Cespedes, unless Mr. Beals refers to the retirement of Grau because of non-recognition by the United States and the withdrawal of Batista's support in January, 1934. This was scarcely a coup d'etat. But in either case, the week of April 28, 1934, was not "soon after." Beals's assertion that the week was "subsequent to a long period of disorder" is likewise misleading. There has been more or less disorder in Cuba for the last four years—dating from the A.B.C.'s reprisals to Machado's wholesale assassinations. Any week a year thereafter could be alleged to be "subsequent to a long period of disorder." But the report deals with the present—and future—and the week in question coincided with the arrival of the first members of the commission in Cuba. Mr. Beals alleges that it was "a week after the grinding season . . ." Apparently he does not know that the Cuban Electric Company's generation is not materially affected by the cessation of the grinding season, as the centrales largely generate their own power during that period. Most pertinent, however, is the fact that the week in question was not exceptional but typical, and that approximately the same unfavorable load factor may be found at any time of the year in Cuba.

Fourth Large Printing!

RATS, LICE AND HISTORY

A Biography of Typhus Fever

By HANS ZINSSER

DR. LOGAN CLENDENING in N. Y. Herald Tribune Books says: "It is impossible for me to overpraise this fascinating volume."

J. B. S. HALDANE, eminent British scientist, in The Saturday Review of Literature says: "It is likely to be quite popular and deservedly so."

THE LITERARY DIGEST devotes an entire Book Review section to "Rats, Lice and History" — "One of the most profoundly philosophic, charmingly discursive, gently learned books yet written by a doctor, not excluding the essays of the memorable autocrat of a Boston breakfast-table."

Third Printing. An Atlantic Book

$2.75 LITTLE, BROWN & COMPANY Boston

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"THE COMING STRUGGLE FOR POWER"

The NATURE of CAPITALIST CRISIS

BY JOHN STRACHEY

A SUPERB diagnosis of the essential nature of capitalist crisis and depression—a devastating refutation of all capitalist economists' attempts to account for crises—and, finally, the most lucid and brilliant exposition of the Marxian theory of crises, of the Labor Theory of Value, and of the general Marxist critique of capitalism that has ever been made accessible to the non-economist public. The Coming Struggle For Power may be said to have represented the emotional approach to Marxism; The Nature of Capitalist Crisis is an eloquent, solidly reasoned expression of the intellectual acceptance of Marxist theory and practise.

416 pages, $3.00—At all bookstores

COVICI • FRIEDE • NEW YORK

Mr. Beals declares that I made a misstatement when I said that Machado was never an official or a stockholder in the Electric Bond and Share's Cuban Electric Company. Mr. Beals to the contrary notwithstanding, my statement is fact, and corrects an error to which wide currency has been given in Cuba and which Mr. Beals himself propagated in his "The Crime of Cuba," saying (page 242), "When in 1921 the Electric Bond and Share Company began buying up Cuban utilities, it found one of the most experienced men in the field was Machado. . . . It made one of his close friends, Mr. Henry Catlin, president of the Cuban Electric Company; Machado himself became vice-president. By the end of 1923 they were serving more than eighty communities with electricity, gas, or water." The facts, as I stated them, which Mr. Beals contradicts, are that Machado had been in the electric business and sold his two plants at Santa Clara and Caibarien, operating under the name of Compañía Cubana de Electricidad. S. A., to the Electric Bond and Share. He was not, as Mr. Beals stated in his book and restates in his review, a vice-president or any other official of either the Electric Bond and Share or any of its subsidiaries.

Mr. Beals says that my "insistence that Machado showed no favoritism to the Cuban Electric Company . . . draws a rueful smile." My so-called "insistence" consisted of stating that "Machado would inevitably overrule the acts of municipal authorities ordering rate reductions," and of giving specific and typical instances of his frustration of all attempts to reduce rates. I repeated this statement for emphasis. However, I pointed out that Machado was friendly to all capital and especially to American capital and that his policy of protection extended not merely to the electric interests but to other American enterprises.

Mr. Beals says: "In labor conflicts Gruening takes the side of the company unions, while denying they are company unions." As far as the electric utilities are concerned, which alone Mr. Beals discusses in his review, and to which I will therefore likewise confine my comment, his implication that the union—the only union in the Cuban Electric Company, the Federación Sindical de las Plantas Electricas y de Agua—is a company union, is ridiculous and untrue. No friend of Cuban labor ever even alleged it; but Mr. Beals's unique sapience so declares it. The company refused to recognize the union at first, fought it consistently, and resisted all the union's essential demands until gradually compelled to yield, partly because of the solidarity and strength of the strikers, partly because of the assistance rendered the union by the Cuban government. The union struck on January 13, 1934, paralyzing the city of Havana, and the Grau government intervened, turning the plant over to the strikers' management for three weeks. Strange performance for a "company union"! After analyzing the list of grievances and demands of the union, my stated conclusion was that "the labor troubles in the company were in a considerable measure due to the shortcomings of the company officials, who in the early days of the conflict refused even to meet with the representatives of the union." In sum, I must deny that I have, as Beals asserts, taken the "side of the company union" in this matter, first, because there was no company union, second, because I tried to avoid "taking sides." This Mr. Beals will doubtless consider a damning admission.

In conclusion, I desire to quote my paragraphs on rates:

As far as the rate controversy is concerned, the company's endeavor to stand on legal rights based on a military decree issued in 1902, when the science of electrical transmission was still in its infancy, is in the commission's view not entitled to serious consideration. That type of bourbonism invites revolution, and precipitated the sweeping Grau decree of December 6. The Grau government was called on to act, and took action. In principle and purpose its action was justifiable and necessary. The rate reduction has already resulted in increased consumption.

The action of the Grau government, however, taken in the midst of a revolution, was crude and unscientific. The problem now is to establish rates which, in the phrase long used in American utility regulation, and applicable in Cuba as elsewhere, are "just and equitable."

It cannot be denied that rates in Cuba were too high before the Grau decree. The rates themselves—from 15 to 25 cents maxima, the lack of change during thirty-one years, a period in which science had been making enormous strides and more than tripling the production of kilowatt hours from a pound of coal, and the company's belated willingness, when confronted by necessity, to make a 20 per cent rate reduction, are sufficient even without the evidence afforded by more detailed available data to state unqualifiedly that rates had long been excessive in Cuba.

If this be "practical whitewashing," as Mr. Beals asserts, the comments of the Electric Bond and Share officials indicate that they do not appreciate it.

Mr. Beals also says: "Gruening ignores public-relations activities, worse in Cuba than in our own country, although he once wrote a book exposing them in the United States." I do not know by just what standard of measurement Mr. Beals arrives at his conclusion that public-relations activities were "worse" in Cuba. In my judgment they were infinitely "worse" in the United States, where they included a far wider range of activities and of concealed propaganda. But since Mr. Beals has made mention thereof, I would suggest that the mood in which he castigates the report of the Foreign Policy Association Commission, and my chapter in particular, would lead him to deem my "The Public Pays" also highly unsatisfactory. That book on the utilities propaganda in the United States was merely an objective stating of the facts. It was not invective; it was not vehemently vituperative; it was not choleric. Neither is the Foreign Policy Association report. Mr. Beals is deeply distressed because my chapter in the Cuban report does not rehash the crimes of Machado. Those crimes I have denounced in various published articles and from the platform. The Foreign Policy Association Commission's purpose was not to write history but to deal with the present in Cuba, and the future, and to present facts, or what appeared to be facts to the members, as objectively as possible. That we did not fully succeed is undoubted. The reservations by different members testify to individual divergences of opinion. And they reveal that a collaborative effort inevitably tends to flatten out extremes of statement to a more temperate and also more tepid average of common assent. As far as the public-utilities chapter is concerned, the pertinent facts are all presented there. Their presentation has drawn fire of critics from the right and left. In failing to satisfy either extreme, I hope I have achieved a tolerably close approximation to truth. Probably every such commission should have attached to it a passionate partisan or two so that it may supplement the facts it finds with a savory seasoning of splutter.

Washington, February 11

ERNEST GRUENING

Books Wanted

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The library of the Henry Street Settlement has been of great service to the community since its inauguration last year. Its chief source of books is the generosity of people who enjoy fostering the spirit of good reading. Will not Nation readers be glad to contribute?

New York, February 20

BENJAMIN MILLER

Labor and Industry

"Hand and Brain"

By HEYWOOD BROWN

BUT, of course, I don't want to be associated with truck drivers and bricklayers."

It is a long time since I have heard this sentiment uttered by anybody in a Newspaper Guild meeting, but it was common enough in the beginning. Naturally, it was not always voiced in this precise phraseology, although curiously enough it was the teamsters and the bricklayers who were chiefly picked upon in spite of the fact that these are crafts requiring highly skilled workers. The snobbishness of the white-collar groups in America is on the whole exaggerated. If clerks, newspapermen, accountants, and professional men have been slow in organizing, it has not been altogether because of reluctance. It is rather an inability. We have neither the tradition nor the training.

"You boys will have your troubles in the beginning," a labor leader said, "because you have had no experience in organization. You don't mind my being frank, do you? Well, I'm afraid that reporters will rat on each other in a way that no printer would think of doing."

But with a few lamentable exceptions we have been better than that. Of course there is and has been Mr. X (his name is familiar enough to other newspapermen), who bettered the mark of Judas by selling out twice within a single week. When the Guild unit voted a strike on the Newark Ledger he did not go out with his fellows. A few days later the paper suspended publication for forty-eight hours. Out came Mr. X. "I'm with you," he said, and added naively, "Of course, I want to be on the winning side." A day later, when the paper recruited a skeleton crew of strike-breakers and resumed publication, Mr. X went back to his desk. He is, ironically enough, employed as an expert on sports and sportsmanship.

And even so I continue to contend that the average newspaperman has a natural inclination to organize with his fellows. The Guild is built upon the earlier experiences of such cooperative movements as the Baseball Writers' Association, the Dramatic Critics' Circle, the Press Photographers' Association, and the group of White House, House, and Senate press representatives.

I will grant that the word "union" has had its terrors for the white-collar workers. The decision that trade unionism necessitates a limit upon maximum pay still lingers. The unionization of actors and their A. F. of L. affiliation has been a happy circumstance to be cited in rebuttal. But even the class-conscious Thespians avoided the word "union" and organized under the title Actors' Equity.

The fault lies partly with the missionaries themselves. They have been too insistent in pointing out to white-collar workers their deplorable backwardness. Almost they have made it seem that this aloofness was a matter of predestination. To that I say, "Stuff and nonsense." A very considerable proportion of white-collar workers are ready right now to join the parade of organization if only space in the ranks is assigned to them. I might even suggest that the collars are not really very white after all and never were.

When I was a candidate for Congress on the Socialist ticket I was instructed to make my appeals to workers of "hand and brain." The phrase does not appeal much to me. It harbors the potentiality of a misconception. It harbors the suggestion that certain types of labor are wholly mechanical in every way while other tasks are accomplished entirely from the neck up. Newspaper work, as I know it, is a combination of both. As one doomed for many years to write a daily stint I can remember many columns which were set down solely from the wrists without any cerebration whatsoever. As for the bricklayer as a retarding symbol, I can testify that on many mornings I have looked at my own contribution, or even that of one of my confreres, and exclaimed, "Any bricklayer could have done better."

If there were no publisher pressure against the Newspaper Guild I venture to say that reporters in America would be as solidly organized as workers in any other industry in the country. A certain number of sincere and very rugged individualists are to be found in the various city rooms, but in many cases the reporter who says, "I don't belong to the Guild because I don't believe in unionization," is merely rationalizing his fear of being discriminated against because of his rashness.

One publisher of a large New York newspaper admitted very frankly that he was wholly against any kind of reportorial union. "I admit," he said, "the legal right of newspaper men and women to organize. Even the moral right if you insist, but I think it is a right which they should forswear just as doctors and lawyers have avoided unionization. An organization of newspaper reporters, whether affiliated with the A. F. of L. or not, would tend to destroy the freedom of the press, since each news gatherer would tend to see events from labor's point of view."

Charlie Howard, president of the I. T. U., met this argument in a debate by saying, "Well, wouldn't it even things up a little if reporters did begin to give labor a break after all these years?"

But there is an even more fundamental argument in favor of reportorial organization as a factor in promoting the integrity of the news. Louis Stark, Richard Rohman, and a dozen others might be mentioned as highly skilled labor reporters, but the average newspaperman has been inefficient in covering strikes, lockouts, and other labor difficulties. He has been inefficient because he didn't know what it was all about. In most cases he has not understood the psychology of the other fellow. The kid just out of college has been inclined to regard a picket line as essentially comic. That is, until he has stood on his own picket line.

Any newspaper editor who is sincerely devoted to the ideal of truthful and accurate reporting ought to welcome the existence of the Newspaper Guild. It is changing us from labor illiterates into reporters and commentators who are learning from our own experience the vital factors in the conflict. One must meet the truth face to face before one is able to tell it. We are moving in that direction.

Labor Notes

Two Boards, Two Reports

I

REPORTING to the President on the results of its first six months of life, the National Labor Relations Board has painted a picture of impotence and futility. The report, it can be said to the credit of its authors, does not beat around the bush. Of 86 decisions handed down by the board, 68 were of a nature which required compliance. Compliance was forthcoming in 17 cases; in the other 51 cases the employer simply ignored the board's decision. In 24 of the non-compliance cases the board induced the NRA to remove the Blue Eagle. In 19 of the cases the board turned to the Department of Justice, which has filed, so far, one solitary bill of complaint—the Houde cause célèbre—which has yet to come to trial. In no less than 7 proceedings the board has been tied up by court actions initiated by employers. "The board is powerless to enforce its own decisions," the three members admit. "In the ultimate analysis its 'findings' and 'orders' are nothing more than recommendations." In many industries "the loss of the Blue Eagle, when not blocked by injunction suits, has little practical effect." As for court enforcement, it is, "under the present machinery, slow, uncertain, and cumbersome." The report does not explain why, in the face of all this, the board sees fit to continue in existence; or how it can justify the expenditure to date of $290,000 of federal funds. If Messrs. Biddle, Millis, and Smith suppose that they will be able to swing the President around to their support, they must be incredibly naive. The President is less than ever in the mood to force collective bargaining on big business. What he had to say on Section 7-a in his NIRA message—"The rights of employees freely to organize for the purpose of collective bargaining should be fully protected"—was vague piety, and hopelessly ambiguous besides.

II

LIKE the Biddle board, the Automobile Labor Board has just released a report of its operations covering the ten months ended February 5, 1935. The Wolman tribunal, as one would expect, strikes a complacent attitude and gives voice to an apologia pro vita sua. We learn that "it is the board's judgment, after ten months of experience in the industry, that discrimination caused by union activity or union membership is not a problem of any magnitude at the present time and has not been for some time in the past." The judgment is highly interesting; for it comes fresh on the heels of the Henderson-Lubin report, which laid bare the terrors of the intricate system of espionage by which the automobile employers keep track of the opinions, attitudes, and activities of their hired hands. As to collective bargaining, we are informed that "there can be no question but that the levels of prevailing [industrial relations] have been materially raised during the past year, and that collective bargaining between the management and representatives of many groups of workers is being extensively carried on through the industry." Anyone who read the Henderson-Lubin report would have supposed that the question was still an open one, for if the disinterested experts were correct, the automobile wage-earner continues to groan under the heavy burden of tyrannical foremen and straw bosses. Unlike any other labor board to which the Recovery Act has given birth, the Wolman tribunal has no enforcement problem. "The decisions, orders, and rulings of the board," we are informed, "have been generally obeyed. . . . The jurisdiction of the board has not been challenged and it has not been involved in any litigation with respect to its general powers and the variety of specific problems with which it has undertaken to deal." These remarks give the secret away; if the Automobile Board had made a single genuine effort to break down the master-and-servant traditions of the industry, it would have run into a blank wall of defiance, just as all its contemporaries have done.

Company Police

IN February, 1934, Gifford Pinchot, then Governor of Pennsylvania, appointed a commission of five to investigate activities of company-paid deputy sheriffs in the state. One of the members was Francis Biddle. In its recent report the commission recommends legislation to abolish private police on the ground that they are a distinct menace during industrial disputes. We quote a few revealing excerpts from the report:

The first very serious disorder occurred early in the morning of August 1 at Rows Run, where a large group were picketing the highway near Colonial No. 3 mine of the Frick Company. Two company deputies in an automobile were stopped by dipping an American flag across the road. When the pickets saw that the occupants of the car were company deputies, the cry of "yellow dog" was raised. As the car went on at considerable speed, one of the deputies fired a number of revolver shots, killing one picket and crippling another for life. The deputies say that the pickets threw stones at their car; the pickets say that the shooting was entirely unprovoked except by the calling of names. The deputies were exonerated at the coroner's inquest.

At Star Junction, early on August 1, about twenty-five Frick Company deputies escorted a few men to work. A picket line of two hundred or more strikers pressed the deputies on the public highway and jeered at them. The deputies fired tear gas, buckshot, and at least one revolver. Five pickets were wounded, at least two of whom were shot in the back.

The report has this to say of a riot in Ambridge, in the course of which one man was killed and fifty or more wounded.

The result of the sheriff's acts was to terrorize the strikers and to hinder efforts to unionize the steel plants. When a body of 150 men, heavily armed, including the district attorney of the county, marches under the lead of the sheriff to a pitched battle with men armed with clubs, there is an overwhelming show of force which inevitably leads the defeated workers to conclude that the public authorities and the employers are in league to crush them. When it appears later that the military expedition has been financed by the employers, the workers may assume that the conclusion is confirmed.

This investigation must have been an excellent training course for Mr. Biddle's present position.

Contributors to This Issue

LELAND J. GORDON is on the staff of the Department of Economics of Denison University.

ELLEN WILKINSON has been a Labor Member of Parliament and a member of the Manchester City Council.

PAUL STUDENSKI is associate professor of economics at New York University.

ARCHIBALD MACLEISH is the author of "New Found Land," "Conquistador," which won the Pulitzer poetry prize in 1932, and "Frescoes for Mr. Rockefeller's City."

WILLIAM SEAGLE was assistant editor of the Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences until its recent completion.

BABETTE DEUTSCH is the author of "Epistle to Prometheus" and other volumes of verse.

Books, Drama, Films

PANIC*

By ARCHIBALD MACLEISH

The time is an evening in late February, 1933. The scene is a street before an electric news bulletin of the Times Square type—moving words in lighted letters. As the curtain rises the street is faintly lighted by the jerking flashes of the bulletin. There are a few men and women before it, their raised faces caught by the light. A few more approach. They speak not to each other but as though alone. Words read from the bulletin (printed in italics) are spoken at a regular lagging beat as the machine forms them.

CONFUSED VOICES: Foreclosures in . . .

closed . . .

foreclosing . . .

Factories closing doors . . .

Billions in balances frozen

Doors closing . . .

foreclosed . . .

A WOMAN: Closing as doors close with Death in a woman's house when the Wind closes them.

A MAN: Thousands
Silent at closed doors.

A MAN: Silent: the doors closing: the Life stopped.

A WOMAN: Comes over us
Slowly with closing of doors: with Lights put out: with the stoves
Cold: the hands numb.

AN OLD MAN: Slowly the thing comes.
There are many signs: there are furnaces
Dead now that were burning
Thirty years in a town—
Never dark: there are foundries—
Fires drawn: trestles Silent. The swifts nest in Stacks that for generations
Flowed smoke. The patience of Hawks is over the cities:
They circle in clean light where the Smoke last year frightened them.

A WOMAN: The gears turn: twitter: are Still now. The sound dies.
From the east with the sun's rising
Daily are fewer whistles:
Many mornings listening
One less or two.

A YOUNG MAN: The thing comes pursuing us
Creeping as death creeps in an Old man: as sleep comes:
Leaving on one hill—

On the stand—the stalks silver—
Corn rotted in ear:
Leaving on land nearest us
Wagons abandoned: milk cows
Slaughtered for no sickness:
Rigs rusting at pit-heads:
Pumps frozen: switches
Green with the rain: the oil
Thickened: scale in boilers—
Good gear all of it:
Sound metal: faultless:
Idle now: never manned.

A GIRL: Men in the dusk—and they stand there Letting the girls go by with the Sweet scent: silent:
Leaning heavily: bent to the Painted signs on the fences—
They that in other times
Calling after us climbed by the Steep stair for the sight of a
Girl's knee delighting her.

A MAN: From what ill and what enemy
Armless shall we defend the
Evening—the night hours?

A MAN: No eyes of ours have Ever knowing beheld it.
It comes not with the bells
Arousing towns: racing with Smoke—with the wind's haste—
The tallest houses toppled.

A MAN: Comes not from the hospitals—
Odor of scattered lime—
Night burials climbing the Empty streets by the markets.

A MAN: Not with the shot: with the barking of Dogs before color of dawn—
The whistle over the lawn—the Running footfall stumbling.

A WOMAN: Nevertheless it comes.
Men die: houses
Fall among kitchen flowers.
Families scatter. Children Wander the roads building of Broken boxes shelter.
A land of great wealth and the Old hungry: the young
Starving—but not with hunger.
None have beheld this enemy.
What arms can defend the
Evening—the night hours—
When fear: faceless: devours us?

A WOMAN: Blight—not on the grain!
Drouth—not in the springs!
Rot—not from the rain!

A MAN: What shadow hidden or
Unseen hand in our midst
Ceaselessly touches our faces?

* We print here the first section of "Panic," a play in verse which will be produced in New York City in the week of March 11.—EDITORS THE NATION.

Anatomy of Dickens

The Sentimental Journey: A Life of Charles Dickens. By Hugh Kingsmill. William Morrow and Company. $3.
Dickens. By André Maurois. Harper and Brothers. $2.

IF Dickens has become so fascinating to the modern biographer, as the flood of recent studies would seem to indicate, it is probably less because of any suddenly renewed interest in his work than because of the increasing recognition of his influence on the culture of which we are still to a large extent the product. According to M. Maurois, Dickens was not only the most popular writer of a race; he was largely responsible for shaping that race. In his most characteristic novels he set the pattern for a type of sensibility and a type of mentality which were to persist in Anglo-Saxon countries right through to our own time. The anatomy of the personality reflected in those novels becomes therefore the anatomy of a whole age of social and literary culture. It becomes an aid to the understanding, if not of ourselves, at least of our neighbors, so many of whom we may be able to explain in terms of the confused and contradictory attitudes of the society which Dickens helped to create and defend in its own eyes.

Of these two new studies Mr. Kingsmill's is much the more penetrating in its attempt to get behind the prim and ivy-covered façade of Dickens's "cockney fairyland." For Mr. Kingsmill the creator of Pickwick, Little Nell, Fagin, and David Copperfield is a writer who failed of the first rank because he never managed to harmonize his great comic genius with his emotions. The reason is his tremendous gift for self-pity, the result of an exaggerated sense of his miseries and privations in childhood and adolescence. This self-pity or self-love caused him to be callous toward his parents and friends, brutal in his relations with his wife, and arrogant and hard-pressing in all his business transactions. It was responsible also for his ambition and greed: the source of his untiring energy in supplying a dotting audience with a pabulum that was consoling to it and highly remunerative to himself. But what is more important, it kept him from ever understanding himself or his own emotions; it limited his art to a playing on the surfaces of life. It is by stressing this point that Mr. Kingsmill develops his thesis, announced at the beginning and amply illustrated throughout, that Dickens's "emotions were unpurged by his humor, and his humor, except in occasional sudden flashes, was unenriched by his emotions." The result is that there is an absolute division between his comedy, which at its best is the product of a coldly realistic observation of what is ludicrous and grotesque in human beings, and the emotional portions of his work, which are the gross outpourings of his timid and suppressed nature. This separation in Dickens between the mind and the feelings, Mr. Kingsmill demonstrates at some length, is what made him so acceptable to his own age; but it is also what keeps him from the company of Shakespeare, Cervantes, Fielding, and the other great humorists.

While M. Maurois takes account of most of the recently available material, his effort to be fair, to offer a "balanced portrait," results only in a cancelation of traits which leaves us very much as we were at the beginning. With his usual nice attention to his readers' prejudices, the author of "Ariel" and "Disraeli" blames but to condone, and in the end makes the worse appear the better cause. Thus Dickens was motivated by pity not for himself but for others—a pity for the poor, among whom he was born and lived his early life. For M. Maurois, Dickens's protests against social abuses in his novels are based on a "craving for revenge" against a heartless and irresponsible society. Mr. Kingsmill, of course, takes a somewhat different view toward Dickens's humanitarianism. After pointing out that most of these abuses were due to be remedied, he remarks: "He [Dickens] was one of those reformers who attack with public opinion behind them, and are rewarded with an increase in their wealth and popularity." The middle class, in Mr. Kingsmill's view, did not object to Dickens's exposures as long as he glorified its representatives in such angelic business men as Mr. Pickwick, the Cheeryble brothers, and Jarn-dyce in "Bleak House." In general, it may be said that M. Maurois is unsatisfactory as a biographer of Dickens because the reader feels that he is himself too prone to the sentimental confusion of important issues which is one of the principal objections to his subject.

At the same time Mr. Kingsmill's brilliant and caustic study suffers from the too zealous effort to relate every incident in Dickens's life to his thesis. This is especially true in the treatment of Dickens's dispute with Seymour, the illustrator of the "Pickwick Papers," for whose suicide Mr. Kingsmill would have us hold Dickens responsible without giving us a sufficient review of the facts in the case. The real truth about Dickens will probably not be written until biographers can avoid both the temptation to identify themselves with their subject and an attitude of extreme bitterness. Then it will be possible to have a portrait of Dickens which will also be a portrait of his age—and of a good deal of our own as well.

WILLIAM TROY

One Man's Road

Personal History. By Vincent Sheehan. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

IN 1918 Vincent Sheehan was a freshman at the University of Chicago. When, in November, the Armistice was declared, it seemed to him that he had been somehow cheated. A premature peace had swindled him out of his slice of glory, of adventure, of high-gear living. The millions of American undergraduates who shared his sense of frustration must, no doubt, soon have contented themselves with life's tamer pleasures, but not so Sheehan. Four years later he was in Paris, one of the bright young expatriate newspapermen who clustered about the offices of the Paris Herald and the smaller, more impecunious Paris Times. Next he was at Lausanne, covering the Peace Conference for the Chicago Tribune; then he was with the Army of Occupation in the Ruhr; and from that time on the red-haired Irish-American journalist was hot on the heels of whatever wars and revolutions the post-war world had to offer him. He was in the Riff with Abd-El-Krim; he was in Moscow; he was in China with Borodin when Chiang Kai-shek betrayed the Chinese Revolution; he was, finally, in the Holy Land when Arabs and Jews massacred each other under a strictly neutral British imperialist flag.

Fortunately for his success as an itinerant newspaperman, Sheehan was no mere observer of these affairs, no placid camp-follower. He was, frequently, a definite participant. He possessed a talent for having what his paper described as "personal adventures," and his career was peppered with hair-raising exploits and hair-breadth escapes. A legend grew up about him, until he was believed to be no ordinary journalist but a buccaneering young adventurer in the Richard Harding Davis tradition.

"Personal History" is Sheehan's refutation of this legend. The young man who reveals himself in this autobiography is certainly no ordinary journalist, but neither is he a professional adventurer. He is a human being of extraordinary taste and sensibility, who throughout fifteen years of turbulent experience has been primarily interested in moral values. Violence

AT SENSATIONAL REDUCTIONS!

Great Modern Books in Their Original Editions—NOT Reprints

40% to 70% off their former prices

Original Editions is an organization which offers you, in their original, handsome formats:

BOOKS FROM SUCH LEADING PUBLISHERS AS HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY; DODD, MEAD AND COMPANY; HARPER AND BROTHERS; LITTLE, BROWN AND COMPANY, AND WHITTLESEY HOUSE.

IMPORTANT, WORTHWHILE BOOKS
FORMERLY $2.00 TO $15.00 Now as low as

$1.01

HERE ARE SOME OF THE 84 TITLES ON THE FIRST LIST ORDER THEM BY NUMBER—USE THE COUPON BELOW

1. NEW DIMENSIONS by Paul T. Frank—was $6.00, now $1.89
2. DESERT DRUMS by Leo Crane—was $5.00, now $1.59
3. FISHERS OF BOOKS by Barton Currie—was $4.00, now $1.69
4. PILGRIMS, INDIANS AND PATRIOTS by Randolph G. Adams—was $3.00, now $1.49
5. AMERICAN DRAMATISTS by Montrose J. Moses—was $3.50, now $1.29
6. HIGH TARTARY by Owen Lattimore—was $4.00, now $1.59
7. CULTURE AND PROGRESS by William Dallam Wallis—was $5.00, now $1.89
8. DRAWN FROM LIFE by S. J. Woolf—was $5.00, now $2.49
9. EDWARD VII, Man and King, by H. E. Wortham—was $4.00, now $1.49
10. THEODORE ROOSEVELT by Lord Charnwood—was $2.50, now $1.01
11. THE GALLANTS by E. Barrington—was $3.50, now $1.01
12. THOMAS HOLLEY CHIVERS, Friend of Poe, by S. Foster Damon—was $5.00, now $1.69
13. SCULPTURE by A. M. Rindge—was $6.00, now $1.69
14. THE WORKS OF FRANCIS RABELAIS by Nock and Wilson—was $15.00, now, Boxed, $4.94
15. JEFFERSON by Albert Jay Nock—was $2.75, now $1.29
16. FOUNDATIONS OF MODERN ART by Amedee Ozenfant—was $5.00, now $2.49
17. NEW BACKGROUNDS FOR A NEW AGE by E. A. Park—was $5.00, now $1.94
18. JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU by Matthew Josephson—was $5.00, now $1.94
19. MODERN AMERICAN PAINTERS by Samuel Kootz—was $5.00, now $1.49
20. MASKS, MIMES AND MIRACLES by Allardye Nicoll—was $15.00, now $4.94

21. AMERICAN ESTIMATES by Henry S. Canby—was $3.00, now $1.01
22. THE CRITICAL YEAR by Howard K. Beale—was $2.75, now $1.01
23. PUSS IN BOOKS edited by Elizabeth Drew and Michael Joseph—was $3.00, now $1.01
24. BOOKS AND BIDDERS by A. S. W. Rosenbach—was $5.00, now $1.94

SEND NO MONEY—unless you want to Mail this coupon to ORIGINAL EDITIONS and on receipt of your order, pay the postman cost plus postage—or enclose check or money order plus postage.

FREE CATALOG

Check the coupon box calling for a catalog and we will send you a complete list of ORIGINAL EDITIONS publications free, without obligation.

MAIL THIS COUPON TODAY

ORIGINAL EDITIONS,
100 Madison Avenue, New York City

Gentlemen: Kindly send me, at once, the books corresponding to the numbers which I have circled.

1 2 3 4 5 6
7 8 9 10 11 12
13 14 15 16 17 18
19 20 21 22 23 24

☐ Send C. O. D. I will pay postman cost of order plus postage.

☐ I enclose check or money order plus 8 cents per volume for postage.

☐ Please send free catalog.

NAME

STREET..... CITY

MAIL THIS COUPON TODAY

In your bookstore.
Look for the books with this band.

and catastrophe per se have not attracted him, but he has found that in scenes of crisis the current of human affairs runs clearest. His book is only incidentally a chronicle of events; it is, at bottom, a serious study of the relation of an individual to the world. Sheean's clear-sighted perception of this problem, his peculiar, passionate approach to it, turn a lively, well-written piece of journalism into a first-class literary work.

Like many another sensitive, highly organized human being, Sheean experimented with pure sensationalism, and found it not wholly satisfying. Experience in itself may be pleasant, but it is pointless unless it can in some manner be related to a larger experience, to the cosmos, and thus be invested with significance. How this significance is to be achieved, how the one life is to be fused with the many, is the problem which early in life Sheean posed for himself, and which, after fifteen years of hesitation and confusion, he finally solved. To identify himself with the world revolution, to work in his own way for the classless society—this has been his decision, his answer to the problem, but the answer is not so unusual or so interesting as the method by which he arrived at it.

Many have come to the revolution by way of economics, many via philosophy; many have come from prejudice, or need, or simple, blind faith; but few have come by Sheean's road. That road is an anachronism today: it is the road of a child, or of an old-fashioned, pragmatic moralist. During his years in journalism Sheean devoted himself more to the study and the evaluation of character than he did to his "personal adventures." He had a warm, intuitive appreciation of human beings and a strong moral sense which compelled him to estimate their value. In China he met a man named Borodin and a woman named Rayna Prohme, both of whom were working for the Communist International. These, he felt, were the finest human beings he had ever known, the clearest, most radiant human spirits. Observing them he found their minds and emotions bound up with the revolutionary movement, their lives magnetized to a Communist pole. He was converted by what he saw, as people once must have been christianized more by the sight of Jesus or St. Paul than by their teachings. The whole history of his conversion—his doubts, his sense of weakness, his temporary apostasy—has a Biblical tenor. I do not know whether Moscow would look with favor on so reactionary a young revolutionist; I doubt whether party doctrine would sanction his ultimate decision to cultivate his own garden; but I am sure that Sheean's road to revolution is an original and honest one, and that his account of the journey is actually heart-warming.

MARY MCCARTHY

Little Man Once More

The World Outside. By Hans Fallada. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

HERR FALLADA'S second novel to reach America is also a story of a little man. Willi Kufalt, its chief character—one would never call Willi a hero—spends a year out of prison in between two prison terms, a year in which he finds that the penitentiary gives him everything in the world he needs except liberty; on the whole, he decides, it is a good bargain. Inside he is safe, fed, warmed, given an occupation, and provided with the preoccupation of besting his prison mates and his guards by the trivial cunning at which he is adept. In his year of liberty he found the world a much crueler, harder place than prison had been. When the gates close on him once more he experiences nothing but relief.

All this Herr Fallada describes with informative detail, realistic speech, an insight into the hearts of his characters, and even some pity and terror. Willi, if he is not in any sense a noble figure, is a pathetic and a recognizable one. One does not doubt, when the book is finished, that prison is as Willi finds it; that the world, without precisely meaning to be, was allied against him when he came out; that with all the good intentions in the world he did not have a chance to make an honest living. Because of the convincingness with which Willi's tale is told, "The World Outside" has been described as an important social novel. Willi is Everyman who somehow has got into trouble. Once Everyman gets into trouble, the whole world makes a point of seeing that he does not get out.

But this is doing Herr Fallada too much honor—or perhaps too little. He wrote the story of Willi, not of Everyman with the world against him. Willi was weak as a lad with plenty of opportunity to make his way in the world, with an indulgent father who did not lack means to educate him, with a comfortable middle-class bringing up. Even with this much of the world on his side, Willi began by getting himself into a mess. It was a very small mess, the result of narrow-minded provincialism, but a mess nevertheless. In other words, Willi never had much sense, in so far as sense means a feeling for the fitness of things, or more grandly, social responsibility. Because he didn't have much sense he eventually landed in prison; when he got out, his none too sharp wits, coupled with however good intentions, did nothing but get him back in again, where wit was not needed to provide food and shelter.

This is not to say that if Willi's IQ had been higher he could surely have beaten the forces which were opposed to him during his year of freedom. But it is altogether possible that he might never have landed in prison in the first place. Not the grim injustices of the social order but his own intellectual shortcomings were his undoing; which makes "The World Outside" not an important social novel but a convincing novel of character, a comedy in which the hero—perhaps in this sense Willi is a hero after all—lives happily ever after.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Democracy and Infantry

Democracy and Military Power. By Silas Bent McKinley. With an Introduction by Charles A. Beard. The Vanguard Press. $3.

THIS book should be classed with the recent opus of Enrico Malatesta, which maintained that the engineering of a social revolution was more or less a routine job of striking at the nerve centers of the modern state. Professor McKinley is, of course, no fascist—indeed, he is full of anxiety for the safety of democracy—but his own contribution to social theory is characterized by similar emphasis upon the purely mechanical factors in history. There appears to be developing a mechanical interpretation of history.

Professor McKinley seeks to maintain the thesis that the existence of democracy since the days of the Greek hoplite has always depended upon the dominance of a citizen infantry in military organization. Infantry and democracy, cavalry and autocracy are correlatives. Thus democracy was impossible in the Middle Ages because the knight bestrode Western Christendom with his highly expensive charger and accoutrement, which were quite beyond the economic reach of the common man. With the substitution, however, of a citizen army for mercenary forces, democracy revived. Popular government was assured by the fact that the minute man could seize his relatively inexpensive musket. The triumph of fascism is now to be feared precisely because modern war equipment, such as the tank, which presumably may be roughly equilibrated to the charger, is now beyond the means of the average citizen, and the dominance of the infantry in the modern army seems very much in doubt.

Perhaps the first reaction of the gentle reader will be to rush forth to buy himself the proper colored shirt. But then again he may reflect that Professor McKinley, confounding cause with effect, has overlooked many things. The importance of the invention of particular forms of arms may be readily conceded—as a single factor. But is not democracy supposed to have had some connection with other inventions, such as printing? In other words, is not democracy determined by a whole complex of factors, economic, political, and cultural? Should it not be possible to devise some forms of political control over the military machine? Are not even the most complex and expensive military weapons operated by the common man? Would not the highly mechanized modern army be particularly menaced by the possibility of civilian revolt? Under modern industrial conditions is not the service of supply even more important than the equipment in the field, and is not the concept of the nation in arms an indubitable reality no matter what form of tactics is adopted? At any rate, does history always repeat itself? Finally, even if the overwhelming importance of a citizen infantry be conceded, will it play a negligible role in the future? The military experts disagree; many would not deprive the common man of his inalienable privilege of serving as cannon fodder.

Professor Beard's introduction to Professor McKinley's book exhibits consummate tact. He dwells upon the general importance of the problem of controlling military power. He just hints that perhaps Professor McKinley has neglected the influence of ideas in the evolution of democracy.

WILLIAM SEAGLE

In
The Nation
Next Week

a Debate between

LEO WOLMAN

Chairman of the Automobile Labor Board

and

WILLIAM M.
LEISERSON

Chairman of the National Mediation
Board

on

Collective Bargaining

"EVERYONE interested in the new proletarian fiction should stop and take notice. It is the most vivid and convincing of recent working-class novels."
—says The Saturday Review of Literature in a lengthy feature review of

RALPH BATES'
LEAN MEN

SIX HUNDRED PAGES of crowded action, of realism to grip even a calloused imagination, and a love story as tender as ever lingered in memory, with the recent Spanish revolution as a colorful, dramatic background!

"One of the most interesting novels from England in recent years."
—New York Sun

"Far and away the best novel of the week, brilliantly written, exciting to the point of melodrama! He has more wit, color, humor and poetry than most of his contemporaries. If anything, he is too rich, too generous. There are pages on music in this book which could have been written by few other authors."
—New Yorker

Price $2.50
at all bookstores

THE MACMILLAN CO.
60 Fifth Avenue, New York City

The Great Depression
By LIONEL ROBBINS

"In the deluge of books about the depression, this easily emerges as among the most important."
$3.00
—N. Y. Times

The Art of Poetry

A Tearless Glass. With a Preface on the Art of Poetry. By Louis Grudin. Covici-Friede. $2.

THE eighteen poems which compose this book are prefaced by an essay, as pompous as it is erudite, entitled Poetry and Causal Symbolism. The author defines causal symbolism as "the limitation of the references of items as items of the schemes in which they are ordered, aside from whatever references the items may have beyond their correlation in such schemes." He asserts further, in words which seem to him worthy of being set in italics, that "we can make a causal process. And this in fact is just what we do when we perform a work of art." He pouts his lip at the art-for-art's-sakers, dismisses, more respectfully, the Marxian critics, and concludes that today "the critical task is . . . to discern the different human practices as fields of causal symbolism, as distinct logics, and to master the arts of translation." I am not at all sure that I have succeeded in disentangling his meaning from the wrappings of an arid, abstract, and intricate diction, but if I do understand him, Mr. Grudin is saying that the artist imposes order upon the buzzing, blooming confusion of experience; that the phenomenon produced by his deliberate effort is complex and unique; and that this result is to be judged as an entity and with regard to the peculiar laws of its formation.

This is no great news, although at the present juncture it is worth restating, as is Mr. Grudin's repetition of the currently disregarded fact that the degree in which the "social utility" of a literary work is achieved "depends upon the degree in which its literary purpose is realized." Van Wyck Brooks said the same thing some years ago with a cogency lacking in Mr. Grudin's lucubrations, and more recently Ezra Pound observed: "Writers as such have a definite social function, exactly proportioned to their ability as writers." Indeed, one might remark that the critical utility of Mr. Grudin's essay would be greater were it more satisfactory as literature.

The handful of poems which follow are uneven in quality, but worthy of respect as sincere transcripts of experience. The author wants an ear for cadence and studs his free verse with obtrusive rhymes. Some phrases seem the result of a mere childish desire to startle. Vague echoes of T. S. Eliot play hide-and-seek with reminiscences of Maxwell Bodenheim's lyric style, and the result is not a happy one. Among the most successful poems are three at the beginning of the book: Word, a poem about death which evades obviousness; Camera, a sardonic exclamation of pity; and Idle Noon, the conclusion of which triumphs over the heavy imagery of its opening. The portrait of Horace Gregory is oversimplified and the Homage to S. C. a piece of venomous baroque. Numbers 3 and 10 of Youth, 1920, are more vivid than the other panels in a picture that is scarcely as ample as its title implies.

BABETTE DEUTSCH

1935—TENTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE VIKING PRESS

STATISTICS AND PHILOSOPHY

If you would know the facts which must underlie any consideration of America's economic life—if you would know the philosophic basis of the modern state—two recent books will be revealing to you.

In 1934, the administration instituted the National Survey of Potential Product Capacity under the direction of Harold Loeb. This fact-finding commission traced the flow of commodities from raw material through all the intervening stages to the finished product. To correlate the mass of facts gathered by the survey, a master chart was drawn up which shows how the productive capacity of America relates to the needs of the people.

The Chart of Plenty by Harold Loeb and Associates ($2.50) reveals the implication of these facts. It clearly demonstrates that by utilizing its full capacity, our present productive system could afford every family in the United States the equivalent, in goods and services, of $4,370 annually. Here is the incontrovertible answer to the much-debated question—"How much can America really produce?" Here, too, are the basic facts for any discussion of our economic problems.

Harold J. Laski has been for years a leader of progressive thought in England and a member of the Labour Party "Brains Trust". The State in Theory and Practice ($3.00) is a scholarly, challenging presentation of Mr. Laski's views on the state and its future. He contends that the power of the state rests, in the last analysis, on coercion, and he shows how and why that coercive power is wielded in favor of those who control the instruments of production. He makes clear how, when the unpropertied feel that they are receiving less than the productive system is capable of giving them, conflict is inevitable. Finally, he shows, by reference to recent historical events, what steps industrialists take in attempting to postpone or avoid that conflict. The State in Theory and Practice suggests the dangerous future which confronts modern society and indicates a rational way of preparing for it.

THE CHART OF PLenty

THE STATE in THEORY and PRACTICE

Drama

Shaw for Shaw's Sake

THE most recent plays by Bernard Shaw are commonly regarded as the products of senility. It may be that they are, but as I watched the latest unfold upon the stage of the Guild Theater I found myself not only very genuinely diverted but suddenly possessed of a brand-new theory to account for the rambling character which "The Simpleton of the Unexpected Isles" shares with "The Apple Cart" and "Too True to Be Good." That theory is as follows: Bernard Shaw is not senile, but merely come at last to the point where he feels justified in doing exactly as he likes. For nearly fifty years he courted the public in his own indirect way, sweating over the difficult problem of expressing himself in terms it would accept, and shaping his unconventional plays into something remotely resembling the conventional form. Then, at about three score and ten, he realized that there was no reason why he should bother himself any longer. The public be damned. He would write exactly what he found it fun to write and leave it in the form it happened to be in when it ceased to be fun to work on.

Now it is not easy for a confirmed puritan like Mr. Shaw to become irresponsible, even at an advanced age; but as soon as he achieved one irresponsibility he achieved another. There had always been a playful and a mystic side to his nature, but what we may call the Beatrice and Sidney Webb side was always getting in the way of both. Though his natural impulse was to write a farce about God, conscience warned him of his duty to consider the abuses of landlordism, and for half a century he forced himself to be what he—if no one else—fondly believed to be practical. At last, however, he has freed himself from the fetish of practicality. As he announced in "Too True to Be Good," world affairs have now got beyond the point where even he could arrange them. He is convinced at last that mankind is damned beyond hope of redemption, and the conviction has taken a great weight off his mind. Since nothing could be of any use, there is no need to keep up the effort to be useful. The man who "can explain anything to anybody and who enjoys doing it" gives way to his profoundest impulses. He talks copiously and vivaciously about everything and indulges in horseplay to his heart's content. True, some of the subjects which occur to him are political and moral. But they are no longer supposed to have any practical bearing on anything. In so far as satire persists, it is no longer directed at specific abuses which the author is hoping to correct but, like much classical satire, is merely disinterested comment upon the folly, perverseness, and stupidity of the human race. In other words, these later plays are not tracts at all. They are simply Shaw for Shaw's sake.

"The Simpleton of the Unexpected Isles" is the least serious of the three late plays, and to me—though not, apparently, to most of my colleagues—it is consistently entertaining. For that, a good deal of credit must go to the Guild, which has provided a delightful series of fanciful settings by Lee Simonson and a cast so rich that, besides Nazimova and Romney Brent in the featured roles, it provides for secondary parts such first-rate performers as Rex O'Malley and McKay Morris. Mr. Brent especially is a delight to watch as the cheerful Simpleton, and there never was a play so bad that it would not be worth seeing if he were in it. But I insist that Mr. Shaw's text is diverting too, and that the only way in which an intelligent spectator can prevent himself from enjoying it is by doing what intelligent spectators at Shaw plays have always been told to do, namely, try to discover its serious meaning. It is true that all sorts of things which have a specious air of "significance" happen. A group of English men and women form with two Orientals a polygamous-polyandrous family for the purpose of producing perfect children, only to discover that the said children have impeccable artistic consciences but no moral consciences at all—a defect which their parents propose to rectify by crossing the two females with the clergyman-simpleton, whose father had raised him on synthetic nitrogen exclusively; England attempts to secede from the Empire in order to regain her independence; Judgment Day is announced by a conventional Sunday School angel who explains that the damned—that is, the useless—will simply fade away, and then asks to be directed to a convenient flat roof from which he can make a take-off. It is also true that every now and then one or another of the characters begins some vatic utterance which seems for the moment to be about to embody the "lesson" of the play—as, for example, when one announces that we must always have wars because only by wars can the world be changed, even though, of course, the changes made are never the ones intended; or when, at the very end, the priestess proclaims that though poor foolish men are always seeking security, the only things they ever get are something very much better, namely, wonder and adventure. But for all this and for all a very great deal more, I do not believe that the play has any consistent thesis or any coherent body of ideas. Mr. Shaw, who used to be accused of being a divertingly naughty young man when he was really so earnest about nearly everything, has become a divertingly naughty old man at last, though no one seems willing to admit the fact, and "The Simpleton of the Unexpected Isles" ought to be highly entertaining to any intelligent person who is willing to take it as the vaudeville that it is. Of course if Mr. Shaw should ever hear of this interpretation he would reply that the play is, on the contrary, the most carefully constructed as well as the most clear and most deadly serious of all his works. But, then, Mr. Shaw once insisted that the "Ring" of Wagner was a musical commentary on "Das Kapital."

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

Getting an Inside View of SOVIET RUSSIA . . .

The OPEN ROAD

helps you penetrate beneath the surface. Through long-established connections with Soviet institutions and through its own independent representation in Moscow, it enables you to meet people . . . affords more than ordinary tourist services. Inquiring travelers . . . students, teachers, and members of the professions . . . are invited to consult regarding their plans . . . either for group tours or individual arrangements . . . without obligation or expense.

Ninth Season

18th Floor
The OPEN ROAD
56 WEST 45TH STREET NEW YORK
Cooperating with Intourist

MOSCOW
UNIVERSITY SUMMER SCHOOL

$366 to $380 Including Passage

BOOKS

The SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE

By I. E. Hutton, M. D.

"Dr. Ira Wile describes the book as a clear, succinct, non-emotional, authoritative and conservative exposition of the practical factors involved in making marriage successful on the sexual level. . . It is primarily concerned with the conduct of the honeymoon and with the technique of sexual performance."—Dr. Morris Fishbein. Price $2.00 (postage 15c extra)

EMERSON BOOKS, INC., 333 SIXTH AVENUE, NEW YORK CITY

FOR OFFICE USE

FOR READING ROOMS

WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE

The Necessary Quick-Reference
Book for Home and Office Use

A Merriam-Webster

The best abridged dictionary. The largest of the Merriam-Webster abridgments. 1268 pages; 106,000 entries; 1700 illustrations. Thin paper, indexed: Cloth, $3.50; Fabrikoid, $5.00; Leather, $7.00; Pigskin, dark blue natural, $8.50. Purchase of your book—seller or send order and remittance direct to the publishers, or write for free information.

G. & C. MERRIAM CO.
508 Broadway Springfield, Mass.

☐ PLAYS ☐ DEBATE ☐

Are Soviet Methods of Political Justice Defensible?

DEBATE

Negative

Affirmative

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD JOHN HOWARD LAWSON
Editor, The Nation Playwright

Chairman: ROGER BALDWIN

SUNDAY, MARCH 3rd, at 4 P. M.

Fifth Avenue Theatre, 28th St. and Broadway

Under direction of
FRANCES GROSSEY
63 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C.

ADMISSION: 35c - 55c

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

S. N. BEHRMAN'S play

RAIN FROM HEAVEN

with JANE COWL and JOHN HALLIDAY

GOLDEN THEATRE, 45th Street, West of Broadway.
Evenings 8:30. Matinees Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
(in association with Charles B. Cochran)
for a limited engagement

ELISABETH BERGNER in

ESCAPE ME NEVER

by MARGARET KENNEDY

SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway.
Evenings 8:30. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30.

☐ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says ☐

ACCENT ON YOUTH. Plymouth Theater. Hopeful message for the middle-aged in a lively comedy about playwright in love with his secretary. Witty and amusing.

ANYTHING GOES. Alvin Theater. Victor Moore as Public Enemy No. 13 in a No. 1 musical revue, with Ethel Merman at her best.

ESCAPE ME NEVER. Shubert Theater. Here is a heap of theatrical rubbish, romantically entitled. Few if any indeed, could play it one-half as charmingly as Elisabeth Bergner.

LIFE BEGINS AT 8:40. Winter Garden. Disputes with "Anything Goes" for first place among the revues.

POST ROAD. Ambassador Theater. Novel and exciting crook melodrama which begins as a quiet domestic comedy but has lots of surprises up its sleeve.

RAIN FROM HEAVEN. Golden Theater. Perhaps the best—and certainly the most substantial—of S. N. Behrman's excellent comedies. With Jane Cowl as a charming embodiment of urbanity and tolerance in a world seemingly about to lose both.

REVENGE WITH MUSIC. New Amsterdam Theater. Charles Winninger, Rex O'Malley, and Libby Holman in a lavish and generally entertaining operetta with lots of comedy and some good dancing in a more or less Spanish manner.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR. Maxine Elliott's Theater. Tense but grim drama about a fiendishly perverse child, who is played with extraordinary force by Florence McGee. One of the most-discussed plays of the year.

THE PETRIFIED FOREST. Broadhurst Theater. Superb performance by Leslie Howard in Robert Sherwood's engrossing play about a lost intellectual. Exciting melodrama but a great deal more besides.

THUMBS UP. St. James Theater. Bobby Clark, Hal Le Roy, and others in a slightly old-fashioned but entertaining review.

TOBACCO ROAD. Forrest Theater. Sub-human but fascinating behavior of the Georgia crackers.

Films

"Sequoia"

THE spirit of Rousseau, wafted across the centuries and settling over the almost virgin wilds of the Sierra Nevadas, is quite clearly to be detected in "Sequoia," which has opened to as robust a chorus of approbation as any picture this season. Belonging to the class of films which endeavor to initiate us into the mysteries of the animal kingdom, it is also, in its way, a lesson in the manner in which man has broken "nature's social union." Its story is based on the not too credible friendship that grows up between two foundlings of the mountain forest—a young puma and a fawn. The orphans are rescued by the young daughter of a nature-loving author and sheltered in her cabin until the naturally repressed instincts of the more savage of the two make him a menace to the other human inhabitants of the region. But their beautiful friendship continues even after they have been allowed to roam and gambol at will through the giant California redwoods. The climax occurs when the puma, now a formidable representative of his species, leaps to the rescue of his friend, the deer, just as the latter is about to be shot by a dastardly huntsman. All this is of course too crudely sentimental, too much an affair for the children, to be taken very seriously; and one can hardly be expected to be upset by the propagandist implications that the state of California should have more and better game laws. The picture will appeal for different reasons to former Boy Scouts, legislators, professional hikers, and vegetarians. But it is only fair to say that it will at the same time appeal to those people for whom the simple movements of animals in action provide a welcome relief from the rendition of major human emotions by some of our more distinguished Hollywood actors. Despite the slight evidence of any real plastic sense on the part of either director or camera man, the natural line and movement of the animals in certain scenes—one might mention in particular the scaling of a high-walled corral by a whole herd of deer—give to the picture occasional moments of the purest abstract beauty. It is, in a word, the sort of picture whose sole reward is for the eye—a description which is not altogether complimentary perhaps but would be even less so in a season that offered anything more.

In a fortnight that has seen two filmed recruiting posters for the United States marines, a version of one of Robert Nathan's novels with Janet Gaynor in the principal role, and a blurred French print of "Topaze," the only encouraging news that can be reported is that "Chapayev" is in its seventh week at the Cameo. To see this Soviet film for a second or third time is a considerably more exciting experience than to see any of the newer Hollywood offerings for a first time. But that is far from being the tribute that it deserves from the disheartened wanderer through the waste land of the current Broadway screen world.

WILLIAM TROY

Next Week

NORMAN THOMAS

will review

"The Nature of Capitalist Crisis"

by John Strachey

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXL

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 13, 1935

No. 3636

Contents

| | |
|--|-----|
| EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS | 289 |
| EDITORIALS: | |
| We Must Not Arm Against Japan! | 292 |
| Propaganda and the Schools | 293 |
| A Peace Chapter Ends | 293 |
| Misery in Arkansas | 294 |
| ISSUES AND MEN. FLORIDA FLAMBOYANT. By Oswald Garrison Villard | 295 |
| HEARST'S RUSSIAN "FAMINE." By Louis Fischer | 296 |
| COLLECTIVE BARGAINING: A DEBATE | |
| Labor Relations in the Automobile Industry. By Leo Wolman | 297 |
| Is It Collective Bargaining? By W. M. Leiserson | 298 |
| WHAT PRICE TRUTH AND PURITY? By R. G. S. | 301 |
| SOCIAL INSURANCE IN THE SOVIET UNION. By Kathleen Barnes | 302 |
| IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter | 304 |
| CORRESPONDENCE | 305 |
| LABOR AND INDUSTRY: | |
| Red-Baiters' Holiday in Sacramento. By Travers Clement | 306 |
| The Little Yellow Schoolhouse. By Heywood Brown | 308 |
| Labor Notes | 309 |
| BOOKS AND DRAMA: | |
| "Que Scay-je?" By Joseph Wood Krutch | 310 |
| Mr. Strachey States the Case for Communism. By Norman Thomas | 310 |
| New Country. By William Troy | 311 |
| Living History. By Mary McCarthy | 312 |
| Shorter Notices | 313 |
| Drama: "Awake and Sing." By Joseph Wood Krutch | 314 |
| CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE | 316 |

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three Years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN: $1 a year additional.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by the Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

ALTHOUGH THE BELGIAN-AMERICAN trade agreement appears on the surface to be more significant than the unfortunate Brazilian pact, it comes as a bitter disillusionment to those who had hoped that the Administration's tariff policy would effect a substantial breach in the world's trade barriers. In all only about one-third of the dutiable imports from Belgium are affected by the tariff cuts, and on these the actual reduction averages but 24 per cent—this despite the fact that one-fifth of the articles are not produced in the United States, and none competes directly with products of domestic manufacture. In the case of eighteen of the forty-seven items on which reductions are granted, American exports are greater than imports, indicating that the United States possesses a definite competitive advantage without recourse to tariff protection. And despite their non-competitive character, seventeen out of the forty-seven articles carried duties of from 50 to 150 per cent! The duty on plate glass, for example, was equivalent to an ad valorem levy of 86.9 per cent in 1931, although recent improvements in American technique have practically eliminated the possibility of foreign competition. In exchange for these "concessions," Belgium has agreed to lower duties an average of 35 per cent on forty-five different articles, imports of which aggregated $16,335,000 in 1933, or three times the amount covered by the American reduction. Concessions of from 64 to 80 per cent were made in the duties on automobile parts, American exports of which were valued at nearly $5,000,000 in 1928, and important reductions were made on fruits, lard, and rubber products. In contrast with the Brazilian pact, where the meagerness of the American concessions was defended on the ground that Brazil had a favorable balance of trade, the United States has not only maintained a large favorable balance with Belgium, but has increased its relative advantage in the past few years. Thus it is apparent once more that tariff reciprocity, instead of being utilized to correct the top-heavy trade balance of the United States, is being employed as a weapon to push down the defenses of debtor countries in such a manner as to accentuate the basic maladjustments in the flow of international payments.

THE REVOLT IN GREECE represents a dramatic effort on the part of the republicans to stave off the establishment of a military dictatorship which would restore King George to the throne. While discontent has long been evidenced against the reactionary Tsaldaris government, the immediate crisis seems to have been precipitated by the appointment of General Metaxas, leader of the Greek fascists, as a member of the Cabinet and as commander of the Athenian headquarters. General Metaxas appears to enjoy the full confidence and support of General Kondylis, Minister of War, and leader of the army. The presence of the veteran politician, Eleutherios Venizelos, in the ranks of the revolutionists is sufficient to indicate that the uprising is in no sense a radical one; it suggests rather a rallying of the forces of parliamentarianism against the threat of suppression of all political liberties. At this stage the revolt gives every indication of being more successful than was the uprising last October in Spain against forces of a similar character. If it is, Greece will take its place as the only country in southern or central Europe where even the forms of democracy are preserved.

GREAT BRITAIN'S PROPOSAL for an international loan to the Nanking government is significant as a desperate and belated effort to stem the tide of Japanese expansion in the Far East. It is obvious that Nanking must be aided if it is to maintain its power in the face of growing economic disintegration and an accompanying increase in Communist influence. All phases of China's national economy are suffering from the deflation induced by the silver policy of the United States. Foreign trade is falling off, industrial production is declining, and unemployment—always severe in China—is on the increase. In the past, assistance to China has usually been granted by an international consortium, but in the present crisis Japan has sought to take advantage of the country's extremity to further its long-range political and economic aspirations. Recent reports from Nanking indicate that Chiang Kai-shek has already yielded to many of the Japanese demands in anticipation of substantial financial aid, a hypothesis which is strengthened by Japan's rejection of Britain's offer. Whether Britain and America by their tardy and half-hearted offer of assistance can prevent these plans from being carried to fruition is problematical. However, one point is clear: if the Western powers fail in their demand for participation in the proposed loan, the Open Door in China will be finally closed.

A GREAT EDITOR and a still greater reformer and crusader was lost to journalism in the death of Fremont Older, editor of the San Francisco Call-Bulletin, on March 3. Indeed, it is doubtful whether American journalism has ever produced a more dauntless fighter in behalf of wronged individuals and unpopular causes than Mr. Older. Without being a great writer, or a fine writer, he could strike out with such vigor and power as to suggest the unleashing of an elemental force. It was he who sent Mayor Eugene Schmitz and Abraham Ruef to San Quentin as a result of his graft exposures—only to turn around within six months and do his utmost to get Ruef out of jail. It was the last of his man hunts. The personal bitterness he felt against individual wrongdoers passed then and there. He had suddenly come to realize that sending people to jail as he had been doing with ruthless ferocity, often using indefensible and cruel means to achieve his ends, was not going to cure the evils from which society was suffering. He threw himself into prison reform, into the redemption of crooks instead of their punishment; he fought for them with the same intensity with which he had waged war against them. It was he who came to the aid of Tom Mooney and ferreted out the truth about the case, for which achievement the rich and respectable of San Francisco were ready to tear him limb from limb. Yet it is a regrettable fact that this superb champion of the oppressed had to spend his declining years on a Hearst newspaper whose owner he despised. None the less, his loss is a great one, for there is no one left in California journalism to compare with him. And if ever a state needed crusaders for justice and fair play to the workers, it is that same California.

THE SPECTACULAR DECLINE in the exchange value of sterling has once again revived the specter of a world-wide currency war. While the fall of the pound is apparently due to rumors of an impending political crisis in England rather than to deliberate governmental policy, it has been widely interpreted as a maneuver to give British exporters an advantage over their American and Continental rivals. Irrespective of the accuracy of this charge, the cheapened pound is bound to accentuate the difficulties of the gold bloc and if continued is likely to drive France to abandon its efforts to maintain the franc at its existing parity. Should the pound and the franc both suffer a sharp decline, inflationary groups in this country are almost certain to renew pressure for the further devaluation of the dollar. Thus, without any country actually willing it, the long-feared competition in currency depreciation may already be under way. If so, it is evident that this country must shoulder primary responsibility. For nearly two years the dollar has been undervalued on the world market, to the advantage of our export trade; yet during the entire time we have refused either to fix the value of the dollar permanently or to join with other nations in a scheme for international stabilization. Faced with unrelenting competition with the cheap dollar, foreign countries, particularly those remaining on gold, have been forced to choose between continued deflation, trade restrictions, and devaluation. If they should ultimately decide to follow our example and choose the easiest and most dangerous of the three expedients, we have only Professor Warren to thank. It is to be hoped, however, that a belated recognition of the gravity of the situation will spur the Administration to reopen negotiations for an international agreement which, whatever action is taken on gold, would prevent cutthroat competition between the two leading Anglo-Saxon countries.

"IT MUST BE WITH A RIFLE and a bayonet, cold steel," Brigadier General Seth E. Howard, the man responsible for the National Guard in California, assured the House subcommittee in the hearing on the War Department bill. He was complaining about the meager protection of California against labor troubles. "We have in California 6,000,000 people and short of 6,500 troops. Troops to be effective must be armed with rifles, because a pistol is no arm to place in the hands of troops with these groups of disturbers that we are confronted with in the country today. Neither are clubs." Cold steel, he went on to say, was essential. He admitted he was giving rifles to the coast artillery and training the men to use them. "If we get medical units we will give them rifles and make riflemen out of them." The general then went on in a mood of candor: "I want to advise you that today I have my troops under arms, in violation, possibly, of the regulations of the National Guard Bureau. But it is necessary for us to have our picked men with their uniforms and rifles, at their homes in Sacramento. I have two companies on guard, I have the arsenal under guard, and the city and county authorities have increased their force by 300 or 400 per cent." Asked how many men had been responsible for the "revolutionary" condition in California last summer, the general replied: "In the neighborhood of 1,300. There was a very small number of actual agitators, originally less than 300."

FURTHER MILITARIZATION of American youth was advocated before the same committee by General MacArthur, chief of staff. He has his eye on the strapping young men in the CCC camps. "These men are all processed," he said, using the professional term. "They are ready and fit for military training." The particular place in national life he would have them fill is the enlisted reserve, an element in national defense now neglected. "I think nothing would be finer than to take these CCC men who have had six months in camp and give them perhaps two months more in which they would receive a nucleus of military training. We then could enrol them in the enlisted reserve . . . If we had 300,000 enlisted reserves who could be called to the colors immediately, our conditions of preparation for defense would be immeasurably bettered." The army already controls the men in the camps as to clothing, feeding, housekeeping, morale, and discipline. The next step would be easy, and the prestige now enjoyed by General MacArthur at the Capitol makes it appear a probable one. Congressmen listen to him with deference, forgetting that it was he who donned his medals and drove the bonus army out of Washington.

JAMES RORTY, poet, advertising man, and journalist, who did a lively stint on The Nation staff for several months before his Western tour, has made the trip through the Imperial Valley. It is a hazardous journey for any liberal, radical, or mere sightseer, and Mr. Rorty's experience was no exception. He was arrested on suspicion—California suspicions, like other products of that state, are of the giant variety. He was thrown into jail for a day. His person and his car were searched for subversive literature or thoughts. He was "grilled." And finally he was escorted a hundred miles to the border and dumped into Arizona quite without regard to his wishes in the matter. In general he was subjected to all the indignities from which the Bill of Rights is designed to protect an American citizen even though he may have the temerity to enter one of the agricultural valleys of California during a lettuce strike. Unlike literally hundreds of other victims, Mr. Rorty was able to command enough publicity to get Congress interested in the sorry state of civil liberties in the Imperial Valley. He is scheduled to appear before the House Labor Committee when it opens hearings on the Wagner labor-disputes bill—William Connery, the chairman, wants to hear at first hand how agricultural "stiffs" are treated by the growers who rule California. And a special Congressional investigation of the California labor situation and the Rorty incident has been proposed. California is perhaps the richest field for Congressional prospectors in search of exploitation, terrorization, and the suppression of civil liberties.

THAT PECULIAR American institution, trial by Congressional inquiry, is to be set in motion to estimate the administration of Governor Pearson in the Virgin Islands. The effect of the evidence on the public will, we assume, be the determining factor in deciding whether this Republican governor is to be retained by a Democratic Administration. One motive behind the investigation, undoubtedly the chief one, is to get him out, replace him with a Democrat, and end the iniquity of considering an American colonial possession immune to the benefits of the spoils system. But we welcome the inquiry, if only to put an end to whisperings and insinuations. That the fight against Governor Pearson should be financed by Casper Holstein, a wealthy Harlem Negro and Virgin Islander, gives an indication of the kind of cross-currents astir in the case. Holstein, named as one of the policy bankers accepting Dutch Schultz's overlordship, has sent $100,000 to the islands, where naturally he rates as a philanthropist. He is the "angel" of the local anti-Pearson squad. The public may be puzzled as to why the White House does nothing about Judge Wilson, whose conduct in the MacIntosh trial has had national publicity since described by our Washington correspondent. It must be explained by the fact that the judge enjoys the protection of Senator Pat Harrison, who is too valuable to the White House in these days of the Senate deadlock to be deflected from his party loyalty by censure of his protegee.

WHILE COLLEGE TEACHERS and students the country over are uniting to oppose William Randolph Hearst's latest red-baiting campaign and his attacks upon "subversive teaching" in the schools, Dr. John G. Bowman, chancellor of the University of Pittsburgh, has come forward with a touching tribute to Mr. Hearst. Dr. Bowman rallies "every intelligent citizen" to the Hearst cause, which, he believes, is dedicated to "uphold our ideals of patriotism and of reverence." It is significant that this fulsome praise is coincident with the report of the American Association of University Professors on the dismissal of Professor Ralph E. Turner from the University of Pittsburgh last year. The investigators charge that Professor Turner was dropped to soothe the feelings and touch the pocket-books of Pittsburgh's steel and coal millionaires in a fund-raising campaign for the university. So impressive is their report that Pennsylvania legislators, who have recently passed out of the Mellon sphere of influence, are contemplating a thorough delving into matters at the university, which is a state-aided institution. It is probably true that our colleges are filled with undesirable elements, as Mr. Hearst seems to believe, but we are under the impression that they are to be found among the Bowmans rather than among the Turners, and we trust that the state legislature will concur in this judgment.

FURTHER EVIDENCE of the rising anti-red hysteria in this country is furnished by the unprecedented difficulties encountered by the League for Industrial Democracy in presenting its usual midwinter lecture courses. In five cities recently audiences have been evicted. In Lawrence, Kansas, the lectures were booked to be held in a high school. After the first lecture permission was withdrawn as the school board bowed its head to the anti-red campaign of the local press. A neighborhood settlement had agreed to house the L. I. D. lectures in Louisville, Kentucky. But the Colonial Dames heard about it and they told the American Legion and the Legion told the Community Chest, from which the neighborhood house gets its funds, that it would boycott the chest drive if the L. I. D. lectures were held under the auspices of any Community Chest organization. The neighborhood house capitulated, and the lectures were moved to a hotel. At Chattanooga the morning paper, with local patriotic groups lending aid and comfort, led the attack against the L. I. D. lectures when it was announced they would be held, as in 1934, in a high school. The commissioner of education read, trembled, and withdrew permission. For four years the L. I. D. has had its lecture series in Atlanta and the audience has been interracial and non-segregated as in all other cities. On the afternoon of the day the first lecture was to be given, the financial agent of the Wesleyan Memorial Church called the L. I. D. committee to say that the audience must be segregated at the evening meeting or the police would be called. His explanation was twofold. The Men of Justice, an organization similar to the K. K. K., had told him this must be done, and the church was in the midst of a drive to liquidate a debt of long standing. Powers Hapgood, speaking in Knoxville, Tennessee, on the "March of Labor," was described by the Knoxville Journal in a front-page, full streamer headline as "Red on Stage Urges Bloodshed." Immediately the Andrew Johnson Hotel said that no more lectures could be given there. In response to a plea by the L. I. D. committee, the city manager said the meetings could be held in the Market Hall. But pressure from the Journal and patriotic groups caused the city council to force the city manager to withdraw his invitation.

We Must Not Arm Against Japan!

ONE need not be particularly discerning to realize that the Administration's $800,000,000 war budget for 1935-36 is directed specifically against Japan. A glance at the nature of the proposed expenditures is sufficient to confirm this assertion. The bulk of the $200,000,000 which is being asked in excess of the normal budget is to be utilized for the naval-construction program authorized by the Vinson bill. An enlarged navy would only be needed in a conflict with one of two great powers—Great Britain or Japan—and since there has been no period in recent history when cooperation between the two Anglo-Saxon countries has been stronger than at present, it may be assumed that we are concerned solely with our Asiatic rival. Similarly, it is significant that the new army appropriations are to be expended chiefly for airplanes and the strengthening of the defenses of the Pacific Coast. The army also expects to obtain an additional appropriation out of PWA funds for an air base in Hawaii.

Nor is it difficult to understand why certain groups should desire to increase America's fighting strength as a means of restraining Japan. During the past four years the Japanese nation has literally run amuck. It has conquered Manchuria and Jehol by armed force; it has engaged in an undeclared and unprovoked war in Shanghai, and has twice invaded North China; it has increased its own armament expenditures by 130 per cent, and served notice of its refusal to be bound by the Washington naval agreement. If we accept the traditional militarist view that preparedness is the best guaranty of peace, there is reason to assume that an increase of armaments would add to our security against this mad-dog nation. This assumption overlooks the fact, however, that the proposed armament expenditures are not really defensive in character, and are not so regarded abroad. A very small proportion of our naval appropriation is to be spent on ships which are strictly defensive in nature, while the enlargement of our already powerful air fleet clearly suggests a war in which we are the attackers. If self-defense alone were desired, the United States could revise its military and naval policies with a saving of at least half our present war budget. But all our present policies indicate that "defense" is merely a euphemism for the protection of our financial stake in the Far East against Japanese imperial aspirations.

It is evident, therefore, that a suitable defense program must be conditioned by the larger aspects of foreign policy. The chief difficulty in this connection is that the United States has failed to formulate a clear-cut Far Eastern policy to meet the present crisis. We have resented Japanese aggression and sought to preserve the Open Door through non-recognition of the changed status in Manchuria. But rather than face the implications of our position vis-a-vis Japan, we have been content to drift to the very brink of catastrophe. This lack of policy is due largely to our inability to choose among three possible alternatives. In the first place, there are doubtless many groups who would like to see the United States pursue an expansionist course in line with that followed in the past. Since such a program—with its emphasis on the Open Door and the territorial integrity of China—is in direct conflict with Japan's avowed pan-Asiatic policy, it is only logical that we should implement it by strengthening our defenses in the East, fortifying our Pacific possessions, and creating a navy of sufficient size to defeat Japan in its home waters. Obviously this would imply a force far greater than is even now proposed, and, what is more serious, it would inevitably lead to war.

The dangers involved in this course have led a number of observers, liberals and conservatives alike, to favor the second alternative—complete withdrawal from the Far East. If the United States were to abandon the Philippines and the various other Pacific islands, withdraw its military and naval forces from China, and be prepared to take such financial losses as might result from this action, there would appear to be little cause for friction between this country and Japan. In support of this step it may be urged that the whole American investment in the Far East is less than the amount asked for the army and navy in the 1935 budget, while our investments in China and the Philippines combined are less than the sum which General MacArthur is attempting to obtain from the work-relief funds.

Although it is impossible to doubt the sincerity and idealism which motivate many Americans to advocate complete abdication of our position in the East, one must question the practicability of such action. Neither nations nor classes have been known to surrender their vested interests voluntarily. Under the prevailing economic system, surpluses tend inevitably to accumulate, and it is fatal to deny them an outlet. Moreover, there is reason to doubt whether abandonment of the East would actually eliminate the basic causes of international friction. The whole movement toward national isolation merely tends to accentuate the struggle for raw materials and markets which is the basic cause of modern war. To leave China at the mercy of Japan would only strengthen the Japanese Empire in its conflict with the empires of the West.

For those who recoil from the prospect of unbridled Japanese aggression as well as from the specter of war, there remains yet another alternative. By associating itself more fully with the collective systems of security which are developing throughout the world, it is possible for the United States to aid in restraining Japan without setting itself up as the chief opponent of that country's imperialistic aspirations. To make such a policy realistic and effective, it is necessary to recreate a basis of international economic cooperation, which implies an abandonment of our own expansionist policies. This would preclude the possibility of relying on military prowess as a means of gratifying our national ambition, and, like the previous alternative, permit a genuinely defensive military policy.

If the Far Eastern crisis had arisen a few years ago there can be no question which of these alternatives we should have chosen. We should have "followed the flag" without regard for the consequences. But it is difficult to believe that the American people today would countenance

■ war for the protection of American investments if its implications were clearly understood. The danger, however, is not so much that the United States will deliberately choose the first course, but that for lack of constructive statesmanship it will drift into a position where war is inevitable. In the light of prevailing nationalistic passions, passage of the present appropriation bill would be an all but irrevocable step in that direction.

Propaganda and the Schools

AFTER a lively debate in which fundamental questions were raised and discussed, the Department of Superintendence of the National Education Association finally passed an innocuous resolution affirming its "unqualified belief in the principle of academic freedom." Prior to the opening of the formal sessions of the Atlantic City convention, a group of the delegates heard some fiery speeches, including one by Charles A. Beard, who denounced the Hearst papers, and adopted a resolution calling upon the government to investigate newspaper propaganda along with the munitions industry. But when the issue came up before the conference itself, that body rather pointedly refrained from any specific mention of the Hearst campaign against allegedly "red" professors in schools and colleges.

Many of the more radical delegates were frankly furious at the failure of the association to take a strong stand, and Heywood Broun, who had been scheduled to address the group, tore up his speech and roundly berated them for their timidity. While we regret the failure to denounce the Hearst activities, which are so plainly directed against the very academic freedom which the association professed to support, we are by no means inclined to count the whole meeting as a failure. The discussions were realistic and outspoken if the official resolution was not, and the issues were clearly defined. Academic freedom in America is, at best, limited and partial in the vast majority of our schools and colleges, but the issue is no longer simply between academic freedom and unofficial control by political or social pressure. At the moment it is rapidly becoming a conflict between two theories of education—the theory which holds that the business of the school is to present facts or arguments as impartially as possible and the theory which insists that its business is to indoctrinate the student with a set of ideas, conservative or radical as the case may be.

Professor Jesse H. Newlon of Teachers College ably presented the case for indoctrination. Admitting that teachers could not offer their pupils any "preconceived blueprint for the new social order," he felt that the teacher was justified in preaching certain broad doctrines and that we must "make our appeal to the rank and file, not to the privileged classes." "We cannot and we will not remain neutral in the struggle of forces going on in this country," he said, and added that the teacher must teach as a certainty that "capitalism is not the solution to the nation's difficulties." Professor Newlon was replied to by Dr. John W. Studebaker, United States Commissioner of Education, who said, "I am against that kind of indoctrination that seeks to impose upon students by the process of propaganda the particular beliefs of the individual instructor," and who added, rather absurdly, that academic freedom meant the freedom to learn, not the freedom to teach.

The Nation, of course, sympathizes with Professor Newlon's desire to see liberal ideas take root in schools. We are also fully aware of the fact that what is called academic freedom too often means no more than a tame conformity. Nevertheless, we would hesitate long before adopting the theory that education should be regarded as a process by which "correct ideas" (even our own) are imparted to students. We are aware how inevitably, in practice, schools organized on that theory harden into the forms they have tended to assume in Germany and Russia alike, where the teacher is compelled to become the mouthpiece of an official dogma and where control from the outside becomes far more complete and far more universally effective than it has ever been even in the United States. We are inclined to hold that education cannot logically be regarded as a process of indoctrination unless one accepts the doctrine that final truth has been discovered and that learning must henceforth be concerned chiefly with the spread and preservation of that truth. So long as one believes that knowledge grows and changes, one must believe that the younger generation has a right to compare and question, and that free inquiry, not indoctrination, is the ideal of education.

The right to such free inquiry in schools and colleges can never be established once and for all. Today it is far more interfered with from the right than from the left, and for the present the fight for academic freedom means primarily the fight for the adequate recognition of the radical position. Nevertheless, the new society will need the critical spirit as much as the old one does, and the conception of free inquiry should not be lost.

A Peace Chapter Ends

THE first comment we have to make on Judge Nields's decision in the Weirton case is that it brings to an ironic end a story of an effort to obtain justice while maintaining industrial peace. The Weirton workers were organized, ready to strike, strong enough at least to have a fair chance of victory. The Wagner board intervened, pledged the men a victory by the more refined process of elections under government protection. Reluctantly the men remained at work and intrusted their future to the still untested value of the New Deal and its enthusiasm for forgotten people. Reviewing the story in its entirety, one sees that the men lost their cause when they remained at work. The Wagner board could do nothing for them since it had no legal backing. The Steel Board, though supported by a weak law, was likewise helpless, as it led them into the delay of a challenge of the law by the employers. And now the judge has told them in effect that in his district they have no hope for economic power unless they fight for it from start to finish. Since we believe in law and in the legal process we can only trust that Congress will see the impossibility of maintaining industrial relations as interpreted by Judge Nields, and will strengthen the law on collective bargaining.

As to the judge's legal arguments, we are by no means certain that he speaks for other judges of his rank or for the Supreme Court. It is difficult to believe that another court could reconcile their glaring contradictions or sustain their obvious bias. Section 7-a, the learned judge held, is unconstitutional "as applied to the defendant and his business." It is unconstitutional because manufacturing cannot, any more than mining or building, be regarded as "interstate commerce." By so ruling, Judge Nields recurs to the traditionally narrow and literal concept of commerce: it is the physical movement of merchandise from this place to that. This concept, although traditional, is not altogether consistent with the Supreme Court's recent tendency to visualize all business enterprises, except those exclusively local, as participants in a nation-wide "stream," "flow," or "current" of real and money income. Moreover, Judge Nields proves too much. If it is unconstitutional, in view of the interstate-commerce clause, to subject the Weirton Company to collective-bargaining requirements, it must also be unconstitutional to permit the company to avail itself of the "fair-trade" benefits of the iron-and-steel code—basing points, price-fixing, production control, and the like. The court also held that the "relations between employers and employees do not affect interstate commerce." Even in the narrow construction of the term commerce, this position is hardly tenable. The relations between employers and employees can and often do give rise to strikes, lockouts, boycotts, and other obstructions to trade. We have it on the authority of the Supreme Court in such cases that trade unions may be enjoined from restraining "commerce."

Aware of certain legal, if not also logical, difficulties, Judge Nields sought to get around them by proclaiming the community of interest between workers and bosses. The concept that management and labor are separated by "an inevitable and necessary diversity of interests," we are informed, "is an Old World theory" incompatible with the "twentieth-century American theory of mutual interest, understanding, and good-will." Like the theologians who disproved the existence of moons on Saturn by referring to the attributes of Deity, Judge Nields seeks to abolish the class foundations of economic society by judicial pronouncement. At his best he merely parrots the sophistries of apologists for the company union; at his worst he incorporates the sociology of Hitler and Mussolini in American law.

The importance of Judge Nields's decision should not be exaggerated. It is the particular opinion of one district judge on a single specific set of facts. United States district courts in the states of Washington and Virginia have upheld the authority of the labor boards to call for elections pursuant to Section 7-a. United States district courts in the state of Illinois have sustained the validity of the statute in proceedings which arose out of the struggle between the United Mine Workers and the Progressive Miners. The highest courts of Wisconsin, in the Simplex Shoe case, and of New Jersey, in the Bayonne Textile case, have ruled in favor of Section 7-a as a means of establishing employee rights. And we must not forget that the United States Supreme Court, in the famous Texas and New Orleans decision of 1930, disavowed the point of view which Judge Nields now upholds: that it is proper for employers to assist their employees in the choice of representatives for collective bargaining.

Misery in Arkansas

THE misery of the share-cropper has been touched upon in the pages of The Nation. We have also pointed out the ironical fact that the crop-reduction program of the AAA, designed to bring prosperity to the agricultural South, has increased the misery of its lowliest inhabitants. We had hoped to have the full story, and some measure of redress, from the AAA itself. It sent Mrs. Mary Myers as an investigator to Marked Tree, Arkansas, when the arrest and conviction of Ward Rodgers for anarchy made spot news of one of the most bitter and long-standing of American class conflicts. We now learn that the AAA has no intention of publishing her report. To be sure, there is no obligation to publish. But by withholding Mrs. Myers's presumably disinterested interpretation of a crucial situation the AAA is giving aid and comfort to the forces of reaction already in full control in Arkansas.

A bill has been passed by the assembly making sedition a felony and defining it in such broad terms that free speech would be a dead letter. Commonwealth College has just been investigated for "un-American and communistic teaching" and is in actual danger of being closed—several of its students and faculty members have been active in connection with the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union. At Fort Smith, Horace Bryan has been convicted of anarchy after having led a strike of relief workers, and the Reverend Claude Williams has been sentenced to ninety days for barratry (it means "incitement of litigation"!) in connection with the same strike. Meanwhile if anyone feels that "terror" is too strong a word for what is going on in Arkansas, let him read this paragraph from a letter from Lucien Koch of Commonwealth describing an attempt to hold a share-croppers' union meeting.

Five men filed into the room, walked toward me, headed by the riding boss. They ordered me to "come along." I refused. They brandished their revolvers, dragged me from the seat, and kicked me from the room. . . . [Two of them] were violently drunk. I was hustled to a car on the road. Bob was too loyal to see me go alone. . . . They poked guns into our faces and bellies, they kicked us, punched us. . . . We were both bloody about the face and head. . . . Rough treatment started again. Drunk deputies stood around and allowed it to go on. Everything must have been planned beforehand. Our lives weren't worth an Indian penny in the hands of those drunken, frothing madmen.

The share-croppers' union, which has some 5,000 members, both black and white, is making a courageous fight against great odds. Meetings are forbidden in many Arkansas towns; Mr. Koch's letter indicates what sort of protection union leaders may expect from Arkansas sheriffs; scores of union members are being evicted and at the same time black-listed. An appeal to Governor Futrell for temporary refugee camps has been turned down, and Secretary Wallace has refused permission to use government rented land for tent colonies. The share-croppers' union, drawn as it is from one of the most poverty-stricken groups in the country, is utterly without funds. Contributions may be sent to Norman Thomas, 112 East Nineteenth Street, New York.

Issues and Men

Florida Flamboyant

Miami Beach, March 1

IF one were to judge Florida by the appearance of Miami one would have to say that the depression is over in this state. The streets are thronged with the tourists the city must have in order to live, since it has no other trade; the hotels are jammed; the night clubs flourish; there is building everywhere, with lots beginning to go fast; the newspapers are carrying more advertising by one quarter than a year ago; the FERA reports only 4,000 cases (individuals with or without families) on the relief rolls, of whom 1,300 are Negroes and 900 single or widowed women, as against a peak of 16,000 in 1932 and 10,500 in November, 1933. The visitors are spending money freely—before half the horse-racing season was over they had bet $8,000,000 on the “ponies,” and there are three dog-racing tracks. True, some of the stores report smaller expenditures per capita than a year ago. But there can be no doubt whatever of the revival of building. Here in Miami Beach homes worth $400,000 and lots valued at $176,000 have changed hands in the past two weeks. The total expenditure for building in the Miami district in 1934 ran well over $8,000,000.

So much on the surface. But all is not so well underneath. Crime is rampant; two days ago men were robbed on the golf links and two caddies were found on the streets of Miami with their skulls fractured. Politics controls the police, so the police testify, as everywhere else, with the result that the men—95 per cent of excellent character, a most competent authority assures me—cannot do their duty; if they were allowed to, my informant says, they could clean up both cities at once. There has been a general disposition to run a “wide-open town” to lure the tourists, and there was open gambling until a few weeks ago, when the evil began to repel the visitors. In consequence, a judge, the chief of police, a state senator, and other high officials have been indicted, but the senator has already been acquitted and there is not much likelihood of other convictions; anybody who wants to can still gamble with impunity. Besides those aided by the FERA, which can only help bona fide residents, there are a number of destitute or near destitute. The transient camp contains an average of 450 men, and every day some fifteen hobos and wanderers are taken to the county line and “shoved over.”

Every worker in Miami must report to the police and be finger-printed, and in many occupations must have a police license before he can work. Wages are low and hours long. One woman writes me that she worked for four days in a laundry ironing nine hours a day and was paid $1 a day. It is charged that in the restaurants men and women work twelve hours seven days a week, and the Miami Herald carries advertisements for men and boys to work for board and lodging and $1 a week! “There is more slavery in Florida today,” writes an old reader of The Nation, “than when Lincoln at the instigation of your ancestor freed the slaves.” As for Miami, he writes bitterly: “It is the

